First. Every amusement is sinful which tends to the injury of the health and the physical constitution. God requires that even the body should be presented a living sacrifice in his service; and when, for the sake of momentary enjoyment, the gratification of taste or appetite, the physical system is deranged or weakened, God is robbed of what is rightfully his. Men shudder at the thought of the untimely death of those who, in a moment of insanity, or impelled by the remorse of conscience, have put an end to their earthly existence; and unless we have satisfactory evidence that they are insane, we have reason to tremble in view of their sins. But why is it any more self-murder to apply the halter or the knife, and thus end one's days, than to do the same thing by a round of dissipation or amusement But,

Secondly. Every amusement is sinful which tends to weaken or destroy the intellectual powers. Man is distinguished from the lower order of created beings by the possession of the reasoning faculties. These are given to him for some good and noble purposes. If he pursues a course of conduct, or indulges in such amusements, as may disqualify to exert these faculties for good, he sins against his own soul and against God. The youth who spends his time in storing his mind with vain and idle stories, or in reading novels or romances, is an instance in which this is effectually done.

Thirdly. Those amusements are sinful which have a tendency to dissipate from the mind sober, serious reflection. Man is living for eternity. It should be his great object to do that which will prepare him for that world to which he is hastening, and which will be pleasing to his heavenly Father and Judge. As a creature of God, he is bound to do whatever he does to the glory of God. Can there be any question, then, whether those amusements are sinful which are inconsistent with religion, or which inevitably withdraw the mind from those things that concern the interest of the soul, and drive away the Spirit of God?

THE SACRED RECORDS.—Dr. Kennicott, in the forepart of the past century, collected nearly seven hundred Hebrew manuscripts of the Bible, which were written previously to the invention of the art of printing. To these De Rossi added 731 more, which, with some printed editions, amounted to 1608 copies of the Hebrew Bible. Yet in this great number of readings the variations are so trivial that De Rossi remarks that they consist almost entirely of things minute and of slightest account. Of the manuscripts and old editions of the New Testament, Griesbach found 150,000 different readings, none of which materially affect our present English version on any important point. No classical writings can be found to be genuine by an equal amount of authorities. What folly and madness then is it to deny that these records are genuine! At what time could an imposition or a corruption been introduced in such a manner that neither the church nor the world could detect the fraud. Surely the infidel must have more credulity than any other christian, if he can believe that thousands of copies of such writings scattered over the world could have been altered, nor been inclined to make posterity acquainted with the manner of its being accomplished.—Morning Star.

SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS.—If a sinner come trusting in his own righteousness, "Shut him out," says God; and so says conscience, and so says the law, and so says the devil. But when one comes trusting only in the righteousness of Jesus Christ, "Let him in," says God; and so says conscience, and so says the law; and then when they all agree, then let the devil say the contrary, if he dare.

"WHAT HATH GOD WROUGHT?"—Ten years ago the first missionary who visited Aintab, in Syria, was driven away and stoned. Now there are two hundred and eighteen believers in Christ; preaching three times on the Sabbath, and three times during the week; from two to four hundred persons attend the monthly concert, and the female prayer meeting consists of more attendants than all the female members of the church.

☞ Many persons give to the body the regard which belongs to the mind, and to dress the regard which belongs to the body.

"Stand up for Jesus."

Dying words of Dudley A. Tyng, to his father, Dr. S. H. Tyng.

"Stand up for Jesus:" Lo, while shadows gather,
And o'er my pathway hangs death's deep'ning gloom,
Now from my dying lips, O dearest father,
Hear these my words, close by the silent tomb,—
"Stand up for Jesus."

"Stand up for Jesus," 'mid earth's rude commotion,
Proffering comfort, joy and world[illegible] cease—
Stand like the storm-crested Pharos by the ocean,
Guiding the mariner to realms of peace.
"Stand up for Jesus."

"Stand up for Jesus," though his foes surround thee
And seek to dim the lustre of his name;
Oh! let his light and love beam all around thee,
A pure, a radiant, and a quenchless flame.
"Stand up for Jesus."

"Stand up for Jesus"—Lo! from Pisgah's summit
I gaze afar, though with a dying glance;
I see mount Zion and the hosts upon it,
And Jesus, smiling, bids me to advance.
"Stand up for Jesus."

'Stand up for Jesus"—Now in death's dark river,
My weary head is sinking 'neath the wave;
But Christ stands by me—he shall soon deliver,
God shall redeem me from the silent grave.
"Stand up for Jesus."

"Stand up for Jesus"—Lo! the night is breaking,
And on the sky dawns the eternal day,—
Oh! then shall I, from death's brief slumber waking,
Behold thy face and ne'er be torn away.
"Stand up for Jesus."

"Stand up for Jesus"—Let the worldling pity
The cross we bear, the weary path we tread;
Soon shall we meet in yon celestial city,
And stand with Christ with crowns upon each head.
"Stand up for Jesus."

—Gems, No. 3. H. L. H.

Scatter the gems of the beautiful
In the depth of the human soul;
They shall bud and blossom, and bear the fruit,
While the endless ages roll;
Plant with the flowers of charity
The portals of the tomb,
And the fair and the pure about thy path
In Paradise shall bloom!

Reading for Youth.

A Child and her Teacher.

During a revival of religion in the town of ——, many children in the school were brought to Christ. Among them was a little girl who dearly loved her teacher, and longed to have him experience the same joy which filled her own heart.

One day, as he was reading a newspaper, his little pupil entered the room and handed him a note. He knew her feelings, and he thought perhaps this was a kind word for his eternal welfare. His own conscience troubled him, and he laid down the note, intending to read it after she had left the room; but as she sat down near him, he was afraid of hurting her feelings if he neglected to open it. It was a request that he would attend a meeting which had been appointed for that evening, and now seek his soul's salvation. He checked his feelings, and turning to his little friend, met her earnest, tearful look, and said, "I will think of it." And he did think of it. Though he had long been careless for himself, he could not drive away from his mind her gentle request, or the anxious expression of her sweet face. He sought the Savior, and found him. Soon after, he devoted his life to the service of Christ; he commenced to study for the ministry, and will soon be engaged in telling others of Jesus' love. Little children, do not think that you can do no good. God will help and bless you, if you try to serve him.—Child's paper.

The Bird in the Snow.

One day a lady felt very unthankful and discontented; her spirit was quite dark; she repined at her lot. She wished this thing and that thing were not so. She thought she could have done better by herself than God had done by her.

As she looked out of the window on the cold, grey sky, the cheerful note of a bird struck upon her ear. She turned her eye to the old larch-tree. Among the bare twigs there was many a wisp of snow which the north wind had not yet dislodged. In one of these was a little bird, sitting in the snow, and chirping with a friendly, cheery chirp. She looked and listened, and listened and looked. "Is this little bird so contented on her snowy perch, moving to and fro in the north wind, while I—?" and a sense of her sinful unthankfulness brought tears to her eyes; and the tears, as it were, washed away their scales also. She looked around and beheld her mercies, and saw that the goodness of God to her was very great. And she praised God for the little bird he sent to teach her a song of gratitude.

Amalgamation.

"And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? . . . Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you."—2 Cor. 6: 15, 17.

The favor of God is never bestowed upon man unconditionally; and he being the stronger, has the power to dictate terms to those who would sue for peace. Although his mercy is as boundless as his omnipotence, yet he must have a complete surrender of everything opposed to his laws. Consequently, all rebellion, which is sin, must be thrown aside ere we can be placed in a position to receive the blessings of the Almighty.

There were certain besetments which we would gladly have brought with us when we set out to travel in the heavenward road; but we found that the gate was so exceedingly strait, that we could not introduce a single idol, and the way too narrow to admit one darling iniquity accompanying us. Everything of the flesh, being carnal, is at enmity with God; therefore a leaning toward the world is leaning from him; all that works not for the honor of God is working for the devil; and they who sow not the good seed are scattering tares. It is impossible to occupy a neutral position between the King of light and glory and the prince of darkness. If there be a single talent of the full price kept back, you and your offering will be alike rejected, and you will be doomed to a more dreadful fate than that of the wretched Ananias and his wife.

The people of God have never been of the world, although of necessity in the world, and are ever commanded to keep aloof from, and wage war against, every thing that is wicked, sensual or devilish; to make no alliance, or associate, with idolaters, or make a common cause with them. "Thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor with their gods."—Ex. 23: 32. "Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land where thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee."—34: 12. "And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee, thou shalt smite them and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor show mercy unto them."—Deut. 7: 2. "That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among you; neither make mention the name of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them."—Jos. 23: 7. "And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars," etc.—Jud. 2: 2. "Now therefore give not your daughters unto their sons, neither take their daughters unto your sons, nor seek their peace or their wealth forever."—Ezr. 9: 12. "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."—Prov. 1: 10. "Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness."—2 Cor. 6: 14. "And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them."—Eph. 5: 11.

Those who refuse or neglect these commands will assuredly provoke the anger of God, before which who shall be able to stand? Although patience and long-suffering have stayed the execution, the blow, when delivered, will be all the more terrible from the aggravated rejection of those who "rebelled against the word of God, and contemned the counsel of the Most High."—Ps. 107: 11. "For they will turn away thy sons from following me, that they may serve other gods; so will the anger of the Lord be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly."—Deut. 7: 4. "Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be devoured, and many evils and trials shall befall them; so that they will say in that day, Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us?"—31: 17. . . . "Shouldst thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord? therefore is wrath upon thee from before the Lord."—2 Chron. 19: 2. With the preceding passages see also, Ezr. 9: 13; Ps. 106: 29, 40; Isa. 2: 6.

Among the many reasons why God has commanded not to amalgamate with the wicked and the heathen, are, that it has led to murder, idolatry and human sacrifice, and forgetfulness of His mercies. For an enumeration of them, and other evils, read Psalm 106. It is also enslaving; "while they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage."—2 Pet. 2: 19. The most abject slavery is that of a man who comes under the iron rod of his unrestrained lusts and passions; and it is a libel upon the fair character of liberty, when that is called Freedom which acknowledges no leader save the guidance of unbridled appetite. Sympathy with such involves saints in their guiltiness, and also in their punishment. "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, (the doctrine of Christ,) receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed: for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds."—2 John 10, 11. "And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues."—Rev. 18: 4. Every thing antagonistic to the Bible should be held in abhorrence by those who profess to take that sacred book for their standard and rule, whether it is found among those who openly repudiate its truths and impeach its divinity, or among those who profess to believe therein. Shall we fraternize with every one calling himself a philosopher or moral reformer? The gross and shallow Atheist, who denies that the universe is without a God; and the Pantheist, who professes to see a God in everything, we alike condemn; for we believe that there is but one God, from everlasting to everlasting. Neither shall we fraternize with the Deist, who admits the existence of a Supreme, but denies that the Bible is his Word. Nor those independent societies, which carry on a guerilla warfare against the inspired volume, although they are lavish in their expressions of universal love and brotherhood. Spiritualism we abhor, and the brutalities of Free Loveism excite in us the most unmitigated disgust.

With christians of other denominations we will go hand in hand, as far as the Scriptures warrant; but even between their creed and ours, upon some weighty points, there is a serious difference indeed. They look upon death as a thing desirable and beautiful, and sing—

> "Ah lovely appearance of death,
> What sight upon earth is so fair?"

And we think it is a heart-rending and revolting picture, as is everything which sprang from the devil. "Death's alarms" are spoken of and sung thus:—

> "It is the voice that Jesus sends,
> To call them to his arms."

And we regard it as the roar of the destroyer, as he hurls himself upon his prey. They think that at death man enters a state of happiness or misery; we, that he lies in the prison-house, unconscious as the stone that bears his name, or the earth that guards his clay, till the trumpet rings upon his leaden ear, and calls him from the grave to his reward. They believe that the redeemed shall inhabit realms far above this earth, in etherial beatitude; we, that "the righteous shall inherit the earth." They locate the state and punishment of the lost in a fearful gulf of sulphurous lava, where they toss in hopeless endless torture; we, that they shall be burned up like chaff, and blotted forever from existence. They say that his vengeance—we, that his MERCY—endureth forever!

But there is a yet more dreadful junction of anti-christian elements which have for their united purpose the entire destruction of God's book: and these are rank Infidelity, and the yet more dreadful plague, blood-drunken, hydra-headed Popery. The present audacious movement, which is beginning to agitate New England, is but a feeler which the cunning Abomination is pushing forward to try how far she may obtrude her wicked presence into the hallowed institutions of this christian land. And even if she be defeated now, she will contract her scaly folds, but to concentrate her force for another spring, her ultimate aim being the total subversion of christian order, and the establishment of that despotic sway which even priest-ridden Italy is heaving under. Do the sons and daughters of this beautiful and fertile country forget why the "Pilgrim Fathers" dared the perils of the sea, and the unknown dangers of a distant land? Do they forget, that rather than give up their Bibles, they turned their backs upon every tie of friends and home, and when they found a place of refuge here, though pinched with cold and hunger, they knelt upon the frozen ground and praised their God for their deliverance? Will Protestants, will Americans, who once so bravely fought, so nobly won their liberty, stand idly by, whilst their dearest, most sacred privileges are invaded by that before whose blighting breath the fairest lands are blasted?

Remember the fable of the countryman and the frozen snake. He took it into his house, and warmed it before the fire; and when restored to life, it repaid the farmer's kindness by flying at his children. That snake is Popery. Take it to your homes, and it soon makes your hearth as cold, as desolate as a vault. It will crouch, and fawn, and prate about toleration and right of conscience, with as much sincerity as a man who is mixing a deadly potion for his neighbor would talk about the wickedness of murder. The thing is vile, root and branch; and unless entirely extirpated or confined to the sinks where it ferments, it will work ruin upon the land. I have seen its effects upon those countries which by nature are the fairest upon earth; and there squalid poverty, truculent and abandoned priestcraft and howling desolation are hideous cancers upon the loveliest portions of this globe. I would not persecute a man for his religion; but with an enmity as undying as it is intense, I would wage a war to the last extremity with the monstrous idolatry upon whose red altar oceans of the blood of martyrs have been shed. I would cry, "Grace and mercy to Roman Catholics, but no peace with Rome!"

For the Crisis.

Here and There.

"Here" 'tis a vale of tears; the heart is oft sad and weary; hope seems to stand with her bright eyes drooping, her head bowed in an attitude of grief, and her heart saddened with surrounding sorrow. All bright dreams fade here, and though amid the gloom there are bright beams of joy, still our fondest anticipations are gone ere the reality, and our fairest hopes droop like summer flowers before the stern breath of autumn. 'Tis a land of sadness, and we sigh with aching hearts for the future.

"There" all tears shall be wiped away; no gloom shall rest on that fair and lovely "Eden restored," for God is there! If we gain that land our fondest hopes shall be more than realized. None doomed to disappointment or fading there; there is immortality.

"Here" everything we love is doomed to fade, or be taken from us. Flowers fade ere the summer's soft winds cease to fan the care-worn brow; birds, as we learn to love them, and watch their coming, wing their way to some other clime. Our friends, without whose presence earth would seem a blank, are taken from us; some are laid to sleep, all unconscious, in the dust. Others pass from our sight, amid life's busy scenes, and naught is left us but memory.

"There" the flowers will be immortal, and never fade. There the birds will always sing around us; no chilling winds will drive them away, and naught can hurt or molest in that holy place, for God shall be there! There, those we love we shall dwell with forever, for there shall be no more death, parting or sadness, for all these things shall be done away.

"Here" stern poverty oft stares us in the face, and the humble suffer neglect from those whose position, by wealth or honor, is above them—even among those who profess the name of Christ, "who hath made us to differ," that the heart should oft be pained and saddened, by neglect from those we love.

"There" we shall be fellow-heirs with the Son of God. There friends will not neglect friends, nor prove traitors. The heart shall never be wrung with anguish at misplaced confidence, for love shall reign supreme, and a thought of anguish ne'er shall steal o'er the immortal heart.

Which shall we choose—"here" or there"? Which shall we live for—this world of sadness, sorrow and disappointment, with all its confusion and gloom? Shall we risk all, for a little imaginary ease here; or shall we fight well the good fight of faith, that we may gain that land where all are immortal?

> There the flowers will be ever fadeless,
> And the birds have gayer tone;
> There no sorrow, grief or sadness
> E'er shall reach Jehovah's throne.
>
> We'll meet those we've loved here fondly,
> In that bright and happy land,
> Ne'er neglected, never lonely,
> Mid that fair immortal band.
>
> If we'd gain God's city's portal,
> We must wear his armor now;
> If we'd gain a life immortal,
> Here our will to his must bow.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 18.

MY DEAR SISTER:—Let this one point be fixed in your mind, viz., that temptation does not become sin until cherished in the heart. It has to enter the mind, and mingle with the thoughts, in order to be perceived, but it leaves no contaminating influence there, unless there be an assent of the will. Many individuals, who are overwhelmed with grief by the entrance of sinful suggestions—blasphemous and wandering thoughts, and are led ofttimes to utterly cast away their confidence by reason of them, might be saved all this, did they but understand the difference between the solicitation to sin, and the indulgence of sin. The individual will never attain to a state of grace beyond the power of temptation; but he may be in that blessed condition of mind, where he can say that the "Prince of this world" "findeth nothing in me" to close in with his temptations, to love and cherish them. Yet this state is attained only by great self-denial, and much inward crucifixion. There will be inward foes endangering the betrayal of the citadel, until, by the "Baptism of fire," they are consumed, and the heart filled with the perfect love of God.

I believe that Christ does restore the spiritual nature of man to its original perfection in this life, but not his physical organization; that will be accomplished "at the resurrection of the just." I know that many would start back from this idea, and reject it at once, and perhaps you may look upon it with suspicion, but let us examine it briefly. Man was sinless before the fall. Yet, although sinless, he had appetites and dispositions of mind liable to be acted upon and enticed into a sinful indulgence. Else what power in temptation? It would be no temptation to a man in the right possession of his mental faculties, and surrounded by everything calculated to make him happy, to be solicited to cast himself into the river, there to perish. If man had not possessed an ambitious disposition, would the statement, "Ye shall be as gods," etc., have had any influence upon his mind? This faculty of man's nature is not in itself sinful; it only becomes so when directed in a wrong channel, or when it leads the man to desire, and seek to attain, out of God's order, that which may in itself be right, if rightly obtained. Wisdom is good—it is to be desired; but it must come to us through channels devised by God, having the signet of divine approval. Gold and silver are blessings when rightly obtained, but become a curse when unlawfully procured.

Christ was sinless, but he was nevertheless a man, with man's dispositions, otherwise, how could he be tempted? Yet he was tempted, and that too on every point by which mankind are tempted. It was not until he was an hungered that Satan came with the temptation, "Command that these stones be made bread." If the Savior were not hungry, would it be any temptation to solicit him thus? There was no sin in the appetite, but had he gratified it by unlawful means, then there would have been sin.

And now take another point. Would there have been force in the solicitation to worship the devil, (we do not suppose that he assumed his true character when he came to the Savior, any more than now, when he comes to us,) in order to obtain the kingdom of the world, with their splendor and glory, unless he possessed some ambition? We believe most fully that while Christ had the divinity of a God, he had the "like passions" with man; and that Satan did act upon those various passions and appetites, to entice them into a sinful indulgence, yet without any success. And now, having overcome, and possessing all power to redeem man from his lost and fallen condition, we believe that he restores man's perverted, depraved mind back to its original condition; he re-instamps upon it his own image, and by thus forming Christ within him by his power, he enables man to overcome, even as he himself has overcome.

And now I ask you again, not to look at the imperfect examples of christian character surrounding you; but look into the sacred oracles of divine truth, and see if Christ has promised to accomplish this restitution of the mental being to a sinless condition; see if he has set forth there for imitation his own "holy, harmless, undefiled" life, and commanded us to be as Christ was in this world. Hear an inspired apostle: "As He is, so are we in this world."—"Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus."—"Be ye followers of Christ."

I might cite you to many more passages, but one command is enough to render it imperative. I have enlarged upon this point much more than I designed, but I wish to make it clearly understood, for it is important, and too much overlooked.

Yours as ever, M. D. W.

"The Wise Shall Understand."

> Wake, sleeping lyre, once more awake!
> Let thy prophetic chords vibrate,
> Touched by a trembling hand;
> O Daniel, did the angel speak
> Of time, when all the pure and meek
> Should wake from their long dreamless sleep,
> And gain the promised land?
> Where all the righteous seed should shine
> Beyond the bounds of measur'd time,
> Like glittering stars at night;
> Who, in the calm blue holy sky,
> Showing man's future destiny—
> Seem e'er to speak, with laughing eye,
> I'm your daguerreotype?
>
> True; but my harp was not complete,
> 'Twas like the base, most solemn—sweet;
> But told not all the song.
> He said the wise would understand
> When these events were near at hand;
> And that I in my lot should stand,
> When all the days had flown.
>
> On Patmos Isle, the sainted John
> Added the alto to this song,
> So thrilling and so sweet;
> And Jesus furnish'd us the air,
> When he to Daniel did refer;
> And join'd the golden links so fair,
> Making the whole complete.
>
> Many have tried to learn this song,
> But still have failed, though harp all strung
> And measures all complete.
> Let no rash hand these sweet chords sweep!
> Like Daniel pray, and search, and weep;
> It will not lie, 'twill surely speak,
> When for the church 'tis meet.
> Let him who readeth understand—
> Jesus has said, and his command
> Will surely be obeyed;
> Some blessed light shall guide us there,
> Even as the bright prophetic star
> Guided the eastern Magis, where
> The infant Lord was laid.

Is God Everybody, and Everybody God?

From Fables of Infidelity, published by Hastings. Price 75 cents.

2. Pantheism is a system of deception and hypocrisy.—Has any man a right to pervert the English language, by fixing new meanings to words, entirely different from and contrary to those in common use? If he knows the meaning of the words he uses, and uses them to convey a contrary meaning, he is a deceiver. The name God, used as a proper name, in the English tongue, means "the Supreme Being; Jehovah; the Eternal and Infinite Spirit, the Creator and Sovereign of the Universe."* If, then, a man says he believes in God, but when forced to explain what he means by that name, he says he means steam, heat, electricity, galvanism, magnetism, mesmeric force, odyle, animal life, the soul of man, or the sum of all the intelligences in the universe, he is a deceiver, and vain talker, abusing language to conceal his impiety. Pantheism is simply Jesuitical Atheism. Willing to dethrone Jehovah, but unable and unwilling to place any other being in his stead, as Creator and Ruler of the universe, yet conscious that mankind will never embrace open Atheism, Pantheists profess to believe in God, only that they may steal his name to cloak their Atheism. We, in common with all who believe in God, demand, that, as their divinity is, by their own confession, essentially different from God, they shall use a different word to describe it. Let them call it Brahm, as their own brethren in India do, or any other name not appropriated to any existing being in heaven or earth, or under the earth; and let them cease to profane religion, and insult common sense, by affixing the holy name of the Supreme to their thousand-headed monster.

But the very perfection of Jesuitism is reached, when Pantheists profess their high respect for the Christian religion. They do not generally speak of it as a superstition, though some of the vulgar sort do; nor do they decry its mysteries, as Deists are in the habit of doing; nor, as Socinians, and Unitarians, and Rationalists, attempt to reduce it to a mere code of morals. They grant it to be the highest development of humanity yet reached by the majority of the human race. The brute, the savage, the polytheistic idolator, the star worshiper, the monotheist, the Christian, are all, in their scheme, so many successive developments of humanity in its upward progress. There is only one step higher than Christianity, and that is Pantheism. Well knowing that Christianity is diametrically opposed to their falsehoods, and that the Bible, every where, teaches that the progress of man has ever been down from a state of holiness to idolatry and barbarism, they have yet the hardihood to profess respect for it, as a system of concealed Pantheism, and to clothe their abominations in Scripture language. They speak, for instance, of the "beauty of holiness in the mind, that has surmounted every idea of a personal God;" and of "God dwelling in us, and his love perfected in us," when they believe that he dwells as really in every creature: in that hog, for instance. Then they will readily acknowledge that the Bible is inspired. They can accept—that is the phrase—they can accept the book which denounces death upon those fools who, "professing themselves to be wise, change the truth of God into a lie, and worship and serve the creature more than the Creator," as merely a mystic revelation of the Pantheism which leaves man to "erect everything into a God, provided it is none: sun, moon, stars, a calf, a monkey, an onion, uncouth idols, sculptured marble; nay, a shapeless trunk, which the devout impatience of the idolator does not stay to fashion into the likeness of a man, but gives it its apotheosis at once." Oh, yes; they accept the Bible as inspired—a God-inspired book—inasmuch as every product of the human mind is a development of Deity. The Bible, then, when we have the matter fully explained, is quite on a level with Gulliver's Travels, or Emerson's Address to a Senior Class of Divinity.

There is nothing, however, in this vast system of monstrosities, which fills the soul of a Christian with such loathing and detestation, as to hear Pantheists profess their veneration for the Lord Jesus, and claim him as a teacher of Pantheism. If there is one object which they detest with all their hearts, it is the Judge of the quick and dead, and the vengeance which he shall take upon them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel. Any allusion to the judgment seat of Christ fills them with fury, and causes them to pour forth awful blasphemies. They know that the Lord Jesus repeatedly declared himself the judge of the living and the dead—that "the hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation;" and that the very last sentence of his public discourses is, "And these (the wicked) shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal." When they drop the mask for a moment, they can accuse apostles and disciples with "dwelling with noxious exaggeration about the person of Christ."* Christ, as revealed in the Gospel, they hate with a perfect hatred. But when it becomes necessary to address Christians, and beguile them into the deceitfulness of Pantheism, the tune is changed. Christ becomes the model man—"one conceived in conditions favorable to the highest perfectibility of the individual consciousness; and so possessed of powers of generalization far in advance of the age in which he lived. They can listen to and honor one of the best expounders of God and nature in the Man of Nazareth."† The vilest falsehoods of Pantheism are ascribed to Jesus, that those who, ignorant of his doctrine, yet respect his name, may be seduced to receive them. Of him who declared, "Out of the heart of man proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, thefts, false witness, blasphemies," they have the hardihood to declare, "He saw with open eyes the mystery of the soul; alone, in all history, he estimated the greatness of man." Calculating upon that ignorance of the teaching of Christ which is so general among their audiences, they dare to represent the only begotten Son of God as teaching Pantheism: "One man was true to what is in you and me; He saw that God incarnates himself in man, and evermore goes forth anew to take possession of his world. He said in this jubilee of sublime emotion, 'I am divine. Through me God acts; through me, speaks. Would you see God, see me; or see thee when thou also thinkest as I now think.' Because the indwelling Supreme Spirit cannot wholly be got rid of, the doctrine of it suffers this perversion, that the divine nature is attributed to one or two persons, and denied to all the rest, and denied with fury." Yes, truly, the divine nature is emphatically denied to all unregenerated men, and denied, too, by that divine teacher thus eulogized. Hear him: "Ye do the deeds of your father. Then said they to him, 'We be not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God.' Jesus said unto them, 'If God were your Father, ye would love me; for I proceed forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me. Why do ye not understand my speech? Even because ye cannot hear my word. Ye are of your father, the devil; and the works of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh it of his own; for he is a liar, and the father of it."

Let Pantheists, then, cease to wind their serpent coils around Christianity, and defile the Bible with their filthy lickings. The Lord Jesus will not suffer such persons to bear even a true testimony to him, and his followers will not permit them to ascribe their falsehoods to him, without reproof. Let them stand out and avow themselves the enemies of Christ and his gospel, as they are, and cease their abominable pretences of giving to the world the ultimate development of Christianity. What concord hath Christ with Belial?

3. Pantheism is a system of Immorality. It loosens all the sanctions of [illegible]. If there is any one point upon which all Pantheists are agreed, it is in the denial of the resurrection, the judgment, and the future punishment of the wicked. Their whole system, in all its range, from Spiritualism to Phrenology, is expressly invented to get rid of God's moral government. If man is the highest intelligence in the universe, to whom should he render an account of his conduct? Or who would have any right to call him to account? Then, if we are developments of deity, deity cannot offend against itself. Further, if our development, both of body and mind, be the inevitable result of the laws of nature—of our organization and our passions—man is but the creature of circumstances, and, therefore, as is abundantly argued, cannot be made responsible for laws and their results, over which he has no control. "I am what I am. I cannot alter my will, or be other than what I am, and cannot deserve either reward or punishment."* Before hundreds of the citizens of Cincinnati, a lecturer publicly denied the right of either God or man to invade his individuality, by taking vengeance upon him for any crime whatever. Thousands, who are not yet Pantheists, are so far infected with the poison that they utterly deny any right of vindictive punishment to God or man.

But this is not all. Again and again have we listened with [illegible] declaring that there was no moral law—no standard of right or wrong, but the will of the community. Of course it was quite natural, after such a declaration, to assert that a wife who should remain with a husband of inferior intellectuality, or unsuitable emotions, was committing adultery; that private property is a legalized robbery; and that when a citizen becomes mentally or physically unfit for the business of life, he confers the highest obligation on society, and performs the highest duty to himself, by committing suicide, and thus returning to the great ocean of being!

We might think that confusion of right and wrong could not be worse confounded than this; yet there is a blacker darkness still. The distinction between good and evil is absolutely denied. The Hindoo Pantheists declare that they cannot sin, because they are God, and God cannot offend against himself; there is no sin—it is all maya—delusion. So the American and English school tells us it lives only in the obsolete theology. "Evil, we are told, is good in another way, we are not skilled in."† So says the author of "Representative Men." "Evil," according to old philosophers, "is good in the making; that pure malignity can exist, is the extreme proposition of unbelief. It is not to be entertained by a rational agent. It is Atheism; it is the last profanation." "The divine effort is never relaxed; the carrion in the sun will convert itself into grass and flowers; and man, though in brothels, or jails, or on gibbets, is on his way to all that is good and true."‡ Were these only the ravings of lunatics, or the dreamings of philosophers, we should never have hunted them from their hiding-places to scare our visions; but these doctrines are weekly propounded in your own city, and throughout our land, from platform and press, to thousands of your children and their school-teachers, of your workmen and your lawgivers, to your wives and daughters. Again and again have our ears been confounded in the squares of New York, and the streets of Philadelphia, and the market-places of Cincinnati, by the boisterous cry, What is sin? There is no sin. It is all an old story. Let men who fear no God, but who have lives, and wives, and property to lose, look to it, and say if they act wisely in giving their influence to a system which lands in such consequences. Let them devise some religion for the people which will preserve the rights of man, while giving license to trample upon the rights of God; or, failing in the effort, let them acknowledge that the enemy of God is, and of necessity must be, the foe of all that constitutes the happiness of man. Impiety and immorality are wedded in heaven's decree, and man cannot sunder them.

Symbolic Prophecy.—No. 3.

In looking over the Revelation of John, it will be observed that the terms, "I saw," "I looked, and behold," do not take us forward in chronological succession, but signalize a change of subject or scenery, not unlike the change of scenes on a panoramic canvas. For want of attention to this rule, we are in danger of misapplying prophecy, and consequently losing the designed benefit.

An illustration of this rule will be found in chap. 15.—"And I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvelous, seven angels having the seven last plagues. . . . And I saw (a change of subject) as it were, a sea of glass mingled with fire." This subject is continued down to the fifth verse; then the subject of the seven angels, having the seven plagues, is resumed. The vision of the victors on the sea of glass is thrown in, like a parenthesis in a sentence, and the term, "I saw," indicates the change of subject. Another example may be found in chap. 16: 3. The twelfth verse announces the pouring out of the sixth vial, and its effects; then the scene changes, and the term, "I saw," is the signal for that change; and the vision concerning the unclean spirits is thrown in between the sixth and seventh vials. Some have supposed that because they see the spirits of demons working miracles, that it is proof positive that the sixth vial is poured out; but there is no proof that it is, or is not, from the connection between the unclean spirits and vials, any more than it is proof that the victors on the sea of glass have the same chronology as the seven angels, when they receive these vials. And surely, those who believe six of these vials are in the past, and yet believe in the unconscious state of the dead, will find themselves in a dilemma, if they insist on a synchronism here. But that visions, included or thrown into a chronological chain of events, may not be included in these events, in the order they appear, is demonstrated in the events thrown in between the sounding of the sixth and seventh trumpets. The fifth and sixth trumpets embrace the history of the Turkish Empire, and chronological events connected with their history, bringing us down to 1840; and then the tenth opens with another vision, and the term, "I saw," shows the change. The tenth and eleventh chaps. include another parenthetic vision, in which are forty-and-two months, supposed to be symbolic time, which must of course throw the commencement of the vision back beyond the sounding of the fifth trumpet.

The terms, then, "I saw," "I looked, and behold," are signals for a change of subject. See seventh verse of the eighth chapter.

The first chap. being an introduction down to the eleventh verse, the twelfth introduces the first vision. "And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks," etc. The seventeenth may be thought to be an exception to this rule, but we must remember the primary meaning of the word vision is simply sight; here is a statement of the effect of the vision upon the revelator, referring us back to the vision.

The twelfth may be thought to be an exception to this rule—"And there appeared a great wonder in heaven." There is no danger of confusion here; there appeared was tantamount to saying, there was seen, or, "I that saw these things testify." Therefore I think the rule will be found correct, that the terms, "I saw," "I looked and behold," always indicate a new scene, although scenes may be indicated by other similar terms as above.—"Prove all things."

Another rule I think will always be found to hold good, i. e., Time measuring symbolic history will be found to be symbolic time, and vice versa.

Illustration.—The time in Rev. 18: 5, applied to the leopard beast; that beast being a symbol, the time of course is symbolic, and must be explained according to the rule God has given: "Behold I have appointed thee a day for a year." The time, three days, Jonah was in hell, he being a literal man, and the events all being literal, the time must also be literal.

Symbols, unlike parables, go on all fours. The four great beasts of Dan. 7th; the lion with wings like an eagle, the wings plucked, and he made to stand upon his feet, and a man's heart given to him; the bear raised on one side, and three ribs in his mouth; the leopard with four wings and four heads; all these items of description are beautifully significant. The visions of the revelator are subject to the same rule. The leopard beast of the thirteenth chap., with mouth like a lion, feet like a bear and body like a leopard, having seven heads and ten horns, and crowns upon his horns, and the name of blasphemy upon his head; every item of this description is fully met in that terrible power that warred upon the church for forty-and-two months.

So of the two-horned beast. "To fill the mould of prophecy," he must have two horns, not like a ram, (Dan. 8,) but like a lamb; he must not come up under the same circumstances as the leopard beast, out of the sea, but out of circumstances which the Spirit of infinite wisdom chose to designate—"EARTH." Sea, literally, means the gathering together of waters.—Gen. 1: 10. Waters, as explained by the angel, symbolize (17: 15,) multitudes of people—nations. If nations, or a multitude of people, gave birth to the leopard monster, the earth must mean something quite dissimilar; we must look for his rise, I think, under less ostentatious circumstances,—calm, quiet—coming up out of the earth.

Who and what is he? He doeth great wonders. This is another marked characteristic to help us in determining who he is, as also whether his history is in the past, present or future. He doeth these wonders in the presence of, or before, the beast, showing that he is no part of the beast, though working in harmony with him. Those miracles HE HAD POWER TO DO, are to produce an effect that will help to determine who he is. They are to deceive the people by those miracles, and he is to cause those thus deceived to receive the mark of the beast in their right hand or in their foreheads. He is also to cause the people to make an image to the beast. He, and the image of the beast, then, are two things, or symbols. This beast possesses two very marked phases of character in his history: a deceptive, miracle-working power, and a political career—two horns, and speaking as a dragon.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, APRIL 6, 1859.

The Spirit.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

In compliance with a request of several of our preaching brethren, and others, we purpose to give a series of articles on the word spirit, as used in the Bible, examining every passage where the original words occur, that are thus rendered, hoping to come to a correct conclusion in the matter. Pray for the writer, that he may be able to make the subject plain to all lovers of truth. We do not expect to convince the mere caviler and sectarian bigot, who thinks more of his creed than the Bible; but hope, by the help of the Lord, to throw light upon the one who is honestly seeking for the right way—"the old paths."

There are four words in the Bible which are rendered spirit in our translation, to wit:—ruakh and n'shah-mah in the Old Testament; pneuma and phantasma in the New. N'shah-mah, in the O. T., is rendered spirit twice; and phantasma, in the N. T., is also rendered spirit twice. All other examples in the O. T. are from ruakh; and in the N. T. from pneuma.

The word spirit is used in four senses in the Bible.

1. To represent a being. "God is a Spirit." Angels are "ministering spirits;" hence one is properly called "a spirit." Demons, or fallen angels, are called "unclean spirits."

2. The word spirit is used to denote an influence proceeding from a being. Hence we read of the Comforter, or Holy Spirit that it "proceedeth from the Father." In mesmeric operations, there is a spirit proceeding from the operator to his subject, by means of which he controls him. All men and animals exert this influence, more or less.

3. Spirit is used to represent a state of mind:—as, a "haughty spirit," "proud in spirit," etc.

4. The same word is used to denote the atmosphere we breathe, and is then properly denominated "the breath of life," without which all living beings upon this planet would soon die.

Before passing to notice examples of the use of ruakh and pneuma, we will refer to the other two words which are rendered spirit, each twice. N'shah-mah is found twenty-four times in the Hebrew scriptures, and is usually rendered breath. It is the word used in Gen. 2: 7, where it is said, "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed (or blew) into his nostrils the (n'shah-mah) breath of life, and man became a living soul." The same word is in Isa. 2: 22.—"Cease ye from man whose (n'shah-mah) breath is in his nostrils."

In Job 26: 4, we have one of the examples where this word is rendered spirit. In addressing Job, the Lord says: "To whom hast thou uttered words? and whose (n'shah-mah) spirit came from thee?" In this case, Job is asked if he gave "the breath of life" to any one? He might form an object resembling a living being, but had no power to give it "the breath of life;" the Creator alone has the ability to do this work.

The other example is in Prov. 20: 27. "The (n'shah-mah) spirit of man is the candle of the Lord." When this is taken from the man, he is like a lamp blown out; all circulation stops, "his thoughts perish," and he is of no further use in society. "His lamp" is "put out," or, in other words, his breath is taken away.

The examples in the New Testament, where spirit is not from pneuma, but phantasma, are in Matt. 14: 26, and Mk. 6: 49; both are records of the same event. At one time the disciples saw Jesus "walking on the sea, they were troubled, saying, "it is a (phantasma) spirit." A phantom has the appearance of reality; but, like a shadow, is nothing real or tangible. When a thing appears to be where it is not, or a shadow like a reality, it may be properly called a phantom.

In all, except the passages examined, Spirit is from ruakh or pneuma. In our next, we purpose to commence the examination of ruakh, beginning with its first use in the Bible. None of the Scriptures already examined, favor the popular idea of Spirit, that it is the immortal part of man, which goes to its reward at death, either to praise the Lord in heaven, or blaspheme him in hell.

Putnam, Ct.

Wednesday evening, March 16th, we commenced a series of meetings in this place, which closed with a discussion with Mrs. C. M. Tuttle, a trance-speaking medium, on Thursday evening, March 24. Great interest has been awakened in community in relation to the truth of the Bible, Spiritualism, sleep of the dead, destruction of the wicked, coming of Christ, and the saints' inheritance. We gave the people the privilege of asking as many questions as they pleased concerning the subjects examined, and the opportunity was well improved. Most of those who asked questions were Spiritualists, who are very numerous in this town. They hold meetings every Lord's day, and are addressed by Mrs. Mary Macomber, Mrs. C. M. Tuttle, and other trance-speaking mediums. As usual, they deny the resurrection of the dead, the second personal coming of Christ, that he is the Son of oGd more than any other man, or that God exists as a being. They did their best to entangle us in our talk, but the good Lord was our helper, and did not suffer us to be confounded before his enemies. The truth has taken strong hold of many honest minds. Those who had believed the lie of the Devil, spoken to Eve, and recorded in Gen. 3: 4, and the doctrine of eternal torment, have now turned aside from these fables to the truth of the "living God." Very large audiences assembled at Quinebaug Hall, and listened with the best attention. Among other subjects, we spoke two evenings on Spiritualism, showing from facts and the Bible, that it is the work of demons, and that it is impossible for a disembodied human spirit to make a communication. Many questions were asked the first evening by several spirits in the body, and some through Mrs. Tuttle by spirits claiming to be out of the body; but the second evening all were silent. We felt the strong arm of the Lord sustaining us, and the sweet, comforting influence of his Holy Spirit.

THE DISCUSSION. This was one of great interest, and occupied three hours, before an audience varying but little from five hundred people. The question was changed by Mr. and Mrs. Tuttle to read as follows:

Resolved,—That there are evidences to be obtained from the Bible, reason, and facts, that man is immortal, and is individualized at death (or transition) with the capacity to communicate with individuals of earth, and its effects upon society are beneficial."

When the time arrived for the discussion, Mrs. Tuttle went into the trance state and opened by prayer, after which she spoke twenty minutes, the time allotted for each speech, during which the usual arguments were presented that are commonly introduced to sustain the affirmative.

When our time came to reply, we inquired whether Mrs. Tuttle or a spirit had been speaking? The answer was, "a spirit." We then requested the demon to leave Mrs. Tuttle. The spirit replied, that Mrs. Tuttle could not discuss the question with us, and desired to keep his control of the medium. We insisted, in the name of Jesus, that the spirit leave, and give Mrs. Tuttle the control of her organs of speech, whereupon, she opened her eyes, and spoke in her natural voice, and said she was not able to discuss the question in her normal state. On the Saturday evening previous, when speaking on the subject of spiritual manifestations, and showing that they proceed from demons, we remarked that they are subject to christians, and when required in the name of Christ, to tell the truth they must do so, or remain silent. Mrs. Tuttle then arose, in a trance state, and asked if I was a christian? I said, "I profess to be." She then challenged me to control the spirit, which said, "I am not a demon." I replied, "I am glad of it," which ended the matter for that evening. Thursday, the day of the discussion, we made the matter a subject of fasting and prayer, asking the Lord to direct us in all we should say, desiring of him, if it would be for his glory to have the spirit silenced, that we might be led to make the request in his name, but that he would not suffer us to do it unless it would be best for the cause of truth. After we had made the request, and felt the sustaining grace of the Lord, and witnessed the power of Jesus' name in controlling the demons, many of the audience seemed anxious to hear Mrs. T—— discuss the question in a trance state, as it was evident she could not do it in any other. We then remarked to the audience, that we would consent to discuss with the demon if it was desired. Many voices spoke at once, requesting that the discussion should go on with the spirit that had been speaking through Mrs. Tuttle, to which we agreed, and the demon immediately took possession again, and conducted the argument in an able manner, but the truth of the Lord was stronger than the fables of Spiritualism. Many were admonished at the plainness of the Bible argument in favor of the sleep of the dead between death and the resurrection, and are very anxious to hear more on the subject. We shall expect to hear that the truth has taken strong hold in Putnam. Many who thought there was no danger to apprehend from the efforts of Spiritualists, now see that Spiritualism is the master work of Satan—the sum of all evils—leading directly to destruction.

Christian, arouse from thy dull slumbers, and prepare for the conflict, before you are stupefied by this death potion of the devil. No efforts are spared that may tend to lead us astray from the narrow path. There is no safety unless we have on the "whole armor of God;" then we can "stand against the wiles of the devil." "Fight the good fight of faith."

Progress.

The following sensible remarks are from the pen of a close observer of the progress of events. We hear much said in these days about the progression of mankind, and many really believe that the world is growing better. Were this so, the Bible would not be true. "Take heed that no man deceive you."

"A great deal has been done of late, and a great deal more has been said, in reference to the Progress of Mankind. Two principles have been adopted and laid down, by two different classes, as the foundation of the world's prosperity. One principle is, the perfectibility of man—that men can advance by their own efforts to any point of perfection that they wish: it is only to be in earnest, and the thing is done. This is the grand principle of the multitude and their leaders—of the Reformers, the Peace Society, and the Educationists. They offer you heaven upon earth,—that heaven consisting of the coarsest materials—coarse food, coarse clothing, coarse dwellings, with a little coarse education, which is only ignorance "run mad," in order to give an air of gentility to the whole. Incredible as it may seem, there are multitudes who are captivated by this sordid happiness, and who prefer it to all the ineffable glories of the kingdom of God. There is only one difficulty in the way of reaching such a heaven, and that is the Divine decree,—"I will overturn, overturn, overturn, saith the Lord, until HE come whose right it is, and I will give it him." But, as the "greatest happiness," men never look into the Bible: they have no idea that such a decree has been recorded. The other class of Progressionists consists of the "serious world," whose favorite principle is not the perfectibility of Man, but the perfectibility of Christianity. Schools, sermons, tracts, lectures, and missionaries, are to convert the world into a Paradise; and the fiery ocean of human passions is to be quelle'd and extinguished by a deluge of words—and those words so feeble that they could not restrain the passions of an infant. These Progressionists have an advantage over the others, in the fact that they recognize the Word of God, and the excellence of Christianity; but in their ULTIMATE object they are as mistaken as the former; for the Scripture tells us, in an hundred passages, that there shall be no progress whatsoever, except to eternal destruction, until the Son of Man shall reign upon the throne of Israel. This decree, like the former one, is not an insulated text, nor even an insulated passage,—it is stamped upon every page of Scripture, like the water-mark upon some delicate fabric, and you cannot tear it out unless you tear to pieces the Scriptures themselves.

With these two decrees thus indelibly recorded, the two classes of Progressionists toil on from year to year, without approaching nearer to the end. The night (in every sense) undoes all that the day has done. They lose on one side as much as they gain on the other; and may be compared to children on a "see-saw," who descend as far one moment as they have gone up the moment before. We have now been trying Christian Progress for 1800 years; Protestantism for 300 years; and Democracy and Education ever since the flood, and we have not advanced one atom towards perfection, nor can we find one square mile of the globe happy, holy, or even contented! "Miserable comforters are ye all," we may say, like Job, when we meet these Progressionists. After all their promises, where do we find ourselves in the year of Grace, 1859?—On the verge of WAR and REVOLUTION, which threaten to be the most terrible that the world has ever known, and which will break in pieces not only the cobwebs of philosophy, but the strongest links of national association. After 1858 years, we find, upon new year's day, that the civilized world could be shaken by the breath of ONE MAN,—a certain proof that everything is unsound."—The Last Vials.

Discussion.

There is to be a discussion between J. F. Walker and the Editor, at Sandy Hill, N. Y., commencing Tuesday evening, and continuing three evenings.

Subject—"Resolved, That man is wholly mortal, and obtains immortality only through Christ, by continued well doing in this life."

☞ The Discussion between Rev. S. Cobb, of the Christian Freeman, and Prof. Hudson, author of Debt and Grace, will commence in May. It will appear in full in the Freeman, published in this city, continuing about three months. Those who desire to obtain the whole, can do so, and confer a favor upon Bro. Hudson, by sending the subscription for three months, 50 cts., either to us, or to him in our care.

Bro. Hudson's argument will be issued in the Crisis.

"Fables of Infidelity."

The "Fables of Infidelity" is truly a book for the times, and should be in the hands of every lover of truth. We are giving some extracts from this valuable work, in order to introduce it to our readers. Do not fail to read them carefully.

Unjust resentment is always the fiercest.

State of Europe.

"War almost certain." Such is the language of close political observers. The Savior's description of the last days, and the last signs that should indicate his return, seems to apply to the present state of things among the kingdoms of the world, to wit: "distress of nations with perplexity." But we apprehend that this Scripture will be more fully realized before Jesus appears in the clouds of heaven. How Bible students can look for, and advocate, the conversion of the world, and tell us it is growing better, when the Scriptures declare the opposite, is an enigma that deserves a solution. The reason is clear to our own minds, but we forbear to give it at present.

It is said, "The political clubs already present that animated aspect which, during a crisis, interrupts the usual dullness."

Says a London correspondent of the New York Tribune, "The rupture between France and Austria has become inevitable." It is thought that Napoleon will adjourn "actual hostilities to the month of May."

"The Turks feel their own danger keenly, and are concentrating troops along the Balkan, ready to march into Servia or the Principalities as soon as the revolt breaks out."

"In the meantime, the Moldo-Wallachians are preparing for a serious struggle. They are organizing their militia, and fortifying the strategic points on the Danube, while Russia is quietly assembling a sufficient force on the Moldavian frontier, to protect the present state of things either against the Turks or against the Austrians."

"The Moniteur, which has received the nickname of Menteur (liar), continues to speak peaceably, while the preparations for war are made in an ostentatious way. Thus, the removal of the French troops from Rome was announced in the semi-official Constitutionnel as having already taken place, while a reinforcement was being sent to Civita Vecchia. So, too, the Emperor declares that he wishes to maintain peace, while he admits that a treaty has been recently concluded with Sardinia. As a logical result of such double-dealing, stocks are continually declining, the agitation in Italy increasing, volunteers are hastening to Piedmont. Croatain border regiments pouring down into the rich Italian plain, and the conflict is now unavoidable. Count Cavour and King Victor Emanuel cannot now retrace their steps; they will never dare to declare that they have trifled with the patriotism of the Italians; and Napoleon himself could scarcely be safe if he abandoned Italy by coming to an agreement with Austria.

The Emperor Francis Joseph is, on the other hand, highly incensed at seeing his finances ruined by the sudden French pressure, and having already forgotten the long series of his defeats in the Hungarian war, he puts the greatest faith in the gallantry and loyalty of his army; and, immense sacrifices for putting it on a war footing in Lombardy having already been made, he is unwilling to come to terms, and rather wishes to try the fortunes of war at once."

The Rights of Wrong.

The Monthly Religious Magazine, for April, says of this pamphlet: "Mr. H. is a vigorous, earnest, revering, and humane thinker, and well furnished with the theological learning which the proper treatment of his high theme demands."

This magazine, founded and long conducted by Prof. Huntington, is now edited by Drs. E. H. Sears and Rufus Ellis. The latter, in "defining his position," in the same number, expresses in behalf of himself and others "horror at the substitution of everlasting bodily torture for the Scriptural doctrine of eternal death, the death of the soul." The phrase, "bodily torture," makes the expression slightly indefinite; yet it looks strongly towards the new, or rather old view, which some call heresy. We do not know whether that is his opinion, though we have heard it imputed to him. We happen to know that one or two other D. D.'s also, less Unitarian than Dr. E., speak very noticeably towards the view of immortal life in Christ only. The doctrine is making its way very quietly, and it needs only a little patience and all Christian loving and living, to behold and rejoice in a great triumph.

The above Magazine is published monthly, at $3 per year, by L. C. Bowles, 117 Washington street, Boston. It is ably conducted, unsectarian, and the best monthly for a religious, home journal. Single copies, 30 cts.

"What must I do to be Saved?"

"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." It is a common saying among men of the present day, that it is not important how or what they believe, if it is the cross, and if they ride any hobby it shall be the cross. But is there not a divine command, somewhere, for us?—Rom. 10: 9. We are to believe that God raised Christ from the dead, or we cannot be saved. Now if we believe he was raised from the dead, "how say some among you (1 Cor. 15: 12–18,) that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen, and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain and your faith vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

This is what I should call a mathematical demonstration; that is, if we believe that God raised Christ from the dead, we must believe in a resurrection of the dead; and if they don't believe in a resurrection of the dead, they do not believe Christ was ever raised: therefore they are yet in their sins: and there can be no hope of salvation through Christ.

Do not "some among you," or in the professed church now, deny the literal resurrection? I heard a minister of high standing say, that the passage in 2 Tim. 2: 18, referred to the second resurrection. As much as to say the first one was past already.

Again, what did Jesus tell Martha, when Lazarus died? Their conversation was on the resurrection.—John 11: 25. If you believe that I was raised, when you die I will raise you: and those that live and believe it when I come, shall never die."

Was not this the belief of the prophets, from Abel to Samuel, who all died in the faith, not yet having received the promise? and of all the disciples, that they should literally come out of their graves, out of the ground,—not graves of sin,—and then should live for ever through Christ? Nor was there a doubt on this subject, until the man of sin was revealed, and invented a purgatory to speculate upon. And it is the dregs of this doctrine we have to contend with in the church to this day; and they are still falling away, departing from the faith once delivered to the saints, singing the syren song of peace; because, say they, it makes divisions, we will say nothing about it. Does not the truth always divide from error? We are commanded to live in peace as far as we can do so consistently; but not to a sacrifice of truth. For He that is for us is more than all that can be against us.

O, let us, dear brothers and sisters, examine God's word, make it our study; that we may not be deceived in what God requires us to believe; "but hold fast the traditions which we have been taught, whether by word or epistle," that we may be saved at his coming.

The Family Altar.

The house is here as of old; but the happy faces are away, and the gleeful voices are beyond my hearing. Strangers are in the old mansion. He who presided at the table, and invited the household to the board, is now mouldering in the dark and silent grave. We children, that sat "like olive branches around the table," have gone—some to the grave, and some to fight the stern battles of life in a dark and stormy world, away from each other and from home.

I am alone—not personally, for others are around me, busied with the cares of life; but alone of all the circle that once assembled here. The old familiar guests come no more. The kindred dear no longer make their accustomed visits. The saints of God no more turn aside to hold sweet communion here with kindred hearts—to talk of the majesty and glory of Messiah's kingdom, and to bow in humble prayer around the family altar.

No more do I see the gathering circle of friends and neighbors assembled for social worship. No more do I hear the penitent's cry: "God be merciful to me a sinner;" nor see the radiant light of heavenly peace resting upon the countenance of the pardoned soul. No more do I hear "the good confession" of the believing saint, or hear the song of joy from the ransomed captive. All, all is changed. Those sermons, preached beneath the old roof-tree, so full of burning thought and solemn truth, I hear no more. Those exhortations so impassioned, melting and moving, have gone, and only their distant echoes stir my heart to-day.

But the family altar! Ah, yes! that is gone; and yet not so, for it is the family that is gone, but I trust the altar-fire has been carried forth with them in their journeyings. And there are, I trust, some praying ones yet among the strangers that linger here. But that altar is not now as of old. I bow in the place where I bowed a score and more of years gone by. I read from the same sacred word. I sing the same sweet words—

"Lord, in the morning thou shalt hear
My v[illegible]ce ascending high;
To thee will I direct my prayer,
To THEE lift up mine eye."

I bow and pray to the same God, the God of my fathers—but I feel alone.

It is not now as then, when grandmother, and father and mother, and brothers and sister, and friends, and the "stranger within our gates," (directed to us by some christian believer) bowed the knee before the throne; when all prayed, from the aged grandmother to the lisping child.

The circle was large and pleasant. And when in the long winter evenings, before the children's eyes were blinking in token of weariness, the word of God was read, with some appropriate comments, or with silent reflections, then we bowed in prayer. "The youngest first," father would say, "for if the others pray first, the little ones will feel that all has been asked that can be, and they can have nothing to pray. The youngest first leaves the field clear to the little ones, and then let the others pray afterwards." And then little sister would begin and breathe out the petitions that lay near her childish heart; then others that were young and tender—I, the most wayward of all, among the rest, would feel my hardness melting and my truant impulses restrained, and my heart held back from evil associations and overmastering lusts, by the bonds that bound me to the family altar. Then some christian brother or sister would pour out the gratitude of a stranger's heart, and implore for us an answer to a stranger's prayer in our behalf. Then perhaps our helpers in the toils of life, who were sometimes also helpers in Christ Jesus,—then the mother's fervent yearnings,—then the grandmother's humble petitions,—and finally, last of all, bringing up the rear—remembering what the others had forgotten, supplicating with strong cryings those mercies for which the others had asked,—joining in agreement and pleading the promise made to two who were "agreed on earth,"—came my Father's prayer. O, what a prayer was that! What thanks were poured out from a devout heart! What blessings were asked in faith and confidence,—blessings upon the family, one by one, down to the least and weakest of them all, blessings on the strangers and pilgrims with us,—blessings on the sick who came to tarry within the preacher's humble abode, and who sometimes went forth, healed in body and soul, through the mercy of Jesus Christ. Then what prayers for the sinful and the burdened; what petitions for the weak and sad; what blessings were invoked upon "those who have said, pray for me." And then how the mind would range over the hills and vales, where he had sown with tears the precious seed, and watered it as it sprang up. How he would take up, one by one, the places of his labor—Hartford, Springfield, Chicopee, Prospect, Kent, Sharon, Salisbury, Westfield Farms, and so on,—place after place,—beseeching the mercies of God upon the waiting and faithful ones who were bound by strongest ties about his heart.

Ah, what prayers! It seemed as if man was talking with his Maker almost face to face. The shadows would flee, and the light of joy and hope shine all about us, and so in the arms of his mighty faith we felt ourselves borne as to the very inner sanctuary of prayer, and learned to come boldly to the throne of grace. Those prayers went up as incense before the throne. Those tears are in God's bottle, counted and remembered, written in his book. That father lies among his parents and his children, and not far from one who was sick and a stranger and he took her in, and smoothed her way down to the grave, and laid her in his family burying place.

But the family are scattered. One in the far West, one in one of the middle States, and I, a pilgrim burden-bearer, wandering to and fro, caring for the cares that furrowed my father's brow, praying for those for whom he prayed, seeking to watch over and sustain those to whom he was once a father and a husband, longing, too, for a faith as strong as he possessed, and a soul as mighty in the power of God as his; sit here beneath the old roof, and while others come and go beside me, I, with aching heart, and dim and tearful eyes, pen the brief recollections of days and joys that are past and gone forever.

But I cannot linger here. Toils and trials call not for weakness, but for strength,—not for fainting spirits, but for courageous souls. O for God's might to do my work! And all that strength must come from on high. And where are there more potent recollections to kindle inspiring thoughts within the soul, than the holy memories that cluster around the "family altar?"

I have a family altar far away—a place where the fires of holy love are enkindled, and sweep upwards with the incense of grateful praise. And wherever God's providence shall call me to pitch my tent, there, by his help, will I build an altar unto the Lord. But in all my wanderings to and fro; in all my waywardness of heart and frailty of life; in all my weakness and weariness, and discouragement, I trust there will still linger about me the answer of a father's prayers, the holy influence of a mother's tears, and the sweet and hallowed memory of the scenes long past that occurred around the altar of prayer.

My father is dead, yet he liveth in Christ, in the divine promise and grace of Him who is Lord of the living and the dead. I shall see him again, I trust, through grace, in eternal glory. He can pray for his poor wandered children no longer. But will not a "Father in Heaven" answer those long offered prayers? and will not the all-prevailing supplications of Him who "ever liveth to make intercession for us" avail so that we, weak children of covenant and promise, may be led at last to meet with our fathers' and our father's God in the goodly land? Brethren, pray for us. Your Brother in Christ Jesus,

Fables of Infidelity.

Permit me to call the attention of the readers of the Crisis to the work recently published by H. L. Hastings—Fables of Infidelity. I consider it a work of rare merit, every way calculated to establish the minds of those who may be wavering as to the authenticity of the Scriptures. It should be in every christian family. It is worthy of a wide circulation.

Do not Give them Up.

The following short letters may encourage some parents not to despair of their children, for whom they have so often prayed, even if they do seem to reject all their counsels while in their presence, and under their immediate influence. This young man did not seem to appreciate the prayers and advice of a pious mother and a tried father, until he went from home to live, which caused a new train of reflections, that looks like the work of the Spirit of God. Hearing of his father's starting anew in the work of the Lord, called out the second letter.

H. Munger.

Mother:—I cannot stop to write but a line, so you must excuse me. . . . . I read a chapter in the Bible every night, for the reason that I think it a good plan, and calculated to help me keep in mind my determinations, and knowing it would please you.

Yes, mother, I am going to try to do well, and trust I shall succeed. One thing I assure you: I am in the house every night as soon as the store is closed. . . .

Tuesday Evening, March 10, 1859.

My Dear Parents:—

I have just received your letter, and very glad I am to hear from home; for I have just begun to feel a slight touch of that common disease among young persons upon going away from home, viz: homesickness—not in its worst form, however; but in its milder form.

I am very glad to hear that father has enjoyed his mind of late, and I really hope you will be more than recompensed through him for your loss of John and myself. I have often noticed how dejected and low-spirited father is, and it makes me feel sad; for I dont like to see it, and would do anything in my power to drive it away. Cheer up, father, a better day is coming. You have been unfortunate, but it will not always be; . . . and as long as I have health and strength you shall not want. You have put your faith in God; rest assured, he will help you.

Father, I have been an undutiful son, I know, and have many bad qualities; and in years past and gone I have not treated you as I ought; and now I am sorry for it. Father, forgive me, and in future I will try to do better. . . .

Charlie.

Justice and Mercy.

Question. How is it possible for God to maintain, in its fullness, the attribute of justice towards a criminal, where the penalty and letter of the law demand his death; and, at the same time, so show mercy to the same criminal, as that the attribute of mercy may appear in all its fullness, as becometh the character of a perfect and all-glorious God?

Answer. When Adam disobeyed God, he subjected himself to the penalty of the divine law, which was death. Gen. 2: 16–17.—"And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." But the man transgressed! Gen. 3: 17 19.—"And unto Adam he said, because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, thou shalt not eat of it; cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also, and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Chap. 5: 5.—"And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years: and he died." And Adam's posterity participate in the same sentence with himself, being begotten by him in his dying state. Here is maintained the attribute of justice. Now for mercy.

God so loved man, made in his own image, and so pitied him in his deluded state, being deceived and overcome by a superior intelligence; "that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John 3: 16. Which gift is really expressed in the promise, Gen. 3: 15, "it shall bruise thy head;" thus giving man a second trial, and proffering eternal life through his Son, to the believing and obedient, in the resurrection; and threatening the second, eternal death to the unbelieving and disobedient; which places every son and daughter of Adam in circumstances accountable for their own acts. And here is manifested the attribute of mercy to the glory of God. Amen.

Correspondence.

From Eld. H. F. Carpenter.

Bro. Grant:—I am again in Western New York, after visiting East Princeton, Mass., and showing up the "rappers" by the aid of God's great looking glass—the Bible—having the pleasure of seeing many turn away with disgust from the abominable picture reflected from such an idolatrous and heathenish system; of seeing others yield to the power of God, obtain pardon for sins and "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory," and anxious to be buried with Christ in baptism; and, moreover, the church generally revived, and loving the "appearing of God, and our Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ,"—though Baptists and Congregationalists by profession. I was then ready to revisit my old field of labor in this vicinity. On my way I called at Scitico, Springfield, Chester Factories, Albany.

At all these places I had pleasant and interesting seasons, especially with the church at Albany. This church I found really enjoying prosperity among its members. A happier company I never preached to—joy in the Lord was read in every feature. To preach to such a class is no task, but a relief. The reason of their prosperity was, "the Lord was with them." The reason that He was with them was, they had gone to work, and as Bro. Munger wrote a few weeks since, when a church will work the Lord will bless. City churches, especially those of large cities, think they can do nothing without a pastor, and that too, a very eloquent and popular one;—but the Albany church has proved this to be a grand mistake. They have no pastor, yet their meetings on the Lord's day are very interesting, and their congregations good. Indeed, they told me that God began to bless them with prosperity when they began to preach for themselves, although they enjoy calls from the ministry very much. This seems to me right. I had almost said, would that all churches would dismiss their pastors, at least a portion of the time, and supply his place with their own hearty efforts; then many a destitute and benighted region might hope for some rays of light.

How many a church throws all, or nearly all, responsibility upon a pastor, when their own talents are nicely folded in napkins—talents which, if exercised, might stir many a heart, and make it to pant after God. In so doing, the efforts of a preacher are confined within a narrow limit, and gifted minds become corroded from disuse, truth and righteousness suffer, and the number of the finally lost will be augmented.

O that the missionary,—I mean a Home Missionary, spirit would fall on every church, and thrust out into the vast harvest-gifts long time neglected! Would that this wide field might be entered by able-bodied, self-sacrificing men—men of faith and full of the Holy Ghost, that would lay siege at sin's strongholds, and triumph in Christ! May the peace and prosperity of the Albany church long continue. I shall not soon forget their hospitality and aid to me, and this I may say of all the churches upon whom I called in my journey.

This field is large and yields fruit slowly, but I hope to labor in patience. The Lord willing, I shall baptize two next Sunday. I send you one new subscriber; I hope soon to send more. I shall make effort, for I love the Crisis.

From O. D. Gibson.

Bro. Grant:—I have just returned from a visit to Stockbridge, Vt., where there are a few who are looking for that blessed hope and glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior, Jesus Christ; but who have had but little, if any, preaching for some time past. Some of them have tried not to entirely forget the assembling of themselves together, but a low state of things was manifest, and but little interest. I went there the 10th, and remained until the 23d, endeavoring to proclaim the Word, which was blessed to their reviving and encouragement; also the converting and reclaiming of some six or eight others. There were others who were interested, and who, we hope, will come out fully on the Lord's side. We endeavored to set things in gospel order—as things have been at rather loose ends—by drawing up a covenant which was signed by a few, who chose them two Elders, to oversee the affairs of the church, that all things may move on as the Word directs.

We hope the Lord will add to their numbers such as shall be saved. We hope all preaching brethren who go in their vicinity will give them a call, and preach the Word for their encouragement. Send your appointments to Chauncy Boutwell, Gaysville, Vt., or through the Crisis. I shall be with them, the Lord willing, Sunday, April 24th.

☞ Do what good you can. If it be but little, do not think it will make no great difference any more than though you had not done it. It will make a difference. One ray of light—the smallest even—makes a difference in a dark place.

A GRAND BOOK!!

Fables of Infidelity and Facts of Faith.

BY R. PATTERSON.

For a long time I have felt the need of some book on Infidelity which would meet the protean forms in which it now appears, and hurl the gauntlet of truthful and enlightened defiance at the head of ignorant and prejudiced scepticism. I had purposed writing a work on the subject myself, but at length, to my great joy, I find it done to my hand. I have in my library many treatises on the subject, but some are too large, some too small, some too old, some too dull, and though they contain abundance of gold, yet it is not coined ready for circulation.

This book meets the want, and is emphatically the best work on infidelity for the common reader that I have seen. It discusses the question in almost every point of view, takes up one after another of the sceptic's refuges of lies, and scorches them to cinders. Every stroke is like a stroke of lightning. Fact, argument, science, reason, sarcasm and appeal lie scattered through the pages. Geology, theology, ethnology, and many other "ologies" come in for a share of notice, and the objections of infidels to the book of God are shown in their proper light. All will be interested and profited by the perusal of this book, even though they may not agree with or endorse all its minute particulars. It is published in one vol 12 mo., more than 300 pages, fine clear type and good paper, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sent by mail post paid, on the receipt of 75 cents. Usual discount to agents. For $6 in cash, a dozen copies will be sent by express to any person.

I would also invite attention to the following valuable works, some of which have received the commendation of many of the most learned and pious persons in various religious denominations. All of them will be sent by mail pre-paid to any address on receipt of the price.

The Voice of the Church on the reign of Christ on Earth, by D. T. Taylor. Price $1 00.

The Great Controversy between God and Man, its Origin, Progress and End, by H. L. Hastings. Price, paper 40 cents., cloth 60 cents.

Spiritualism, a Satanic Delusion, by Wm. Ramsey, D. D. Paper 30 cts., cloth 40 cts

Tracts on Prophecy, by H. L. Hastings 1 vol. cloth, 60 cts.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

PER STEAMSHIPS KANGAROO AND PERSIA.

Liverpool advices of the 16th and 19th ult. The aspect of affairs in Europe continues warlike, and the most extensive preparations for hostilities were being made in France, Austria, England and throughout Italy.

The Pope has announced before the Consistory that he did not claim the fulfillment of the demand for the evacuation of the Papal States. His only intention was to prevent a collision of the two Catholic empires in his own dominions. The Pope also said that he had entrusted his destiny to Providence, and that orders have been given for public prayers for the maintenance of peace.

In a letter from Rome we are told that the Pope is about to send a Cardinal to Vienna and another to Paris, to arrange with the Austrian and French governments the mode of evacuating the Roman States. It is not improbable that the mode of evacuation will be undecided until a more important question is settled—that of peace or war.

An ugly feature, which seems likely to fortify the Emperor of the French in his designs against Austria, is found in the fact that the Russian government has forbidden the exportation of horses. This is looked upon as a measure expressly intended to embarrass the Vienna Cabinet.

It is likewise to be observed that the Russian journal Le Nord, published at Brussels, has formally taken an opportunity of expressing doubts as to the correctness of a recent report that Russia was prepared to throw her influence into the scale in favor of the attitude taken by Germany in the existing crisis.

Sardinia has completed her loan of $10,000,000, has called out her reserve, and has contracted in France for 50,000 revolvers. Additional reports also state that the garrison of Turin is in march for the Ticino, whither all the cavalry has preceded it, and that a requisition has been addressed by the government to the Emperor of the French for an auxiliary corps d'armee of 75,000.

Various rumors were afloat in Paris, Thursday, the 17th. It was said that the Lyons Railway Company has received orders to keep a line in readiness for the transport of 75,000 men. It was also asserted that the squadron which recently left Toulon is to proceed to Algiers for the purpose of embarking troops at that place. The Emperor would receive the Prussian Ambassador, Count Pourtales, in a private audience that day. It was further asserted that the Conferences for examining the election of Prince Couza have been adjourned to an indefinite period.

The Austrians had commenced preparations to lay mines for the purpose of blowing up the bridge of Buffalora over the Ticino.

Austria, full of distrust as to the success of the negotiations, continues to concentrate her forces upon the frontiers of Piedmont. A hundred and ten 36-pounder guns have arrived at Pavia, 6,000 men have been quartered at Lodi, and 7,000 will shortly assemble at Mantua. Ten thousand siege shells, it is stated, are to be distributed to the army, and the Diritto assumes that they are to be used in an attack upon Alessandria.

At Pogli and at Trieste armaments continue without ceasing; and, having regard to the possibility of a sudden descent upon the coasts of Illyria and Dalmatia, Austria has ordered 70,000 earth bags, and 1,200 block houses or wooden forts, to be constructed for the defence of the different parts of the shore. Each of these forts will contain fifty soldiers.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times, in his despatch dated the 15th, says that the impression that peace will not be long maintained is stronger than ever. Austria is fully prepared for war, but she will faithfully keep the promise given to the British government not to act aggressively. It was the impression at Vienna that it would be useless to put questions in the British Parliament respecting Lord Cowley's mission until the British ambassador has had an opportunity of conversing with the Emperor Napoleon. The Italian regiments are being sent into the inner provinces of the empire. The municipal council of Trieste have received orders to have 2,000 beds constantly prepared for passing troops.

It was believed that the misunderstanding between Spain and Mexico had been nearly settled; but by a recent telegraphic despatch from Madrid, we learn that the government has given orders for a definitive settlement of the Mexican question; that an imposing squadron is being organized, and that great preparations for war are in progress.

The Emperor Napoleon would review the Imperial Guard on the 19th. It was the anniversary of the entry into Paris of Napoleon I. on his escape from Elba. There was some expectation that the Emperor would address the troops.

[From the Paris Moniteur, March 15.]

A part of Germany this day presents a spectacle which affects and astonishes us.

A vague, indefinite question, which affects the most delicate problems as well as the most elevated interests, has suddenly aroused the political world. The French government sees in this a subject for examination and the necessity of vigilance. France is engaged in the consideration of the disquieting situation of Italy, which she seeks to settle, in concert with her allies, and in the interest of the repose of Europe. Is it possible to show a more sincere desire peacefully to overcome the difficulties, and foresee the complications which always result from the want of foresight and decision?

Nevertheless, a part of Germany responds to her calm attitude by the most unreflecting alarms. On a simple presumption that nothing can justify and every thing rebuts, prejudices are awakened, doubts are propagated, and passions are let loose—a kind of crusade against France is commenced in the Chambers and in the press of some of the States of the Confederation. France is accused of entertaining ambitious views, which she has disavowed, of preparing for conquests of which she has no need, and it is attempted by these calumnies to terrify Europe with imaginary aggressions, which were never meant to be attempted. * * * *

If the French government were not convinced that its acts, its principles, and the feeling of the great majority of the German people disavowed the suspicions of which they would endeavor to render is the object, it would have a right to feel offended; it would see in this not only an injustice, but likewise an attack on the independence of its policy. In effect, the movement which it is sought to excite on the Rhine with respect to a question which does not menace Germany, but in which France is interested as a European Power, tends to nothing less than to contest with her the right of making her influence felt in Europe and to defend her own interests, even with the most extreme moderation. This is a pretension which would be wounding to her if it could be seriously put forth. * * * As to France, she has not yet been moved by these vague rumors and unjust attacks. France does not hold the whole of Germany responsible for the errors and malevolence of certain manifestations which spring rather from mean resentment than from serious fears. German patriotism, when it is not obscured by prejudices, knows too well how to distinguish between duties which she ought to perform and prejudices which would lead her astray. Germany has nothing to fear from us for her independence; we have a right to expect justice from her as to our intentions, as we have sympathy for her nationality. By showing herself impartial, she will show herself foresighted, and will do better service to the cause of peace. Prussia understood this line of policy, and she has united herself with England in order to promulgate wise counsels at Vienna at a time when agitators were endeavoring to arouse angry passions, and to form a coalition amongst the States of the German Confederation against us. The reserved attitude of Prussia is certainly more advantageous to Germany than the excitement of those who, appealing to the malice and prejudices of 1813, expose themselves to the risk of irritating national feeling in France.

The French people are susceptible in regard to its honor, but at the same time moderate in the employment of its strength. If threats will arouse it, it may, nevertheless, be pacified by conciliation.

ALGIERS.

It is stated that despatches had been received from Algeria announcing that unusual excitement prevailed among the Arabs, and that a demand had been made for the division of infantry which lately arrived in France to be sent back to Africa.

DOMESTIC.

Per steamer Northern Light, from Aspinwall 22d ult.

Valparaiso dates are to March 1st. Another abortive attempt at revolution was made at Valparaiso, Feb. 28th. The battle lasted four hours, resulting adverse to the Patriots. The American Consulate was riddled with shots.

The revolutionary movement throughout Chili was dangerously powerful and popular.

By the English mail steamer important news had been received from Greytown. The United States sloop-of-war Decatur having anchored in a cove near San Juan del Sur, was taken for fillibusters. The President, with 300 troops, took possession of the Transit Route to prevent their landing, but, being apprised of their true character, he retreated, destroying all bridges.

Meanwhile a French officer, with a small force, crossed the lake to the river San Juan Selva.

The White steamers were forcibly detained, and their officers and crews imprisoned, and had not been released when the steamer left.

Forts Castillo and San Carlos are to be given up to Mons. Belly and men for their headquarters.

The work-shops and houses at Puntus Arenas, belonging to the Accessory Transit Company, have been swept away by the sea.

Greytown harbor is rapidly filling up, the entrance being narrowed to less than forty feet.

According to the Panama Star, it was Nicaraguan government officers who took possession of the American lake boats, which have been abandoned to Belly.

The same paper reports all the southern part of Chili in the hands of government. Talca was delivered up without fighting.

The general opinion was that in a month the country would be as quiet as ever.

Cincinnati, 28th.—The steamer Nat Holmes, bound from Pittsburg to St. Louis, with one hundred and fifty passengers, mostly emigrants to Pike's Peak, collided with the steamer David Gibson, bound from New Orleans to Cincinnati, with a cargo of sugar and molasses, opposite Aurora, Ind., last night. Both boats sunk, and the cabins floated off. Fifteen or twenty persons are supposed to have been lost on the Nat Holmes, and indeed one account says that only one hundred of her passengers were saved.

The David Gibson had but a few passengers, who are all supposed to have been saved, but two or three of the crew are missing. She was owned here, and valued at $18,000, and insured for two-thirds of that amount. The Nat Holmes was owned in Pittsburg, and valued at $10,000.

No lives were lost in the David Gibson. The Nat Holmes had eighty-six passengers, forty-three of whom were lost. The survivors lost nearly all their clothing and $15,000 in money. The total loss on both boats and their cargoes is about $300,000, and the insurance is $175,000.

Death of Dr. Alcott.—Dr. William A. Alcott, the eminent author and physician, died at his residence in Auburndale, Newton, at 11 o'clock on Tuesday. Deceased was widely known as the author of many valuable works on physiology and hygiene, which have had a large circulation. He was a native of Connecticut. He was a strict vegetarian in his diet, and to this fact is attributed the prolongation of a life which hung upon an enfeebled constitution.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in East Kingston, N. H., Nov. 1st, 1858, of typhoid fever, Sr. Lucy E. Currier, aged forty-seven years, formerly of Kennebunk, Me., wife of Bro. Wm. H. Currier.

She was converted when about sixteen years of age, and united with the F. W. Baptist church in Kennebunk. She was married in 1837. In 1843 she embraced the faith of the Lord's soon coming, and remained in that faith till her death. Her health was feeble for years. She went to Kennebunk to visit her friends a few weeks before she died, with the impression, as she said, "for the last time." She had a remarkably good visit, and was much blessed at a campmeeting at that place. She returned and went the same week to Kingston to meeting, and gave her last testimony to the church there with remarkable joy and power. She was then taken down, and most of the time for nine weeks had not her senses fully. But she had lucid intervals, in which she conversed with friends of her state and the blessed hope, and prayed with great fervor. She said she should not get well—that she was resigned; that she was unworthy, but Jesus had heard her prayer, and forgiven her all, and would receive her; that Jesus was precious, and was her all.

She fell asleep in Jesus, to rest till the Lord shall descend from heaven with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, when the dead in Christ shall rise.

Elder Plummer preached on the occasion, from 1 Cor. 15. She leaves a husband of the same faith and hope, and two children, a son and daughter, both recently converted and baptized, to weep their loss, but not without hope of speedy re-union, and everlasting communion together in glory. Let us all watch and be ready also.

D. I. Robinson.

Died, in Simons, N. B., Bro. Samuel Raymond, aged 25, after an illness (consumption) of about eight months.

Awhile before his death, he expressed much anxiety about himself and the christian community, expressing his fears that they would be lost on the account of their worldly mindedness, covetousness, and indifference to the subject of religion. Soon his fears were all driven away relative to himself, and he became peaceful and happy, and fell asleep in Jesus. His faith was that he should sleep in the grave till the resurrection morn. He believed Jesus would soon come again to break the slumbers of the dead. He has left a good and tender wife and two small children, with many kind friends, to mourn their loss. He was consigned Feb. 25, 1859. Text, Eccl. 12: 7.

I. Damman.

Died, in Brighton, N. B., three lovely children of Bro. Morris and Matilda Day. They fell victims to death by scarlet fever and throat distemper, all within one week. The first was consigned to the grave Feb. 17, aged five years six months. Two on Lord's day, 20th. The eldest was eleven years four months, a fine daughter. The youngest three years four months. These make four that they have laid in the cold and silent grave, side by side, to be awakened by the voice of God.

I. Damman.

Frankness.—Be frank with the world. Frankness is the child of honesty and courage. Say just what you mean to do on every occasion, and take for granted you mean to do what is right. If a friend asks a favor, you should grant it, if it is reasonable; if not, tell him plainly why you can not. You will wrong him and yourself by equivocation of any kind. Never do a wrong thing to make a friend, nor to keep one, the man who requires you to do so is dearly purchased at such a sacrifice. Deal kindly, but firmly, with all men; you will find it the policy which wears best. Above all, do not appear to others what you are not. If you have any fault to find with any one, tell him, not others, of what you complain. There is no more dangerous experiment than that of undertaking to be one thing to a man's face, another behind his back. We should live, act, and speak out of doors, as the phrase is, and say and do what we are willing should be known and read by men. This is not only best as a matter of principle, but as a matter of policy.—Ex.

The Maine Annual Conference.

It will be remembered by those who are interested that it was voted at our last annual conference, that the next should be appointed by the Moderator and Scribe, at such time and place as they should designate after consulting the churches. It seems by experience that the early part of the summer is an appropriate time for it, for several reasons. I write this notice to call the attention of the brethren to it, and to ask them what church or society wishes to have the conference meet with them this year, and at what time. Will such please write to Bro. N. Smith, of Hallowell, or to me at Richmond, soon? The church in Richmond, though very few in numbers, have sustained it four years liberally, and have enjoyed the blessing of God in so doing, especially the last year. I do not know their minds about it for the future, but I think it might be well to hold it in other sections of the country, as opportunity may offer. In behalf of others,

I. C. Wellcome.

Richmond, Me., April 3, 1859.

Notice.

There has been recently fitted up in this city a small but convenient house of worship, situated on Warren street, two doors below my residence, which is on the corner of Rumford and Warren streets. The house is open and free, without distinction of party, for all the servants of Jesus Christ who are now publishing the glad tidings of the soon coming kingdom. We are few in number and limited in means; but would say to any, and to all, who feel the cause of God at heart, and are willing to sacrifice for the same, that here is an open door.

For the Crisis.

A Chapter on Doubtings.

"Never go gloomily, man with a mind,
Hope is a better companion than fear."

Doubt? Yes, they doubt, keep on doubting. The minister doubts, and the people doubt. They were born doubting, educated in doubts, grew up in doubts, became rooted and grounded in doubts. Then of course, its doubt, doubt, doubt! They speak doubtingly, pray doubtingly, preach doubtingly, go about day after day in doubts. Every thing they do spiritually is done on the principle and practice of doubt: there are doubts without, doubts within, doubts to-day, doubts to-morrow, so on to the end. They live doubtingly and die doubtingly. Only a few evenings since we attended a meeting of doubts, nearly all present were doubters; the presiding minister himself was a doubter, encouraged doubting,—he doubted and of course the people doubted. "Like priest, like people." Every one, male and female, that rose to speak were doubters, testified doubtingly—every one that spoke or prayed, spoke and prayed in doubts. Thus the meeting went on in doubts till the close—it was doubt in the beginning, doubt in ending—the meeting went on in doubts, and broke up in doubts; every one, doubtless, retired doubting, conversed on the way home doubtingly, retired to rest on doubts, slept on doubts, rose up on doubts.

Now this doubting meeting was only a specimen of all other similar meetings in this congregation. These same doubting meetings are continued from week to week, from month to month, from year to year. All their meetings for prayer, praise, testimony and exhortation, are made up of doubtings. Moreover, all the converts converted under their doubtings are converted to doubts, born into a kingdom of doubtings. Indeed, unless doubts are expressed, it is very doubtful whether or not the conversion is genuine! This doubting is not only a sure mark of sound conversion, but proof positive of the graces of modesty and humility!

Friends, what think you of this doubting process? this being born in doubts, living and breathing in doubts, preaching, praying, exhorting in doubts, living and dying in doubts? If we live a whole life of doubts and doubting, what surety have we of not dying in doubts and doubting on forever and forever in doubts? A beloved brother in the meeting of doubts alluded to, said, "he always had doubts, expected always to doubt, always to have doubts; he commenced his testimony doubting, and ended it in doubting, and no doubt he will leave the world doubting. Beloved, is not the thought fearful? Is there anything in God's word to substantiate this doctrine of doubts, or the least intimation given of its being well-pleasing in the sight of heaven? What the influence of a church of doubters on the world? on the minds and hearts of sinners? What the conclusion of the impenitent on hearing these doubters expressing their doubts, with long faces, and their heads bowed like a bulrush? each one crying out in his doubts, "O my leanness! O, my leanness! O wretched man, who shall deliver me from these doubts—the body of this death?"

Is the gospel a failure? Has Christ died in vain? We read, and impenitent sinners read in God's book, that religion is happifying, purifying—that it makes us hopeful, cheerful, joyful; that the gospel is good news, glad tidings of great joy; that Jesus Christ is a great Savior, glorious, mighty, perfect, complete—one that can save to the uttermost from all sin, all doubtings and fearings; that he came especially to destroy the works of the devil. Now ye doubters, by your doubtings what do ye do but give the lie to all this? stab the very vitals of God's truth? Still more, you bring an evil report upon this goodly land, discourage the people. How can you possibly dishonor God more than by this doubting? What sin more aggravating in the sight of Heaven than unbelief? and doubting is unbelief, and unbelief is doubting, a sin of all others the most damnning! It makes God a liar! It pierces the Son of God, opens his wounds afresh, drives the nails, points the spear. We have no more right to doubt than we have to swear falsely, steal, take God's name in vain, commit adultery, murder, or highway robbery—God forbids it. And still you flatter yourselves this doubting is quite harmless, even commendable, a sure mark of grace, modesty and humility. Was ever blindness so preposterous, so Heaven daring? There is not the slightest shade of apology in the Bible for doubting. God frowns upon it, consigns it to the pit bottomless. There was no sin Christ and his apostles rebuked so frequently and so severely as this same sin of doubting or unbelief. It's the poison of asps, the gangrene of hell, the very scum and bubblings of the pit! ruinous! O flee it as the serpent of serpents. Friends, doubting friends, what do you gain personally by these doubtings? Are you strengthened by them—built up in your most holy faith by these doubts? Are they refreshing to your soul? Rather do not these doubtings weaken the whole man, paralyze [illegible]? Is not this doubting a gangrene to the [illegible], a plague? a palsy? It eats [illegible] the life blood of Christian hope and [illegible] ... a man that is always doubting [illegible] his own salvation, is unprepared to point others confidently to "the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world." "Physician, heal thyself," presses upon him like an incubus; his heart faints within him, and one faint heart makes other faint hearts—one faint-hearted soldier on the eve of battle strikes fearfulness into a whole army, and defeats the battle. This is why God commanded Gideon to say to all the doubters or fearful ones in his army, "depart," till the whole number numbered only three hundred, and with these few whole-souled, courageous ones, the whole Midianitish army was routed, and a complete conquest gained.

"Our doubts are traitors,
And make us lose the good we oft might win,
By fearing to attempt."

This doubting has been the curse of all ages. The Israelites, by one single act of doubting, were forever excluded the promised land, and left to perish in the wilderness.

The command is everywhere, "be of a good courage, be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." Then "one can chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight." But what saith God to the doubting, the fearful, the unbelieving?

"Fearing always makes us weaker,
Strips us of our powerful shield—
Makes us cowards;—but the soldier,
True and faithful, will not yield.

Onward! then with bold endeavor,
Press thee onward, while you may;
Having Truth and Hope forever
For thy guardians by the way.

"Watchfulness."

Our Lord has laid down a principle by which we are admonished in reference to His coming, which Paul defines and determines to be when His kingdom shall come. To him who is waiting the glorious coming of the Holy One, the language of Jesus is potent, but there are many, very many, who, through educational prejudice, are taught to think peculiarly on this subject; and it is a fact notoriously true, that we are too apt to reject what is plain, and ambiguously couched in our language, so as to convey a widely different meaning than the text, or spirit of the text will allow. For the better illustrating of this truism, permit me to analyze the leading differences which distract the teachers of the present day.

By some it is confidently asserted, that there is no need to watch, for to them the time is fixed, unalterably fixed, the prophetic periods must terminate at such a time; ergo, there is no necessity for watching; others fail to see the necessity of watchfulness, for, say they, "the day of Judgment is all of three hundred and sixty-five thousand years distant from this time, hence, there is no need of my watching." Others will tell us the injunction of the Savior to watch has had its period of watching fulfilled, and the Lord came in 1843–44. And I might go on to enumerate the endless variety of opinions and shades of opinions on this subject that are current and have advocates,—time would fail me in the enumeration, and I am brought to consider the subject in its significant and Scriptural relation.

"If I go away I will come again." Mark the language; mark the time it was spoken; mark the speaker. Here Jesus does not state when, in plain terms, he will come again, but by other Scriptures we are led to the knowledge of certain events which precede and accompany His coming; these are the things in connection with the keeping of our hearts in the patient waiting for His glorious manifestation. We are exhorted to watch for and unto, lest, when He comes, He findeth us spotted by the world, and saying, "my Lord delayeth his coming." There are certain excesses to be guarded against in the world; "the pride of life" is one; and what is the pride of life? Its name is Legion! One of the pride manifestations of the human heart is, to be well thought of by our associates. This is truly seductive, and tends to death. Well, it is not popular to speak of the coming of the holy One, much less to talk of waiting and watching his coming; hence in spirit we say, "my Lord delayeth his coming."

Watchfulness implies expectancy. Enoch the seventh from Adam, prophesied of certain evil ones, who are to be punished when the Lord cometh: "Behold he cometh with ten thousand of his saints."—Deut. 33: 2; Jude's epistle 14th and 15th verses. Here I would state as an example of how the Prophets spoke of things yet to come, as though already past; "He calleth things that are not as though they were." It is well for us to bear this in mind when reading the Scriptures of truth where a prophecy is enunciated; and we prove it to be a prophecy when quoted by an apostle as something yet to have its fulfillment, or has had its fulfillment after its enunciation. Thus are we to compare "spiritual things with spiritual"—"there is one Spirit!" All this has a relative bearing on the act of watchfulness, lest, by mis-interpretation, we call "light darkness, and darkness light," to the doing of which a woe is applied. "What I say unto you I say unto all, watch!" Portentous are the words! august the personage that spoke them! perfect in character! the to-be-admired of all who love his appearing.

Friends, do we love his appearing? Are we of those who hope for eternal life and glory with power over the nations? We must remember if we hope such things, that in patience we must possess our souls, and commit our ways unto Him who wisely ordereth all things, and to him his word shall accomplish that whereunto it is sent, and that right speedily. Watch, therefore. Watch! let the watchword be.

The Light of the World.

God's real children are the lights placed by himself in this benighted world to enlighten it. It is true David recognizes the Word as a light to his path; but according to the Savior's teachings, as well as those of the Apostles, God's children are the temples, or vessels, which contain this Word, in connection with the other great luminous agent, his Spirit; consequently, while holding these two illuminating agents of the Almighty conjointly, they necessarily evolve light. Not that they try to shine; but containing two such powerful and divine principles, they involuntarily reflect a radiance, eclipsing by far the most brilliant diadem that e'er decked a monarch's brow.

Soon after his forty days' conflict with the Devil in the wilderness, Jesus manifested his power by works of love and mercy upon the afflicted of Galilee. Such was the character of his preaching and his power of healing, that great multitudes were induced to follow him "from Galilee and Decapolis, and Jerusalem and Judea, and from beyond Jordan." And as he saw them pressing towards himself, he ascended a contiguous mountain in order to accommodate this vast multitude with the opportunity of listening to the promises and instruction he was about to impart to his disciples. By the time this great sermon was concluded, this multitude could decide whether they would accede to such proposals of discipleship—whether they would be governed by laws thus stringent on the natural heart in order to secure eternal life. Christ allowed them to look into this mirror presented before his disciples, that they might decide whether they could possess a character answering to the one therein. Though the multitude was so great the disciples managed to be near their Master. Perhaps they felt a consciousness that the discourse was to be addressed to themselves: but more probably their ardent affection drew them close to the one they so tenderly loved.

How the warm and tender heart loves to gaze on the object of its affection! Almost involuntarily will the eyes rest on those we love. Jesus "lifted up his eyes on his disciples," and uttered nine particular declarations of blessedness called the Beatitudes. The next point in this memorable sermon is to teach them a lesson quite *un*natural to the natural heart. That is, when maligned and traduced, and when all sorts of slanderous reports are going the rounds about them, they must not allow the virus of anger to enter their heart, and thus cause them to deal out the same poison. No, they must not only appear complacent, but actually rejoice, not because the truth will finally become popular, and those that live godly in Christ Jesus cease to be persecuted, but because their reward would be great in the kingdom of heaven. Instead of sighing and pining over the loss of their reputation, they should be "exceeding glad" and "leap for joy." With his eyes still fixed on these devoted disciples, he positively asserts, "Ye ARE the light of the world." Observe, he does not say you may be, if you live up to your privileges,—you ought to be—it is your duty to be, or you may be when further advanced in the divine life, (for it is quite apparent they were only young converts when this declaration was made,) but speaks of it as a present matter of fact—"Ye are the light of the world!" What! young converts brought up without literary advantages, having always wrought with their hands to obtain their sustenance, and that too upon the fishing coasts of Galilee, a place, according to history and Scripture, proverbial for mental darkness, can they be the lights of the world? Yes, the Savior's word for it. These ignorant and unlearned fishermen have received the two great illuminating agents before mentioned, therefore they will give light to the world, whether they possess any particular power of oratory, eloquence or riches; being "filled with the Spirit" and word of God, they reflect a radiance valuable as it is beautiful.

But will the world concede this fact? Will they acknowledge such men enlighten the world? And why will they not? There are many worldly men whom we esteem as truthful; will not such own the fact? Nay, they cannot discern the fact, and of course cannot confess the same. Their eyes are closed, or, according to the Apostle, "the eyes of their understanding have not been enlightened."—Eph. 1: 18.

What is it that hinders men's minds from being enlightened, when God has set lights all around them? Let Paul answer.—"The god of this world hath blinded the minds of those which believe not." According to Jesus Christ's testimony, his real disciples do evolve light; and according to Paul, the reason why men do not see it is, because themselves keep something placed to eclipse the light. Now what, if the divine injunction is obeyed of placing the candle on a candlestick, in order that it may give light to all, and I persist in holding before my eyes an object of sufficient magnitude to wholly obscure that light? Though the light exist, what benefit can I derive from it until I remove the object?

According to the Savior's teaching, it appears utterly impossible for those to receive him who seek self-aggrandizement. Hear him; "How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another?"

In Matt. 6: 22, the Savior compares the eye to the affections or motives of the human heart. He shows that this organ of vision to the human body is what the motive or affection is to the understanding; hence the importance of having it clear, or, as the original implies, free from disease. Because, as is often the case when the eye is diseased, two or more objects may appear where there is but one, or appear in an opposite position from what it really occupies, or even the color may be changed. When this is the case, it of course brings confusion and darkness to the whole body. So when the mind is filled with the love of the world, spiritual things do not appear in their true light. It turns the right side down, and brings the wrong side up! It puts light for darkness and darkness for light. With the mental vision thus diseased, the stupendous value and wondrous plan of salvation cannot be appreciated—the future is dark and forbidding, filling the mind with fearful forebodings, etc. But the love of God lifts this sable curtain of the future, from whence looms up the beauty and glory of the resurrection of Christ's body, to die no more—to experience no more sorrow, either mental or physical.

"O hail, happy day!"

Reader, shall you and I share this glory? If we are the lights of the world, then the resurrection to eternal life will be ours. Let none attempt to excuse themselves by claiming they are too small to illuminate some little dark corner of the earth. Observe, the Master does not say whether we shall be a twelve-tubed chandelier, or a tiny candle, but he positively asserts that his disciples are LIGHTS! Having received God's illuminating agents (his word and Spirit) into our hearts, we may not put them under a bushel with impunity. The light will be extinguished by thus doing. Let the child of God deny Christ by one act, or refuse to confess the Lord Jesus with his mouth, and how long ere his love will wane, and he be lukewarm and thus become an abhorrence to the Lord. The idea of being a secret friend of God is entirely out of the question. If we are Jesus' disciples, we are like a city set on a hill which cannot be hid.

John Baptist was a burning and shining light, though the world might be unwilling to acknowledge him as such. Surely he did not shine by having had the opportunity of a classical education among the Rabbins, or having his person richly caparisoned, or sharing a grand outward equipage of any kind; but hypocrites were made to feel the power of his rustic eloquence, for a time, at least.

Possessing the same bold, uncompromising spirit of Elijah, he declared the word of God faithfully, reproving the covetous tax-gatherer and the fierce passion of the soldier, as well as the incestuous monarch on the throne! His power consisted not in any outward privileges, but in possessing much of that Spirit which Christ says his Father is more willing to give to them that ask, than earthly parents are to give good gifts to their children. The Burning-Heart Experience.

"They said, did not our hearts burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures!"—Luke 24: 32.

This sweet text is oft used to express the glowing joy of the heart, on listening to Jesus and basking in his love. Indeed, Jesus can never speak to his believing "little ones," without setting their souls all aglow. On this rich and heavenly theme I could gladly fill my column. But as others, with more space and leisure, will speak only of this one aspect of the text, it may be my duty to lay open the root of the matter, that has been so uniformly overlooked in christian experience.

The root of this living, glowing joy, lies in His talking to us, and "opening to us the Scriptures." "Beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures, the things concerning Himself . . . These are the words (said he) which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that ALL things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me."

The fact is, that the living word—the light of God—received into their hearts, dispersed their darkness as to the sufferings and resurrection of Christ, and the grand outline of prophetic truth, on to the consummation. Death was abolished, the devil was a liar, and stood before their faith confounded, and a conquered foe. Life and immortality were brought out into a clear and satisfactory light! and this light glowed in them. This light, radiating from Jesus, the center and sun of prophecy, was seen to shine on and on, till the Kingdom shall come, and the "earth is filled with the knowledge and the glory of God." The root of this is as makes the heart burn and glow.

"The Law, the Prophets and Psalms" are thus endorsed, re-issued and dispensed by our Lord, to furnish food for faith, and be his mind—"quick and powerful"—inspiring the same joy in other believers, on to the end of the world. The whole system of types in "the Law," was but "the shadow of good things to come"—"in the world to come," under the reign of Christ, and in "the kingdom to come."

The great burden of all prophecy, full nine-tenths of all the prophets and Psalms, remain to be fulfilled under the Messiah's reign, embracing the saints to be enthroned with him, and made "Princes in all the earth," while Israel and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.—Ps. 45; 67; 72; 90 and 98; 102; 132. Isa. 1: 24–27; 4: 2–6; 11: 1–16; 50 to 66. Jer. 3: 14–18; 23: 3–8; 30: 17–24; 31: 31–34. Heb. 8: 8–12. Ez. 36 to 38. Dan. 7: 14; 8: 13–19. Micah 3: 12 to 4; 1–10. Zech. 12 to 14. Many of these, and other parts of prophecy, are re-asserted in detail in the New Testament.—Acts 2: 14–36; 3: 21. Rom. 8; 11; 15: 8–12. 1 Cor. 15: 21–27. Heb. 1 to 12. 2 Pet. 3. Rev. 7: 1–8; 14: 1; 20: 1–8.

One acquainted with the world's history in general, or the history of down-trodden Israel in particular, must know that no event has yet transpired to fulfill the law (as a whole), or the sum of the Psalms or Prophets. The kingdom of Christ is yet to come. In that kingdom, the substance of the shadowy law, as well as the sum of the Psalms and prophets, will be enjoyed. The events foretold require time—"the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

This is "the sure word of prophecy," to which we do well to "take heed till the day dawn." But to the point—the heart-burning within us. What was the fuel that kindled the fire in these hearts? Some preachers among us, and about all of the most popular preachers around us, assume, and act on the principle, that the Prophets, Psalms, and types of the Law, will quench the fire—extinguish the light, and prostrate the soul, and leave each one, and every meeting, "half dead," like the poor Jew, among the thieves, at Jericho.

With all such, the Prophecies are below par. Action—earnest and prolonged—is needed. Feeling is essential. The more the better, if it is like that in our text.

Jesus created the right feeling by the Prophetic Scriptures. Those who "open" these neglected, and often proscribed, prophecies, act on the example of the Good Shepherd. But those who "are not fed" by such heavenly bread, may be like those who could not bear the word, when spoken by the Son of God! J. B. C.

Correspondence.

From L. M. Collins.

Bro. Grant:—Strange as it may seem to many—and some say that it is a miracle—I have been raised up from a sick bed, which reduced me so low, that my pulse was gone for three hours. To God be all the glory. I am now able to answer for myself in the language of one of old, "Here am I!" Yes, beloved in the Lord, I am here to give glory to Him who hears and answers the prayer of faith. Had it not been for the prayers of God's children, I think that I must have given up and gone down to the grave. "Praise the Lord, oh my soul; praise him for his loving kindness." Praise him, for his remembrance of myself and family; for in our deep afflictions we called upon our God, and found him, as we ever shall, ready to bestow the desired blessing. I was confident through all my sickness, (which was a number of weeks,) that I was having the prayers of God's living, acting, humble children; and even when people thought that I was dying, I believed that I should get well. My trust was in the Lord. I felt that I could safely trust in Him, for I had before found him in time of need. All ye that love the Lord, give him glory, for glory is his due.

We still love the coming of the Lord; we look upon it as near, very near, "even at the door." Amen, come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

Bath, N. H., March 20, 1859.

From L. H.

My Dear Brn. and Srs.:—Wherever you are, I hope you are prospering in your pilgrimage journey. Look up, ye saints of the Most High God! See the darkness disperse before your eyes, when by the eye of faith you catch a glimpse of the glory yet to be revealed, when saints shall all get home. O glorious day! when the Savior bids us come home. Shall we not be faithful? Methinks I hear you respond, yes! Praise the Lord that we are so near the end! Shall we not with patience continue looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works?

I have enlisted on board the old ship Zion, and I find that she is the best one that was ever launched out upon the ocean. I have tried her more than a year, and I find that she is more than was recommended to be.

"Cheer up, sailor, light breaks o'er thee,
Thou art near the promised land!
Zion's mount is just before thee,
On its height thou soon shalt stand."

"Alone in this Dark World."

BY H. L. H.

Air.—"I love the free ridge of the mountain."

Alone in this dark world of sorrow,
We wander oppressed and despised,
Awaiting eternity's morrow,
That soon in its glory shall rise.
We long for the time when the darkness and sadness
That shroud our dim pathway through earth will be gone;
We long for the hour that brings glory and gladness,
"The last lovely morning,"—O! when will it dawn!

On earth we are pilgrims and strangers,
By sorrows and trials opprest;
But trials, temptations, and dangers,
Shall cease when we enter our rest.
And then by the side of Life's pure, gushing fountain,
With all of the ransomed forever we'll dwell,
Or stand 'mid the glory that curtains that mountain,
Where joy's holy anthems eternally swell.

We long for those mansions of glory,
The home of the pure and the blest,
The theme of each seer's glowing story.
The kingdom of peace and of rest.
We long 'neath the shade of Life's fair tree to linger,
Sharing the joys that to saints shall be given,
And hear, as if swept by some angel's pure finger,
The harps of the blest breathe the raptures of heaven.

All's for the Best.

All's for the best! be sanguine and cheerful,
Trouble and sorrow are friends in disguise;
Nothing but folly goes faithless and fearful,
Courage forever is happy and wise,
All's for the best—if a man would but know it,
Providence wishes us all to be blest;
This is no dream of the pundit or poet,
Heaven is gracious, and—all's for the best!

All's for the best! set this on your standard,
Soldier of sadness, or pilgrim of love,
Who to the shores of despair may have wander'd,
A way-wearied swallow, or heart-stricken dove.
All's for the best! be a man but confiding,
Providence tenderly governs the rest,
And the frail bark of his creature is guiding
Wisely and warily all for the best.

All's for the best! then fling away terrors,
Meet all your fears and your foes in the van,
And in the midst of your dangers or errors,
Trust like a child, while you strive like a man.
All's for the best—unbiassed, unbounded,
Providence reigns from the east to the west,
And, by both wisdom and mercy surrounded,
Hope and be happy that all's for the best.

Hygiene.

"This is for your Health."—Paul.

Eating between Meals.

Whether we eat once, twice, thrice, or ten times a day, we should stop with our regular meals. Nothing containing nutriment, whether in a solid or liquid condition, should go down our throats between our meals, except water. To this rule, so far as the healthy are concerned, I know of no exception. May we not eat an apple, it will be asked, or a little fruit, of such kind as we happen to meet with, or a few nuts? Must we go without all these things, which the kind hand of the great Creator has scattered all along our path—probably not in vain? Would we not be even ungrateful to him, did we do so? No doubt that these things, for the most part, are made to be eaten, either by us or the other animals, or both. But they should be brought to our tables, and, without exception, made a regular part of our meals. Not indeed at the end, after we have eaten enough of something else; nor yet at the beginning, merely to excite an appetite for other food. They should be eaten as the potato usually is, as a part of our meal.

It may perhaps be said that our ancestors—puritanical though they were—accustomed themselves not only to lunches in the forenoon and afternoon, but to nuts and cider or apples and cider in the evening, and yet were a healthier people, by far, than their more squeamish descendants; and there will be no want of truth as the basis of the remark. But, remember, that if they were more healthy than we, then we, of course, are less healthy than they. How came we thus? Is it a matter of chance, or hap-hazard? Do these things spring out of the ground? Is there not a cause for every effect? Do we not inherit a deteriorated and deteriorating constitution? Besides, our fathers and grandfathers set out with better constitutions than we, so that, whatever may have been the cause of their better or our inferior stamina, they could most certainly bear up longer under violations of physical law than we, their descendants. It does not then follow, as a necessary inference, that we may eat lunches because they did.

May we not take nourishing drinks between our regular meals, such as milk and water, molasses and water, and bread coffee? some will ask. Not a drop. Better, by far, to eat a piece of dry bread, for that will be masticated. But you do not want either. The sediment of nutritious drinks is one of the hardest ordinary things the stomach has to contend with. It is, moreover, a curious fact that a piece of dry bread, well chewed, will often quench thirst better than any liquid, even water. But, I repeat, I do not recommend even that. Any thing that contains nutriment must, of course, set the stomach and other digestive organs at work, more or less; even if it is nothing but a strawberry, or a lump of gum or sugar, or some aromatic seeds. I do not say or believe that it takes as long, or tasks the digestive machinery as severely, to work up a lump of sugar or a strawberry into chyle, as a full meal; but I do say that the whole process of digestion, complicated as it is, must be gone through with.

Many, who have listened patiently to remarks like these, have at length exclaimed, with some surprise: "But what is the laboring man to do, especially in the long hot days of haying and harvesting, without something to sustain him between his meals? You proscribe stimulating drink, and very properly; but what will you propose as a substitute? He would faint away without something. Or, if he should not faint, there would often be a gnawing at the stomach, which would be insupportable." It should be distinctly known to everybody, that neither the faintness nor the gnawing here spoken of, indicate any real hunger. They are mere nervous sensations. They indicate, moreover, a diseased condition of the nerves. It is no uncommon thing to hear farmers telling how glad they are to be through with their haying and harvesting. But it is they who use lunches, or take other means beyond their regular meals for restoring themselves temporarily at the expense of the future, who complain most. He who eats of plain food twice or three times a day, and drinks nothing but water, endures best the heat and fatigue, and suffers least from gnawing and faintness.

Young men in groceries, eating-houses and inns, as well as clerks in public offices, and in shops and factories, often injure their health very much by a foolish acquired habit of tasting various things which are constantly before them, such as fruits, nuts, confectionery, sugar, dried fish, cordials, etc. Clerks, in addition to all this, sometimes eat wafers. It is but a few days since I saw a young man about thirty years of age, of giant constitution by inheritance, who was suffering severely in his digestive machinery from the very cause, by his own voluntary confession, of which I am now speaking. And I have before my mind's eye the painful history of a young man whom I twice cured of dyspepsia from this same cause, but who afterwards went beyond my reach and fell a victim to it.

Perhaps the worst violation of the law which forbids eating between meals, is found in the wretched habit of the young of eating what are called oyster suppers, at late hours and at improper places. Our cities, and sometimes our large towns, abound with places of resort for those who will not deny their appetites; and it is not surprising that they so often prove not only a pathway to the grave, but as Solomon says, to hell.—Dr. Alcott.

Mental Labor.

The injurious effects of mental labor are, in a great measure, owing to extensive forcing in early youth; to sudden or misdirected study; to the co-operation of depressing emotions or passions; to the neglect of the ordinary rules of hygiene; to the neglect of the hints of the body; or to the presence of the seeds of disease, degeneration and decay in the system. The man of healthy phlegmatic or choleric temperament is less likely to be injured by application than one of sanguine or melancholic type; yet these latter, with allowance for the original constitution, may be capable of vast efforts. The extended and deep culture of the mind exerts a directly conservative influence upon the body.

Fellow-laborer! one word to you. Fear not to do manfully the work for which your gifts qualify you, but do it as one who must give an account of both soul and body. Work, and work hard while it is day; the night cometh soon enough—do not hasten it. Use your faculties—use them to the utmost, but do not abuse them; make not the mortal to do the work of the immortal. The body has its claims—it is a good servant; treat it well, and it will do your work; it knows its own business; do not attempt to teach or force it; attend to its wants and requirements; listen kindly and patiently to all its hints, occasionally forestall its necessities by a little indulgence, and your consideration will be paid with interest. But task it, and pine it, and suffocate it—make it a slave instead of a servant; it may not complain much, but, like the weary camel in the desert, it will lie down and die.—Jour. of Physiology.

Walking and Pure Air.

Anaximines taught that air is mind. Some one else says air is the hidden food of life. Plutarch seems to incline to Anaximines' opinion, remarking that perhaps the reason why there is a sympathy of feeling on various subjects, arises from breathing the same air. Air is an exhalation of all the minerals of the globe; the most elaborately finished of all the works of the Creator—the rock of ages disintegrated and fitted up for the life of man. All classes of men affirm this. Sydney Smith says to public speakers, that if they would walk twelve miles before speaking, they would never break down. In English universities, boat races, horseback rides, and ten mile walks are a part of the educational means for physical development. Plato says a walk in the open air will almost cure a guilty conscience.—Emerson.

Forgiveness.—The brave only know how to forgive; it is the most generous pitch of virtue human nature can arrive at. Cowards have done good and kind actions—cowards have fought, nay, sometimes conquered; but a coward never forgave. It is not in his nature; the power of doing it flows only from a strength of soul conscious of its own security, and above all the little temptations of resenting every fruitless attempt to interrupt its happiness.

I. NONE RIGHTEOUS.

"There is none righteous, no, not one."—Rom. 3: 10

Such is God's description of the human family, of which you are a member.—"There is none righteous, no, not one." To be righteous, is to be innocent or sinless; and, of course, perfectly unworthy of punishment. Alas! how many contradict this inspired affirmation, fondly cherishing a belief of their self-righteousness, their entire virtue—deluding themselves into the notion that their "filthy rags" are a spotless robe of shining excellence, that will stand the scrutiny of the impartial Judge. Dear reader, are you thus self-deceived? When God asserts that you are unrighteous, be assured that such must be the case. He knows you far better than you know yourself; and he is not a man that he should lie. He is too kind to tell you anything but the truth. Try yourself by these tests:

First.—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." Can you solemnly declare that you have thus loved God ever since you became a responsible agent? Are you doing so at this moment? Has he ever been the source of your highest joy—the object of your supreme affection? Have you never, for an instant, given the homage to the creature, which was due only to the Creator? Have you never murmured at his arrangements in regard to your person, your circumstances, your family, or your friends? Have you never distrusted him, and forgotten to thank him for his abounding goodness? Examine your past life—examine your conduct for the past week—the past day—the past hour; yea, examine the present state of your heart, and if you are honest, you will not fail to acknowledge that you come far short of his glory.

Again. Apply this other test: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Can you say this law has never been transgressed by you in thought, feeling, word, or deed? Perhaps you have committed no gross offence against your neighbors; you may have done them no serious ill, but have you bestowed on them all the good you were bound to do? Have you, with untiring zeal, promoted their present and future happiness? Have you set before them a perfect example, and borne all their injuries without one resentful emotion? Have you seen all their excellences and attainments, without one spark of envy being kindled in your breast? You must plead guilty, if you will only speak what your conscience dictates. Put all these things together, and then reflect on what would have been your doom, had the Lord treated you as you deserve. If one sin is enough to lead you to death—to perdition—it is surely of the Lord's mercies that you are not consumed. How vain to think of reaching immortality and heaven by merits of your own! A thousand acts of piety and goodness cannot cancel one sin, just as paying twenty-nine out of thirty bills does not pay them all. What of this one—this solitary sin? If you have consciousness of but one, how shall you escape its condemning, death-meriting result? If you are wise, avow at once that you are guilty and undone; some one must save you, else you are as sure of perishing in Heaven's anger, as if you had already been burnt up in the all-consuming vengeance.

II. GOD'S GREAT LOVE.

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John 3: 16.

This is a glorious passage for a poor, undone, awakened sinner; it smiles on him most sweetly in the midst of his darkness and perplexity. The "world" referred to is the wide world of sinful men, of whom you are one. The expression, "the world," is the same as the human race, or family, contemplated as in a guilty, dying situation. Whatever is true concerning the whole world, is of necessity true concerning the reader, one of its members. What is true in relation to you, as a sinful man? This, that God loves you, since he loves all the race to which you belong. This love is not the love of approbation; it is the love of pity or compassion. Ah, there is nothing in you that can attract his approbation. You have lifted a high heart and a high hand against him; you have merited perdition—utter, endless excision from being itself; yet he regards you with sincere, self-originated, boundless commiseration. He is the Father, and you are the prodigal child, mentioned in the parable.—Luke 20. And how shall you estimate the proof and magnitude of Jehovah's love for your soul? He loves you, and he so loved you, as to give, not an angel, but "his only begotten Son", to shame, suffering, and death, for your deliverance. Behold the revelation of thy God's heart! Let your mind dwell on the words, "so loved;" especially ponder the "so," which has a meaning deeper than the unseen. How blessed it is, that a sinner like you can exclaim, "God loves me." Assuredly he has no desire that you should perish. Could he give you greater proof of his earnest wish for your present and future happiness, than by resigning his Son to the agonies of Calvary for you? Never, indeed, will you perfectly understand his love for your soul. But, oh, begin immediately to enjoy it, in all its fullness, and in all its freeness. You are welcome to enjoy it now, just as you are—without a moment's delay—without the shadow of a change. God loves you as a sinner—regards you tenderly as a sinner; and a sinner you are. All this may appear very strange to you, but it is the mystery of Heaven's compassion, that may well astonish you now, and will do so forever. His love for you is like an eternal, unfathomable ocean without a shore; enter the flood, and be quickened, refreshed, and ravished with inexpressible delight.

God has given his only begotten Son, that "whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." You are afraid of perishing—you would live forever, in joy, in the kingdom, with God and the Lamb: then the door of hope is opened wide before your eyes. "Whosoever believeth," shall not perish. What a precious word that "whosoever" is! It points, like a finger-post, directly to you; it bids you rise, and take refuge in the arms of Jesus. Nothing now is required than that you believe "in him," or what is said regarding Jesus in the word of truth. More particularly, that he is the exhibition of God's love to you, a sinner—that he has borne away your sins in his own body on the tree—that as a consequence of his sacrifice for sins, God is now no more needing to consign you to perdition, than if you had never committed a single transgression. Glorious news to a trembling soul! Look away from your cold heart, to the love of your Omnipotent Creator! Look away from your sin, to the living Savior, within the veil. It is death to contemplate yourself; it is life to behold the Lamb. Herein is love! Love, in spite of your sins—love, desiring to rescue you from your sins—love, waiting to return your first glance, and to thrill you with the joy of mercy, and the hope of immortality.

The Symbols.—No. 3.

[See Crisis No. 2.]

In my two former numbers, some leading facts were furnished, to show the succession of the symbolic empires in Daniel, Zechariah and Revelations. Their very nature, as all-conquering and prevailing powers of earth, forbade their existence, except as one succeeded the other. This fact may be read in every passage of Holy Scripture, where we find one of these powers characterized—for all are so characterized.—Jer. 25: 26–33; Dan. 2: 37, 38; Dan. 7: 23; 8: 7–9; Rev. 13: 7.

1. As the important question now relates mainly to the symbol in Rev. 13, I quote it in part: "The dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority." He makes war forty-two months, blasphemes them that dwell in heaven; "and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations." Thus this is the one prevailing power of earth, whose mouth is set against the heavens! By consequence, it can not admit of any form of contemporary power.

2. Some become confused by mingling this symbol with others, at different eras in the lapse of Roman time; and so making this apply only to the Papal Hierarchy, which is (when made distinctive) always feminine, as in Rev. 17. But mark! This mingling is all done down here, in our darkness. It is all voluntary and inferential on the part of those who so apply it; for when God or his angel would isolate the Romish church, it is not left to inference. Nor is it. He gives us then, "The woman and the beast that carrieth her." The distinction is most palpable; and it runs through all the language, symbolic actions and relations of the Roman civil and church organizations, as given in the symbols.

3. The symbol (Rev. 13: 1–10), the forty-two month beast that succeeds the dragon, is Rome—as Rome. It is taken as a whole system of Gentileism for the time there named. The symbol is masculine, like the four (Dan. 7,) from which it is combined. The lion, the bear, the leopard, and the most monstrous and nameless beast, were all symbols of that series of political organizations, inclusive of their religion. The Holy Ghost has thus generally given the symbol of the civil power, as it embodied and sustained the ecclesiastical. This is fact. Rome had its "Pontifex Maximus"—its Supreme Pontiff—long before the period of the Apostle's teaching. Yet the "dragon," as a symbol of Rome at that time, comprehended its "high priest—Pope or Pontiff," and the whole wide world's worthless religion with him! Thus it was with each of the "four;" for "Nebo and Bel," of Babylon, were their chief idols. As "Bel boweth down and Nebo stoopeth," Babylon goes down too! Church and State, in Babylon, were one great nationality, that existed for ages. Thus "Nergal Sharezer was Rab-Mag," the great magician of Babylon, like the "Pontifex Maximus," who was high priest of Rome—Pagan Rome. The Assyrian, and each succeeding Gentile administration, on to the Roman in the time of the Apostle, had its priesthood and established order of religion, as a part of its organization. Therefore we are bound to allow this principle, that pervades all the prophetic symbols, through thousands of years, its proper place in Rev. 13: 1–10. This symbol of Rome is masculine, like the four of Dan. 7.—all of which it embodies into one. Then I exhort all, at this point, to—

4. "Believe God!" Let the symbol alone; and let it represent Rome through its predicted period—forty-two months—1260 years. "The beast" is masculine, as in Dan. 7: 24, and is a symbol of that political system. The horns are masculine—"the ten kings." But, as in Dan. 7: 24, 25, the symbol of Rome embodies the ecclesiastical system, so did each of its predecessors, through all the time of their prophetic career. Thus all may see that we are on "The Word," in the channel of the symbol, and with the historic realities thus symbolized, through three thousand years.

5. The Romish church is thus proved not to be the subject of the symbol.—Rev. 13: 1–10. The great political organization—the ten kings of the Roman Earth, united under one general system of Roman Law and Religion—is the subject of this symbol. Thus we find one and the same rule observed through each of the symbols. The government—the organized administration—is the subject of the symbol. This, to me, clears away the clouds of mist and darkness from this prophecy. This class of undeniable facts and Scripture statements, let in the light of God on the whole of this imagery. It is Rome, inclusive of State and Church. But not the church, exclusive of the State, as most imagine.

6. The symbol (chap. 17,) presents Rome subsequent to the forty-two months, as it goes to the judgment; synchronizing with the two-horned beast.—Rev. 13: 11, 18. The seventh and last head directs it for "a short space." The Romish church is here separate from the State. It is a "woman" riding "the beast." The church is supported by the State. In symbol, the church can never be confounded with the State, because God has made them distinct in their nature, character and relations. "The woman" cannot be confounded with "the beast."

7. The fourth—the Roman Empire—reaches to the judgment.—Dan. 7: 9, 11. Hence it "is" Rome, all the time, as it undergoes all these phases—the dragon, ten-horned beast through forty-two months; and the two-horned, or scarlet-colored beast, indicates its closing dynasty. Therefore, the explanation, "was, is not, and yet is," applies to the last "head," during the "short space." To make Rome the subject of the fourth symbol, in the ancient prophets, that fills up the vision clear on unbroken to the judgment, and yet say it "is not" for a time, is to make the word "yea and nay." But the seventh head wounded to death "is not;" and when healed, it "yet is—an eighth of the seven, and goeth into perdition."

8. "The number of the beast is the number of a man." This is Bible proof that "the beast" is most distinctively the symbol of the administrator of Roman affairs. Hence, when "they worshiped the beast," they bowed to the Emperor—not to the empire. The Roman Cæsar was regarded a God; and, as such, was religiously worshiped. Thus this great fact sustains the plain reading of Scripture. "The number of the beast is the number of a man"—the last Emperor of the Roman earth.

Telescopic Views of Scripture.

[F]rom Fables of Infidelity.

To say, then, that the stars of the sky are actually innumerable, is only a cold statement of the plainest fact. Hear it in the language of one privileged to behold the glories of one out of the thousands of similar firmaments: "The mottled region forming the lighter part of the mass (the nebula in Orion) is a very blaze of stars. But that stellar creation, now that we are freed from all dubiety concerning the significance of those hazes that float numberless in space, how glorious, how endless! Behold, amid that limitless ocean, every speck, however remote or dim: a noble galaxy. Lustrous, they are, too: in manifold instances beyond all neighboring reality—beyond the loftiest dream which ever exercised the imagination. The great cluster in Hercules has long dazzled the heart with its splendors, but we have learned now that among circular and compact galaxies, a class to which the nebulous stars belong, there are multitudes which infinitely surpass it—nay, that schemes of being rise above it, sun becoming nearer to sun, until their skies must be one blaze of light—a throng of burning activities! But, far aloft stands Orion, the pre-eminent glory and wonder of the starry universe! Judged by the only criticism yet applicable, it is perhaps so remote that its light does not reach us in less than fifty or sixty thousand years; and as at the same time it occupies so large an apparent portion of the heavens, how stupendous must be the extent of the nebula. It would seem almost as if all the other clusters hitherto gaged were collected and compressed into one, they would not surpass this mighty group, in which every wisp, every wrinkle—is a sand-heap of stars. There are cases in which, though Imagination has quailed, Reason may still adventure enquiry, and prolong its speculations, but at times we are brought to a limit across which no human faculty has the strength to penetrate, and where, as now, at the very footstool of the secret THRONE, we can only bend our heads, and silently adore. And from the inner Adyta—the invisible shrine of what alone is and endures—a voice is heard:

"Hast thou an arm like God?
"Canst thou thunder with a voice like him?
"Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades,
"Or loosen the bands of Orion?
"Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his seasons?
"Canst thou guide Arcturus and his sons?*
"He telleth the number of the stars:
"He calleth them all by their names.
"Great is our Lord, and of great power;
"His understanding is infinite."†

Thus, nobly does Science vindicate Scripture, and display the wisdom and power of the Lord of Hosts, whose kingdom extends through all space, and endures through all duration. He who called these countless hosts of glorious orbs into being, is abundantly able to multiply to an equally incalculable number, the humble sands which line the oceans of terrestrial grace: the brilliant stars which shall yet adorn the heavens of celestial glory. All, of every nation, who shall partake of Abraham's faith, are Abraham's children. They are Christ's, and so Abraham's seed, and heirs, according to this promise.‡ When the great multitude, which no man can number, out of every nation, and tongue, and people, stand before the throne of God, and cause the many mansions of our Father's house to re-echo the shout, "Salvation to our God which sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb," the answering hallelujahs of the most distant orbs shall expound the purport of that solemn oath to Abraham and Abraham's seed: "By myself I have sworn, saith the Lord, because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me; that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed, as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore."§

It has long been known, that "one star differeth from another star in glory," and that the orbs of heaven shine with various colors. Sirius is white, Arcturus red, and Procyon yellow. The telescope shows all the smaller stars in various colors. Under the clear skies of Syria their brilliance is vastly greater than in our climate. "One star shines like a ruby, another as an emerald, and the whole heavens sparkle as with various gems."‖ But the discovery of the double and triple stars has added a new harmony of colors to these coronets of celestial jewels. These stars generally display the complementary colors. If the one star displays a color from the red end of the spectrum, the other is generally of the corresponding shade, from the violet end. For instance in θ^2 Cygni, the large star is yellow, and the two smaller stars are blue; and so in others, through all the colors of the rainbow. "It may be easier suggested in words," says Sir John Herschell, "than conceived in imagination, what a variety of illumination two stars—a red and a green, or a yellow and a blue one—must afford a planet circulating around either, and what cheering contrasts and grateful vicissitudes a red and a green day, for instance, alternating with a white one, and with darkness, must arise from the presence or absence of one, or other, or both, from the horizon."* But suppose one of the globular clusters—for instance, that in the constellation Hercules—thus constituted; its unnumbered thousands of suns, wheeling around central worlds, and exhibiting their glories to their inhabitants: "skies blazing, with grand orbs scattered regularly around, and with a profusion to which our darker heavens are strangers;" the overhead sky, seen from the interior regions of the cluster, must appear gorgeous beyond description." In the strictest literality it might be said to the dwellers in such a cluster, "Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw herself." The surrounding walls of such a celestial palace must seem indeed "garnished with all manner of precious stones." Sapphire, emerald, sardius, chrysolite, and pearl, must seem but dim mirrors of its glorious refulgence. Under its ever rising suns the gates need not be shut at all by day, "for there shall be no night there." That glorious place now exists, though far away.

But the Lord of these Hosts has said, "Behold, I come quickly." He will not tarry. A thousand times faster than the swiftest chariot, our Solar System and the surrounding firmament wing their flight towards that same glorious cluster in Hercules. As our firmament approaches, under the guidance of Omnipotent wisdom, it too must fly to meet our Sun, with a velocity increasing with an incalculable ratio. The celestial city will then be seen to descend from heaven. Once within the sphere of its attractions, our Sun and surrounding planets will feel their power. Their ancient orbits and accustomed revolutions must give way to the higher power. Old things must pass away, and all things become new. A new heaven, no less than a new earth, will form the dwelling of righteousness.

These are no longer the visions of prophecy merely, but the sober calculations of mathematical science, based upon a foundation as solid as the attraction of gravitation, and as wide as the existence of that ether whose undulations convey the light of the most distant stars; for, so surely as that attraction is efficient, must all the firmaments of the heavens be drawn more closely together; and as certainly as they revolve not in empty space, but in a medium capable of retarding Encke's comet three days in every revolution, must that retarding medium bring their revolutions to a close. "And so," said Herschell, casting his eyes fearlessly towards future infinities, "we may be certain that the stars in the Milky Way will be gradually compressed, through successive stages of accumulation, until they come to what may be called the ripening period of the globular cluster." Unnumbered ages may be occupied with such a grand evolution of celestial progress, beyond our powers of calculation; but will the changes of created things, even then, have come to an end? Hear again the voice, not of the prophet, but of the astronomer: "Around us lie stabilities of every order; but it is stability only that we see, not permanence. As the course of our enquiry has already amply illustrated, even majestic systems, that at first appear final and complete, are found to resolve themselves into mere steps or phases of still loftier progress. Verily, it is an astonishing world! Change rising above change—cycle growing out of cycle, in majestic progression—each new one ever widening, like the circles that wreathe from a spark of flame, enlarging as they ascend, finally to become lost in the empyrean! And if all that we see, from earth to sun, and from sun to universal star-work—that wherein we best behold images of Eternity, Immortality and God—if that is only a state or space of a course of being rolling onward evermore, what must be the Creator, the Preserver, the Guide of all!—He at whose bidding these phantasms came from nothingness, and shall again disappear;—whose name, amid all things, alone is Existence—I AM THAT I AM?

"Of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth,
"And the heavens are the works of thy hands;
"They shall perish,
"But thou shalt endure;
"Yea, all of them shall wax old, like a garment:
"As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed;
"But thou art the same,
"And thy years shall have no end.
"The children of thy servants shall continue,
"And their seed shall be established before thee."

—Psalm 102: 23.

"And I saw a new heaven, and a new earth;
"For the first heaven and first earth were passed away,
"And there was no more sea.
"And I, John, saw the Holy City, New Jerusalem,
"Coming down from God, out of heaven,
"Prepared, as a bride, adorned for her husband.
"And I heard a great voice, out of heaven, saying,
"Behold the tabernacle of God is with men,
"And he will dwell with them,
"And they shall be his people,
"And God himself shall be with them, and be their God."

For the Crisis.

Lines, on the Death of Mrs. Lucy Wentworth.

She is gone—our dearest mother,
She's sleeping in the grave;
Now her pilgrimage is over,
She's crossed life's troubled wave.

For nearly fifty years she cheered
Our father's heart and home;
Then cruel death approached, and laid
Our mother in the tomb.

Our father's heart is saddened now,
He shed's affliction's tears;
O, may the grace of God sustain
His lone, declining years!

We miss her presence everywhere,
And earth looks sad and drear,
When forced to think that here no more
We'll meet our mother dear.

But oft we look to that bright morn,
When the dead saints shall come
From out their dusty beds, to dwell
In Eden's happy home.

For then we'll meet our loved, our lost,
Where parting is not known;
With her to praise our Savior, King,
Forever round His throne.

For the Crisis.

"Love One Another."

"Dear me! Why don't people love one another? They would be happier, by far, if they would. But I am poor, or so situated I cannot help other folks—have just all I can do to get along, and provide for my own." But really, man, how much poorer would you be at the year's end, for speaking a word of kind sympathy to the afflicted, and obliging your neighbor when he stands in need of your assistance; or at least by the benignity of your countenance, and by an affectionate demeanor generally, prove to him that you feel nothing but kindness towards him?

If unable to give time or money, give what will enrich you both, viz., your sympathy and prayers. "But he is heretical in his religious faith, and I do not wish to encourage him in this heresy." But what good will that proud look, supercilious mien, and that contemptuous curl of the lip, do towards reclaiming such from their wanderings? Or what will that cold, restrained manner, that distant recognition, especially when surrounded by those who understand former appearances, effect towards making him feel that you earnestly desire his salvation?

A kind, conciliatory manner, is certainly one of the most efficient letters of introduction to the truth that was ever composed,—will be likely to gain for it a quicker, surer, and more permanent acquaintance, than a harsh, austere, or rigid mien. And then if we really feel the truth chanted by the angels on Jesus' natal day, "good will toward men," we must make it manifest, or of what value are such emotions? We might add emphatically, with the wise man, that "open rebuke is better than secret love."

Then let us commence, from this moment, to manifest more love, not only to mankind generally, but right in our own family, and see if life is not eased of half its burden. True as you live, husband, wife and children will appreciate kindness as much as higher dignitaries, outside of the family. Children should feel that parental authority is absolute, but let them also realize that it has for its motto love. Just as far as parents manifest irritability, just so far they lose power over their children. Kind words, and an affectionate look and manner, cost nothing, and they do a great deal of good. Then why not make use of them always? When I see people peevish, morose, or sullen, I wonder, and feel desirous to ask them why they indulge in this demoniacal spirit, that makes themselves miserable, and spreads a blight over the happiness of all with whom they come in contact?

If they only live for this world, they would be happier, by far, to cultivate a sweet urbanity of manners. But for those that have any idea of entering the kingdom of heaven, to be sour and morose is a paradox I could never understand. Why, if they could get there, how wretched they would make every body, just as they do here. I am satisfied that, to secure happiness to ourselves, we must love our fellow-beings. It is the second command in the decalogue, and, joined with the first, supports all the law and the prophets.

Correspondence.

From F. Douglas.

BRO. GRANT:—Having been an attentive reader of the "Crisis" for more than a year, and feeling greatly benefited by the perusal of the editorial and voluntary contributi[ons] it has contained from week to week; being prompted by a sense of duty to pu[b]licly acknowledge the benefits thus received; I have undertaken to indite some thoughts that have been, and may be, presented to my mind, while reflecting upon the position of yourself and numerous correspondents relative to the doctrine of "man's non-immortality," "unconscious state of the dead," and the "personal reign of Christ" during the Millennium.

My religious belief previous to Dec., 1857, was, that God breathed into the nostrils of organic Adam an active, incorruptible principle, that could and would exist throughout eternity, in a state of happiness or misery, after the organic had assumed its native form. This "active principle" has several theological [illegible]; such as immortal soul, [illegible] or the Doctrine of deathless spirit, etc. From the frequ[ency] with which these terms were used, (and now) I supposed they were repeatedly used in the Bible; yea, I, like many others, felt sure I had read them in the Book divine. I firmly believed that at death the soul or spirit of the righteous entered heaven's portals, there to bask forever in the sunli[ght] of God's love; while that of the wicked passed into the regions of the damned, there to writhe in anguish under the scorchings of an endless hell. I frankly confess I have often asked myself whether a [just] being would thus afflict any of his creatures; yet I believed it was taught in the Bible, and the Bible was God's revealed will to man.

The "second coming of Christ" I considered a subject that none should pry into, and a mystery, which would remain such till the end of time. My religious associations commenced with the Methodists, with whom I remained several years; but, owing to changes of residence, and contentions among the brethren, I came to the conclusion to let religion alone, and had been in this state some time, when, in the providence of God, I was permitted to hear Eld. C. B. Turner preach upon the prominent doctrines advocated in the columns of the "Crisis." I went a prejudiced hearer but the earnest, impressive manner of the speaker, as he presented passage after passage, and chapter after chapter (all Bible) to substantiate his views, aided by the "Holy Spirit," wrought a change in my mind. I saw myself in a backslidden state, and very soon my whole moral being panted for life! eternal life! and ere long I was rejoicing under the influence of God's quickening grace. The Bible unfolded to my view new truths, beautiful and soul-stirring. I felt a burden for sinners, which robbed me of sleep; and the words of Christ, "preach my gospel," rang in my ears. The result of all these influences is, (after struggling with self and the opposition of friends,) I have enlisted in the name of Christ in the army of truth against sin and error, notwithstanding orthodoxy cries out, Heresy! Infidelity!

Has philosophy solved the problem of man's creation, fall and death? Have the revelations of spirits solved life's mystery, and added to the general knowledge and usefulness of mankind? Is the world improving in morals, to say nothing of "holiness to the Lord?" Do the signs of the times indicate the speedy conversion of the world? Do they not rather foretell Christ's glorious coming and the saint's final triumph? Ah! the Book of books is the only beacon light that will safely guide the pilgrim mariner o'er life's rough ocean. The billows of affliction at times almost overwhelm him, and his frail bark has many narrow escapes from shipwreck on the shoals of unbelief and [illegible] despair. Christ Jesus, the true light of the world, and the great [illegible] of the valleys, plains and mountains of [illegible], is (by the Father) [illegible] to lead [illegible] as seek his guidance and protection to the haven of eternal rest.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS. WHOLE NO. 188.

For the Crisis.

Travels and Labors.

Having a little leisure time, I will pen a few thoughts concerning my travels and labors. I arrived here yesterday, P. M., on my way home from Jersey county. I held a meeting here last evening, in a school-house. Full house, and very attentive congregation. Gave them a discourse on immortality through Christ. Words seem to find a lodgment in some hearts. Pray the Lord the seed may grow. There has been a large company of believers in this vicinity. Only a few left. They have moved into different parts of the West. And some that remain have lost their interest. This is the result of not having laborers sufficient to keep up regular preaching. We need more faithful laborers in this wide field. We have to leave the flocks almost destitute—without a shepherd. All know the result of a little company of believers, left in that way. Nevertheless, a few are able to breast the storm, and stand amid the opposing elements.

I will give your readers a brief sketch of my tour since I left home, four weeks ago, that they may know what a satisfaction it is to travel in mud. I left my family in health, Feb. 17th, on horse-back—there is no traveling with carriages—and Sunday morning, at 11 o'clock, I arrived at Bro. Raymond's, Brown Co., a distance of thirty-five miles. More than two days, yea, nearly three days, I was traveling, to gain that distance. You can judge the kind of traveling, without my describing it. If this was the only tour, wading through I could get along with it very well; this is only an index—a shade darker—of the traveling for the last year, in this part of the State—and I think this a fair sample of the most of it; it has been worse than a quag-mire for the last year. We hope it will get better some time.

I gave one discourse, in the evening, to the people in Mt. Pleasant. A good congregation, and attentive hearers. This is the place where Bro. Chandler held a series of meetings. Quite a number came out on the side of truth. May the good work continue. I started Monday morning for Pittsfield, Pike Co., a distance of thirty-two or more miles, through the mud. I arrived at Bro. Cooper's on Wednesday. Bro. Cooper is an Eastern man, and has been in the faith for a number of years. I concluded I had [illegible] enough meeting of [illegible] from home. [illegible] I left my horse at Bro. Smith's, in this place—a true friend to the cause of truth—some seven miles from the Illinois river. The second day I went to the river, and succeeded in getting on a boat. I found it much more pleasant floating on the muddy [illegible], than wading in all mud.

Just at dusk the boat brought up to [illegible], my stopping point. I hastened to find Abram—a son of the ancient Abram, the faithful—knowing his house to be a good pilgrim's home, and the door-strings never pulled in. I met him and Bro. Lewis, who were on the look-out, and soon were enjoying a social chat with his kind family. Bro. Brown and wife are the only believers in this place. He is like Lot, in Sodom, for the place is none too good.

The next morning (Sunday,) we walked out to Gullam, a distance of seven or more miles, to meeting. I held meetings in that place some two weeks, when we could have the house, and weather would permit. The weather was unfavorable, and still mud a plenty. Truth is taking quite a hold on some. A number of stable men have come out on the side of truth. The word is like leaven, working on the minds of the people. And some of the preachers act very much like Saul, on his way to Damascus. They oppose with their might. I will give a brief sketch of an interview I had with two. They had agreed beforehand, so I afterwards learned, if they had an opportunity to converse with us, they would insult us. The one that did the talking, called himself a Unionist. He asked Bro. Waggoner, who was with me, what he believed, and his reasons, etc. Bro. W. began to give his reasons for his faith in Christ's coming to set up his kingdom. "O," says he, "the kingdom was set up eighteen hundred years ago," and quoted Dan. 2. "The stone was cut out at the first advent, and had been smiting and breaking in pieces the image ever since, and would soon convert the world." I asked him if he understood that this dashing, breaking in pieces, and conversion of sinners—were synonymous terms? If so, where he would find a parallel text. He answered: "I see you are a quibbler; you are for playing on words. Just what I expected of you." This was the first of my speaking on the subject. I took out my Bible and read Dan. 2: 44; Ps. 2: 8, 9. He remarked, "They were not parallel texts, and he would have no man run from one text to another, if they talked with him." That I had taken out my Bible with a great deal of dignity to correct him, and [illegible] word dash was not used in Dan. 2. [illegible] you are wrong, and give up the argument." I remarked, the word dash [illegible] not used in Dan. 2; but smite was [illegible], and breaking the image in pieces was [illegible] of being smitten, and I understand [illegible] was synonymous with Ps. 2: 9. [illegible] you are wrong, and give up the [illegible]," said he, "or confine yourself to [illegible]." "Very well, said I, I will confine myself to Dan. 2. I read, "And the [illegible] kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise." This fourth kingdom breaks in pieces all other kingdoms. Shall I understand this fourth Roman kingdom, when it is said to break in pieces all other kingdoms, it converted them all to Christianity? "I will answer a fool according to his folly." But he did not answer. I was about to say, I never took an insult from a christian, for I knew a christian would never intentionally insult any one. Hence, when they used insulting language, I always attributed it to their ignorance, and passed it by without notice. But I answered him on this wise: I am a stranger here, and here are some half a dozen individuals standing by and listening to our conversation. I do not know whether they are professors or unconverted persons. Provided they are unconverted persons, what kind of an idea will they be likely to form of christianity, to hear those that profess to be servants of the meek and lowly Jesus use such language? I think they will form a very poor opinion of such religion. I dreamed the night before of a little contemptible cur snapping at my feet. I thought it was a very complete fulfillment. And such ministers expect to convert the world. What consistency!

There has been much preaching against the truth, in that region, but the tide is turning. I had the pleasure of forming a small church while there, and Bro. Nubury was chosen as pastor. Bro. N. has been a preacher, connected with the Baptists. He has held many of the Advent views for some time. In consequence of their treatment towards the Advent friends, he left them recently. He is a man highly esteemed, and will be a great help to the little flock and that community. I have no doubt, as they have firm and stable men, by the blessing of God, there will be a prosperous church found waiting for the return of their Master.

I stopped with Bro. Waggoner the most of the time while in that region. Bro. W. has been an Advent believer for some years. He was a pioneer in the anti-slavery cause when Lovejoy was killed in Alton, just below where he resides. He has had to take the front of the battle in the last great message to the world. His health is poor, and his family has recently passed through deep affliction. They have lost a son and his wife recently. I preached his funeral sermon the Sunday before I left. May the Lord sustain them.

I left his house on Monday last, came down to Bro. Brown's to take boat. The winds being high that night, the boat did not get along until sunrise the next morning. We, (Brn. Lewis and Brown were with me,) walked the levee all night. It was the only way we could keep warm. Rather a tedious night's labor, but it is only sharing a part with those who have gone before. I succeeded in getting through in time to fill my appointment at this place, last night.

Return of Spring.

God shield ye, heralds of the Spring,
Ye faithful swallows, fleet of wing,
Houps, cuckoos, nightingales,
Turtles, and every wilder bird,
That make your hundred chirpings heard
Through the green woods and dales.

God shield ye, Easter daisies all,
Fair roses, buds, and blossoms small,
And ye whom erst the gore
Of Ajax and Narciss did print,
Ye wild thyme, anise, balm and mint,
I welcome ye once more.

God shield ye, bright embroider'd train
Of butterflies, that on the plain
Of each sweet herblet sip;
And ye, new swarms of bees, that go
Where the pink flowers and yellow grow,
To kiss them with your lip.

A hundred thousand times I call
A hearty welcome on ye all;
This season how I love—
This merry din on every shore—
For winds and storms, whose sullen roar
Forbade my steps to rove.

The Night of Adversity.

In this world why should we be sad because life is not an unbroken, unclouded day of sunshine? Night has its uses; it prepares us to enjoy the choral hymn of re-waking nature; it wakes into life the bright stars, which pale before the streaking light of day.

Why should we faint and pine in the night of adversity? It brings into exercise graces which do not appear in the sunshine of prosperity. It strengthens right principles in a way that prosperity never can. It shows what we really are, which prosperity cannot do. When in heaviness for a season, there is a benevolent reason for it.—a need be; it is to benefit us; it is to cure us of sin, or prepare us for some important service in the cause of religion.

What shall thaw the cold heart of the church and melt the ice-bound current of its veins, and cause the streams of beneficence to flow in all the arteries and veins of the boy? The presence of the Holy Spirit kindles the flames of benevolence in the heart, and before it avarice fades away like snow-flakes before the vernal sunbeams. A genuine religion has its life's blood in God's beneficence. Practical benevolence in the church is essential to the vitality and purity of religion.

☞ Although man cannot repent and shun evil, and much less do good, of himself, yet he can do all this from the power which is continually given him by the Lord.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, APRIL 13, 1859.

The Spirit.—No. 2.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

In our endeavor to ascertain the meaning of ruakh, the word rendered spirit in the Old Testament, with two exceptions named in our last, we will begin with its first use in Gen. 1: 2. "And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the (ruakh) Spirit of God, (Septuagint,—'a breath of God,') moved upon the face of the waters." In this example, the Spirit is evidently the Holy Spirit "which proceedeth from the Father." By means of this, God exerts his power, while he remains in heaven, "his habitation." By this Spirit, or influence, he is omnipresent, and searches all things. Man conveys power in a similar manner, when he controls his mesmeric subject at a distance; and so do the demons, when performing through their mediums; but their agent is the antagonist of God and his Spirit, and leads to destruction.

The second example is in Gen. 3: 8. "And the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the (ruakh) cool (marg. wind) of the day." Here we have ruakh used to represent the air in motion, producing the gently cooling breeze, so refreshing and pleasing in the agreeable temperature.

The third case is in Gen. 6: 3. "And the Lord said, "My (ruakh) Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years." The Septuagint renders this passage, "My breath must not continue in these men, to this age, because they are flesh." In our translation, the word Spirit, in this example, refers to the Holy Spirit, which is employed to "reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." If we adopt the Septuagint rendering, it would refer to "the breath of life," which was to be taken from them at the flood.

The fourth example is in Gen. 6: 17. "And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh wherein is the (ruakh) breath of life, from under heaven; and everything that is in the earth shall die." In this passage, ruakh plainly represents the breath in the nostrils of the living creatures.

Fifth. Gen. 7: 15. "And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the (ruakh) breath of life." This needs no comment.

Sixth. Gen. 7: 22.—"All in whose nostrils was (ruakh) the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land, died." From these examples, we see that this breath of life is common to all animals, and we here assert, it is never represented as the conscious, accountable part of man.

Seventh. Gen. 8: 1.—"And God remembered Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattle that was with him in the ark; and God made a (ruakh) wind to pass over the earth; and the waters assuaged." Here we have ruakh rendered wind, and wherever we find the word wind in the Old Testament, it is in every case from this word. It is rendered thus ninety-seven times.

The next passage where ruakh occurs is in Gen. 26: 35. "Which were a grief of (ruakh) mind unto Isaac and Rebekah." The marginal reading is,—"bitterness of spirit." Ruakh, in this example, is used in its third sense, and represents "a state of feeling." It is thus used several times.

In the next example, it is used in the same sense. Gen. 41: 8. "And it came to pass in the morning, that his (ruakh) spirit was troubled; and he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof; and Pharaoh told them his dream."

The next in order is in Gen. 41: 38. "And Pharaoh said unto his servants, can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the (ruakh) Spirit of God is?" This was said with reference to Joseph. Ruakh is here used in its second sense, representing the Holy Spirit, or influence from God.

The last in Genesis is found in chap. 45: 27. "And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them; and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the (ruakh) spirit of Jacob their father revived." In this example, (ruakh) is used in its third sense. It seems Jacob was in a state of feeling which is often denominated "low spirited," because his beloved son Joseph had been taken from him in his old age; but when he became satisfied that he was alive, he was very much revived in his feelings, and became joyful in spirit.

We have now examined the first eleven examples of the use of ruakh, and found three of its four uses, to wit: the Holy Spirit, a state of mind, and the air, or breath of life; but we have found nothing about an immortal spirit belonging to man, existing as man when the physical organism is dead.

Wayside Gleanings.

Our last tour among the mountains of Vermont was one of interest, as our visits have all been in that region. We know of no field better prepared to receive the glorious truths of the gospel, than this. The people are noble-hearted and generous, willing to sacrifice for the cause of truth when they see it. They are frank, confiding, and faithful towards their friends, manifesting more of the primitive spirit of good New England society, than we have been accustomed to meet. This field is white for the harvest, and faithful laborers will hardly find a better opportunity for doing good. The people call for realities; they have been fed with fables till almost famished. Now they may give us the truth, and it sufficeth us.

The church in Poultney is growing in grace and love of God. The opposition is sufficient to keep them bright and strong. One of the ministers said in his pulpit, when speaking of the sleep of the dead, that he would not believe such a monstrous doctrine; he would sooner curse the Bible and rid himself of the world. "Some," he said, would run and run after such infidelity, till it was pasted and plastered on." Again, he said, "Some would swallow this black infidelity as greedily as a black snake would a chicken." He "would rather have Spiritualism or Mormonism in his church than such a doctrine," etc., etc. He has now left the place, and another, who has been much opposed to our meetings, is about leaving. For some reason, no one gets a blessing in opposing the great truths which the Lord has seen fit, in his good pleasure, to show his children in these last days; truths once preached by Jesus and his apostles, but long since buried by the Papal hierarchy, who substituted in their stead heathen philosophy, which Protestantism has remodeled, revised, and palmed-off upon community as the doctrine of the Bible. Thank the Lord, some have their eyes open to see the difference between "vain philosophy" and plain truth.

Seventy have been baptized, and several others are waiting the next opportunity. The cause of the Lord is steadily advancing in this place. Our social meetings are excellent—seldom less than sixty testimonies in an hour. We preached twice in the Methodist church at Castleton, and baptized one from that place, who was converted during our discussion with H. P. Cutting, on the subject of universal salvation. The truth is taking strong hold in this place. The discussion has opened the eyes of many, and led them to examine the Bible more carefully, to know what it does teach; and, to their utter astonishment, they cannot find one word about an "immortal soul," or that the wicked will live eternally in torment. We are to preach at C—— Lord's day, April 10th.

The discussion at Sandy Hill. This has awakened considerable interest in a very sectarian community. The people have been determined to keep out everything that would not favor the popular theology of the day, but we think the battering-ram of truth has made some visible holes in their sectarian walls, that they can never again repair. Mr. Walker, our opponent, is a prominent Spiritualist, who takes an active part in theoretical and practical Spiritualism. He labored hard to prove that man is not "wholly mortal," and dependent on Christ for his immortality; but found the Bible arrayed against him at every turn, and standing like the rock Gibraltar, when assailed by a boy's pop-gun. The only important witness on the side of our opponent was the one who said to our first parents, "Ye shall not surely die"; but as we were able, by the very best authority, to impeach this witness, and prove him a liar, even in this very first declaration to our race, it left our friend Walker without any aid but his own "reason," which was not a match for the wisdom and truth of the Lord, as revealed in his word. When a man sets up his "reason" against the Bible, it makes us think of a little dog we saw running and barking with all his might to head off and stop the ponderous steam engine, when thundering along at the rate of about thirty-five miles an hour.

While at Sandy Hill, we stopped at the hospitable home of Eld. Joseph Parry, who has recently embraced the doctrine of life only through Christ, and, as a consequence, has received excommunication from his brethren in the ministry. He is resolved, by the help of the Lord, to suffer all things for the truth's sake, and enjoy the smiles of his heavenly Master. His is a happy family, occupying one of the most pleasant locations on the banks of the noble Hudson. He is now prepared to preach the word of life, untrammeled by sectarian hand-cuffs and fetters. May the Lord sustain and bless him, and give him, with his dear family, a home in the paradise of God.

☞ The best way yet discovered to get along with men of a contentious and quarrelsome spirit, is not to quarrel with them, and avoid as far as possible any notice of their offensive attacks. A quarrelsome man fails of his end, and soon gets discouraged if he cannot provoke resentment. The selfish and unregenerate man may think it mean and cowardly to permit an unjust and injurious act to pass unnoticed; but he who can put away from his heart every feeling of resentment, and can look with real pity upon the man who is seeking to injure him, has by the divine mercy attained to a much higher and truer manhood.

O, What Waste!

When we look at the amount of hard-earned money which is worse than wasted to gratify the pernicious habit of using tobacco, it truly makes us mourn over poor fallen humanity, and sigh for the Life-giver to return and establish his pure and holy kingdom. When will men cease from self-destruction, and from wasting their money in the purchase of that which destroys health, peace and happiness?

Please read the following, from one of Geo. Trask's excellent tracts on tobacco.

AMOUNT AND COST OF TOBACCO.

It is well for the common peace that the enormous tax paid for this article is self-imposed. If its victims were compelled to use it, and pay for it, the world would be filled with rebellion forthwith.

Many a young man in fashionable life pays more for this than for his board-bill. Many a mechanic will die, and leave his family without a cent, who pays more for this than the cost of a Life Assurance of two thousand dollars.

Reader, you pay, for example, six cents a day for cigars. Continuing this forty years, with interest, amounts to $3,378.22. Or, you pay twelve cents a day,—this amounts to $6,746.44.

Says Professor Fowler: "A young man from ——— wished to purchase books on Physiology and Health, but said he was not really able. I asked him about his habits—if he chewed? No. Do you smoke? Yes. How much? He said that formerly he smoked fourteen cigars a day, at about two cents for each, which made over eighty dollars per year, but that his health was so much deranged that he had reduced his allowance to seven. I told him this cost him forty dollars per year, which he expended not only uselessly, but in those things that tended to shorten life as well as to destroy his usefulness while he lived."

Says Dr. Alcott: "I have known many a poor family that consumed, in smoking and chewing, at least twenty-five cents a week. This, in forty years, would amount to $520; or, if placed at compound interest, from year to year, to more than $2,100."

An editor of a public Journal observes: "When we consider the universality of the use of tobacco, and the fact that some men spend $10, $60, or $100 yearly for cigars, —if this town uses twenty per cent. less than the average, $9,000 is devoted to the weed yearly; about twice what we raise by tax for Schools; about enough to build the High School house, about which we tobacco-chewers have quarrelled so much; enough to buy a twenty-five cent delaine dress for each adult female in town, a pair of boots for each lad, and a five-dollar bonnet for each lass in town; to pay the salary of all our ministers, and cover all our contributions for benevolent purposes."

The city of New York, according to the authority of McGregor, consumes $10,000 a day on cigars, and but $8,500 on bread.

NATIONAL COST.

Cost of Cigars. It is estimated that there are 1,400 cigar manufactories in this country, employing 7,000 hands. Assuming that each manipulator makes 2,500 cigars in a week, which is as few as he can live by, the total per week is 17,500,000; and, in a year of forty-eight weeks, the number amounts to 840,000,000. At seven dollars per thousand, the valuation of this quantity is $5,040,000, and adding fifty per cent. profit of jobber and retailer, the total is $7,560,000. Adding the sum paid for imported cigars, $6,184,364 (which is much below the mark), and the whole is $13,744,364. Putting the smokers at five millions, and giving each consumer but 225 cigars a year, it is safe to say that the annual expenditure in this country for this luxury is thirty millions of dollars! Add to this the amount spent for chewing and smoking tobacco, and snuff, five millions, and we see that there is an enormous expense in this line. This sum total would support more than one hundred of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Says Dr. Coles, the American Churches pay five million dollars, annually, for this poison, in all its forms, and less than one million for the Gospel in foreign lands.

THE AMOUNT ON THE GLOBE. The present annual production of tobacco has been estimated by an English writer at 4,000,000,000 pounds! This is smoked, chewed, and snuffed. Suppose it all made into cigars, one hundred to the pound, it would produce 400,000,000,000. Four hundred billions of cigars!

Allowing this tobacco, unmanufactured, to cost, on the average, ten cents a pound, and we have $400,000,000 expended every year, in producing a noxious, deleterious weed. At least one and a half times as much more is required to manufacture it into a marketable form, and dispose of it to the consumer. If this be so, then the human family expend, every year, one thousand millions of dollars in the gratification of an acquired habit, or one dollar for every man, woman, and child, upon the earth!

This sum would build two railroads around the earth, at a cost of twenty thousand dollars per mile, or sixteen railroads from the Atlantic to the Pacific! It would build one hundred churches, costing $10,000 each; or half a million of school-houses, costing $2,000 each; or one million of dwellings, costing $1,000 each! It would employ one million of preachers and one million of teachers, giving each a salary of $500! It would support three and one third millions of young men at college, giving each $300 per annum for expenses!

Friendly reader, consider the above basis of this calculation in some measure imaginary—call it conjecture, extravagance, just what you please! Cut these figures down one half—cut them down to suit your own notions. Even then, if you are a Christian or Patriot, a Friend of God or Man, you will not trifle with this stupendous iniquity; but in some manly way do your part to arrest its destructive power around you.

REMEDY.

Reader,—1. Never use it yourself. 2. Banish it from your families and premises. 3. Purify the church. 4. Rebuke the manufacture and sale of it. 5. Look after schools, and save the young. 6. Sign and circulate this pledge: I hereby pledge myself to abstain from the use of Tobacco, in all its forms, totally and forever.

Infidelity-Killer.

"I advertised the 'Fables of Infidelity' as follows: 'We have advertised in our daily papers 'pain-killer,' and 'cramp-killer;' but I have to offer you an Infidelity-killer. Infidelity is worse than pain in the head, or cramp in the stomach, or rheumatism in the knee joints; and if you are troubled with it, unless your moral constitution is so impaired as to place you beyond hope, if you will read it, and at the same time exercise a little common sense, it will effect in you a speedy and permanent cure.'

The books on infidelity were all taken that night."—Letter from Eld. A. Ross.

The above is but one of the many favorable opinions expressed concerning this volume. Within the last week a preacher told me he would not part with his copy for one hundred dollars if he could not get another.

God's Ways Mysterious.

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps on the sea,
And rides upon the storm."

And also the sunshine, the flower, and all the beautiful things of earth; for no one can deny that there are on earth some traces of loveliness still, undoubtedly to inspire a love for the beautiful, even the glory that will be revealed to the favored heir of an Eden restored. Through them we have a glimpse of the perfection of a perfect earth, as it has existed, and will again when the restitution of all things, spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets, shall take place. God has many preachers besides flesh and blood, and some of them will reach every heart; they may resist, but they must feel, and it might be the angel of mercy to lead them to purity, to peace,—in other words, to Christ.

When I was a child, when the pain of an endless hell failed to melt my heart, a sunset in summer, spreading its golden mantle over the deep green of earth, would soften me to tears of penitence, and make me feel that I was a worm, a speck of creation; and yet inspire me with elevated hopes and desires for the future. There are some hearts, or minds, that the thunders of Sinai would not affect, which the loving tones and pathetic appeals from the humble Nazarene will reach; and when God spreads out his curtains of the night, with its blue and sparkling gems, some one will hear the voice, and be instructed; some lonely heart will rejoice in the exceeding rich and heavenly view, which their Father gives them without money and without price; and they will praise the giver; they will worship—such a worship as the angels themselves might covet.

Again, we find music, sweet music, one of God's best preachers to the soul. It has made the savage breast relent; caused the knife to drop from the hand of the assassin, and even wicked spirits to flee. The dying have felt its solace sweet, and the disheartened have been inspired with courage and zeal by its renovating power.

One would think it almost out of place in a charnel-house to hear a warbling sonnet; in a desert to find a little green spot, and perhaps a flower; in a dungeon, beautiful colors; and we are almost led to wonder when, in this poor, sin-cursed earth, we find the sweet, the beautiful; but

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

They are not only voices that speak to the hardened heart, but he has chosen for his people the poor of earth, rich in faith; and God will not stint them; and while the world might have looked upon the sainted John, on Patmos' lonely isle, and pitied the poor exile, his wrapt spirit was contemplating the most glorious scenes, and basking in the sunlight of a Father's smiles.

Thus it is with Christ's lonely bride. He feeds her with the beautiful things of earth. He leads her in the green pastures and beside the still waters. For her, the lily puts on its spotless robe, the rose sends forth its fragrance sweet, the songsters warble their notes of joy.

God has a language in creation, a music in creation also that none but the inspired ones can hear. In Christ's school they learn what flesh and blood hath never revealed: "All things are yours." Even so the poor widow is tenderly cared for. If her poor orphan children lack the means of a popular education, he gives her a wisdom to teach those little plants, of which the wise and prudent are often destitute; and with her Bible and the teachings of the Holy Spirit, she is well fitted to instruct. Her teachings will refine, soften, and elevate. No one can deprive her children of the healthful influence of the morning breeze. They may not share in the garners of the rich, the cultivated fields of those whose God is this world; but God has always a crop for his children; they grow spontaneously; and who that has seen the rich clusters of purple grapes hanging from the rock, the blushing berries, almost hid beneath the green moss, or a profusion of glossy leaves, but feels these are God's fruits? Thus, in a thousand ways, God blesses his children, and makes all things to work for their good. He breathes through the beautiful things, which by his own hand were formed, a spirit of love. Love! what a magic word! It is that which forms the sweet and touching sensation, pity; it weaves a web of kindness that makes a captive of all the suffering ones of earth. It forms a chain that binds strangers and foreigners together, gives zeal and courage to die for the loved one, and when dying, to bless God for the same. O! what is love? "If a man would give his whole house for it, it would utterly be contemned." "Many waters cannot quench it, nor floods drown it."

What a blessed consideration, that we are not retrograding from, but approximating to, the fountain of love, of beauty, and glory! We are fitting up, with God's grace, a character that will shine like the stars forever and ever in that land of beauty. God gives us a few sweet glimpses by the way; but soon will take us home, where there will be no decay, no deformity, no discord. Our hearts are there already; by faith we are exploring the better country, joining our voices and instruments, too, with angels, in a glorious song of melody, that earth has never heard; gazing on the Lamb—the bright star of the morning; by faith we are clasping in our arms the loved ones that have gone to rest, and many loved ones also that are scattered, that we shall meet no more here. Soon faith will be sweetly lost in sight, and hope in fruition. "This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith." Faith looks at the kingdom until her eyes are dazzled, and she cannot see much of earth; then how easy to overcome. This will prove our victory; just as strongly as we believe in the future, we shall be willing to go, and we say, "no matter what cheer."

To help us to overcome, God has promised us a reward. To give us some idea what it will be, he has painted the lily, decked the heavens, garnished the earth; given us song, and poetry, and color, harmony and beauty, in a small degree, that we may have a respect to the recompense of reward. But out of faith, hope and charity, only charity, to show us the spirit of the kingdom; but when filled with it we cry, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly! It casts out all fear, enables us to endure, helps us cheerfully to suffer, and makes us a sympathizing member of Christ's body. When we possess it, we do not take advantage of any one's ignorance, poverty, or deformity. There is no partiality in love; still we must love most what is most lovely; this is a law in our natures that we cannot transgress, unless we become corrupt; but with our little love let us with becoming modesty contemplate Christ's great love for man, which casts our best love (as it respects its vastness) into the shade; which, in comparison, is but a drop to the ocean.

"O, for such love, let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break!"

Thoughts on the Kingdom.

Away from the cares of the rude world, and where no sound of man disturbs my meditation, and where nought but the Spirit of my Redeemer is present,—thoughts of his goodness tune my spirit to song and praise. Here in this solitude shall my thoughts go forth to that bright and better land, where the sun shall not smite by day; the city shall have no need of the sun to shine in it, for the Lamb shall be the light thereof,—Christ's own blessed kingdom—the saints' inheritance—the reward of the redeemed! What mortal, with finite mind, can grasp with expanding intellect the smallest ray of its glory,—the new Jerusalem, where angels hold their endless Sabbaths—whose jasper walls will echo to the tread of immortal hosts, and her arches ring to the cadence of never dying voices! —There a Father's hand shall wipe away the last tear from the eye of weeping humanity; his soothing voice will hush to rest the last sigh that shall escape from the pained heart of the children of God. Then we shall be holy, because they are holy, and no sound of discord will ever mar creation's jubilee. Spotless before the throne, in robes of light, with those white-vested elders, we may roam those vernal plains, and drink from founts of living water, which send their crystal streams afar. With His name imperishably enstamped upon our foreheads, and with harps tuned to the accompaniment of archangel voices, we may chant the song which angels chant in their star-gemmed homes; and through the boundless ages of eternity we may bask in the glory of God's eternal love; and in Eden bowers inhale the rich odors of flowers all cankerless and beautiful, and listen entranced to the rapturous music of undying angels, and where all are immortal.

Who would not be a christian, and reign forever with his God?

C. G. Carre.

Blackstone, Mass.

CHARITY.—Men measure their charity by a peculiar standard. A man who has not a dollar in his pocket, would give a penny almost for any purpose. If he had a hundred he might give one; carry it higher and there comes a falling off. One hundred dollars would be considered too large a sum for him who has ten thousand; while a present of one thousand would be considered almost miraculous for a man worth one hundred thousand; yet the proportion, is the same throughout; the poor man's penny and the widow's mite is more than the rich man's sounding and widely trumpeted benefaction.

For the Crisis.

Words of Exhortation.

To those who have heard the last messages of God, but do not value them sufficiently to bring them out conspicuously before the world, I would offer the following remarks.

All admit that God has appointed a day in which all nations shall be judged by the Lord Jesus, whom he has brought from the grave. Has the time of this mighty act been made known to any in this generation, or has the nearness of the time? This can be known only by searching the Scriptures,—accounting these better far than men-made creeds. God has said, after describing the signs preceding his coming, "Know ye that it is near, even at the doors!" We "don't know any thing about it," do we? Christ says we may, and haven't we studied well for it? Verily, since these "signs" passed, men have been "turning leaves" day and night,—Bibles have been valued, and men gained that wisdom for which they sought.

Then why do the enemies of God rise up and say that we "know nothing about it?" Because, "having eyes they see not," etc. Why do professing christians oppose us? Because they are willfully ignorant,—are lulled and charmed to deep slumber, like the Roman guards. The shepherds, whom the prophet compares to "cunning foxes in their dens," have thrown a mist of learning, spirituality, mystification and commanding importance around them,—they tell of "peace, peace," while there is no peace, "and the people love to have it so," says inspiration. God says, "Come out of her, oh, my people," for "not one of these mine enemies shall taste of my supper." The men of "scarlet" tinge and relationship cry, "All is well with us." And thus thousands are quieted by blind guides. These mesmerised ones will yet dare to look Jehovah in the face, and say, "believing these things is not essential to salvation!" unmindful that "my TRUTH shall make you free." Giving no respect to the words of God, they close in with his adversaries. What is justice for such? Is a "welcome into my joy?" Is, "sit down on my throne?"

But many have glanced through this mist and examined Truth's platform,—that it is lovely, substantial, divine and good. Why, then, will they not stand thereupon? Because they, too, are lacking in "oil." They lack love and respect for Jehovah's word. They believe that a "learned man's" creed is equally safe! Poor, blind mortals! A person that can see, but will not obey, is worse than those who are ignorant. What must be their feelings when all these things transpire! No wonder at their cry to rocks and mountains. Then all will be believers. All will then believe in "Second Adventism." But, alas! too late! The day of hope is ended, and "ye shall stand without the door and knock,"—appealing to your old professions, which will only add terror to the scene.

Others again think we had best "cling to the faith of our fathers." Thus do the Romanists! Is this independent? Is this noble? Why send out missionaries to convert the heathen? Let them alone, if their fathers' faith will prove saving. But where do we find such an example? Do we in the history of good St. Paul? Did he tie himself down to the narrow-contracted souls of his forefathers? No! The Apostles forsook all for Truth's sake. Can we expect to come off easier than they? O that men would learn consistency! O that rational men would act accordingly! O that man were less, and God more, exalted!

Dear friends, I would earnestly entreat you to "forsake father, mother, houses and lands" for the sake of Truth. Diligently inquire if these things are so, before passing judgment upon them. Learn to do away with fleshly guides, and drink from the pure fountain of divine wisdom. Take God's word in preference to man's. Believe HIM. Obedience is the fruit of a saving faith. Do come and enjoy God's approbative smile. Do stand up for Jesus! O, confess Him, and he will own you in the day of his power! Come! O come to Jesus! Mercy lingers yet a moment. Jesus tarries but a little while. "Now or never" you must win a crown of glory. Now is the day of salvation. O seize it! Be ye warned, and flee from the wrath to come! Defer no longer to be wise.

If God has given his people a brighter light than they formerly had, let us be thankful, and let all who would be "his people" come out on Truth's side. "Why halt ye between two opinions?" Of all the meandering paths, only one is the right one. It is narrow, and few there are who find it. There is room for many more. Who will come and partake of the joys of the new earth? Who bask in the sunshine of God's presence for ever and ever? Who will? Soon mercy will be no more.

JOHN MORRISON.

☞ Every object that is presented to the mind in a distinct form, will affect us pleasantly, or otherwise. If it comes in the form of duty, it will either afford us pleasure or pain to perform this duty. Thus we may see, by self-examination, whether we love the Lord, by learning whether it affords us happiness to obey his commandments. This is a test which is always certain, and can never fail to develope to every individual his real character.

Correspondence.

From Eld. I. Damman.

I am not consumed, neither am I disheartened. My faith is the same in the coming of Christ, only a little stronger, and in relation to the last days' deception, the working of Satan. It may be asked, Where is Bro. Damman this Spring? I have spent the winter in N. B., wrestling against principalities, and the rulers of the darkness of this world, not against the darkness, but the rulers of the darkness,—those that preach that man has got immortality, and that preach it is right to cluster together (Rev. 14: 18) and become united to the governments of this world, which influence destroys the light of truth shining on the minds of the people, and virtually denies the Christ of the Bible, and his power to save men. Hence they are teaching a gospel of war. This is darkness, not light; these are what Paul calls "strongholds of Satan;" but Paul said, "put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the Devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood; but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places," (heavenly, margin.)

Doors are opening to hear the truth of the Bible. Faithful ministers are wanted in this section of country. The cry is, Lord, raise up men that will tell the whole truth, and not be afraid to be identified with it.

I do rejoice to learn that you have taken a bold stand on the Life and Death question. No time now for daubing with untempered mortar, if a holy life is wanted, a holy gospel must be preached, for Jesus said, "ye are clean through the word that I have spoken unto you."—John 15: 3.

I found the church in a very low state when I first went to the Province. The Lord did revive his work in many hearts; love and union increased; some were converted to God, we trust, and were baptized, to the encouragement of the church of God. The doctrine of immortality only through Christ was and is the only question; hence the question follows, if the church is holy, how can a christian live on two sets of principles, one in opposition to the other?

Question. Can a man belong to the vine of the earth and preach the whole gospel of Jesus Christ?

2. Will some one inform us from the Bible who is the mother of harlots? also, can there be a mother of harlots without daughters? and who can they be?

3. Will some one inform us of the meaning of the text in John 3: 13, how that Christ could be on earth and in heaven at one and the same time?

From J. B. Dodge.

BRO. GRANT:—I have been sick for a year or more. The enemy is now doing up his last work. I praise the Lord that his work is limited. The trump of God is soon to sound; then we can say, oh, death, where is thy sting? Oh grave, where is thy victory? I wish to say to my brethren and sisters, lift up your heads and rejoice; for the Lord is at hand. The Lord hath a controversy with the nations; all the peace conferences in the world cannot prevent it; the cup must be drunk. When I look at the condition of the world, it seems to me the vast storm is gathering; the winds are blowing, the mighty hosts are now arming for the conflict.

Brethren, will the dark clouds now gathering break away, and the sunshine again appear? It may be; I hope not. I desire to see my Redeemer, and be made like him. No time to sleep now. Let us lay hold on eternal life; for soon the mystery of God will be finished—probation ended—we saved or condemned.

From A. N. Seymour.

BRO. GRANT:—I am right glad to receive the weekly visits of the Crisis. It is like cold water to a thirsty soul, or good news from a far country; and to my mind it speaks the language of Canaan in unmistakable signs, and its enlargement and new dress I admire, for it presents a more pleasing aspect to its readers; and I fondly anticipate that the contents of that pure sheet will be a beacon light to many a way-worn pilgrim over the rough and stormy sea of life, to that fair and blooming rest so desirable to an honest and sanctified soul; and also a true watchman to give meat in due season, and thereby constrain many, that are now thronging that most frequented and broad way to destruction, to seek an interest in the Redeemer's coming kingdom, which is of infinite importance to all. And I hope the Crisis may receive a wide circulation, and it surely will if all of its patrons will go to work in good earnest to secure subscribers for its pages. Almost every one can do something. Send a few copies among your friends, perhaps this may induce some to take it. I think it decidedly the most spiritual paper we have among us, and the best calculated to cement the sympathies and hearts of God's people together.

One thing has weighed heavily upon my spirits for years past, and that is the divisions among us, kept up by religious Editors, (I hope not designedly.) I would to God that such a gift as came from heaven on the day of Pentecost could once more grace the church, and I would that we might see the [illegible]; then all would labor unitedly to carry out the Savior's injunction, "Love one another, as I have loved you." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples," when "ye have love one to another." Pure love is the basis of the christian religion, and without this we are as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

From Eld. J. Wilson.

BRO. GRANT:—I am still laboring to get more subscribers for your paper. My health is good as it ever was. My mind is clear, to my own satisfaction, in Bible truth, beyond what it ever was before in my whole pilgrimage, which has been over fifty-one years. I read the doctrine which your paper contains with much delight; it is food to my soul. It seems I never had so great a flow of love to my brethren scattered over our land, as now. I have strong faith that I shall see you, and many more of my brethren in your region, at your next Wilbraham campmeeting, if the Lord will. O how I want to see them once more before the Lord's resurrection trump shall sound. My whole business is to get ready, and to stir up others to the same duty also. I close this, by subscribing myself to my brethren and sisters, their old pilgrim friend and brother, in the Lord, just at the close of my pilgrim existence of eighty-two winters, waiting for that eternal day where there will be no more night. Amen, come, Lord Jesus; come quickly! is my prayer.

Vermont, Chautauque, N. Y.

BRO. GRANT:—The "Crisis" still makes its weekly visits, and is read with increasing interest,—and especially the letters of Sr. Wellcome. They are food to the soul hungering and thirsting after righteousness; and, blessed be God, we are told in his word that such shall be filled. He that loves is born of God, for God is love; and truly if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another,—and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.

The articles in the "Crisis" on "Baptism Historically Considered," I have read with much profit. These, and Sr. Wellcome's letters, I think are amply worth the price of the "Crisis" for one year. The doctrine of the coming and kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is a doctrine I love to contemplate; and though I feel that I love all that love our Lord Jesus Christ,—I have a peculiar love for those of his children that are looking for his second coming; and I do pray that no minor points of doctrine will ever cause division or strife; but may we unitedly point sinners to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world; and if we must differ on some points, God help us to differ in love.

Dull Winter hastens to be gone,
He's disappearing fast;
The sunny hours are coming on,
The stormy time is past.
The ice no longer binds the rill,
Nor snows their mantle fling;
For every bleak and barren hill
Has kissed the breeze of Spring

☞ Man need not stop and ask how he can begin a religious life; he knows how, and the Lord continually gives him power to do it. He always knows many evils which he does not try to shun. Let him begin by shunning those; and then continue his course steadfastly and honestly, by shunning all other evils that are manifested in his heart and life. While he thus proceeds the Lord will inspire him with the love of knowing and doing the truth, and the Spirit of truth will be his guide.

☞ The dark races have less nervous sensibility than the white. They are not subject to nervous disease. They sleep sound in every disease, nor does any mental disturbance keep them awake. They bear chirurgical operations much better than the white people.

☞ He who sends the storm, steers the vessel.

☞ Love to the Lord is directly and totally opposed to the love of self.

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in Jesus, at Templeton, Mass., March 20th, 1859, Sr. MARY P. BAKER, wife of Bro. Uri Baker, aged 45 years.

Sr. Baker has been suffering under that fatal disease, consumption, for the last fifteen months, which she seemed to bear with patience and without a murmur. She was converted and embraced the Advent doctrine in the year 1843, which she cherished to the time of her death. As her disease grew more severe, and the certainty of death increased, she seemed to let loose her grasp of earth and earthly things. Jesus and the resurrection were her chief delight.

She had her reason to the last, so much so that she made all necessary arrangements for her funeral, and selected the hymns to be sung, which were, "I would not live always" and "Heavenly Rest;" and after she had done all she could do, she seemed to be perfectly resigned, although she could not speak, to wait the bidding of her Lord and Master. She was a great sufferer to the last, and now she waits the sound of the last trumpet, when she will come forth clothed in immortal beauty, to die no more.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

PER STEAMSHIP NEW YORK.—Advices of the 22d ult

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: Matters are looking brighter; both Austria and France appear more inclined towards a pacific solution of the present difficulty than previous to Lord Cowley's mission to Vienna. It is certain that the force which Austria now has in Lombardy is more imposing than what people generally thought, though it was known to be great; and that, in case of a hostile move on the part of France, she would withdraw her forces from the other parts of the empire, and pour them all into Lombardy.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times says: Under all circumstances, as regards Italy, the danger is passing off for the present It is a great point that the Emperor Napoleon seems well disposed, and so long as he remains so, he has a right to be judged favorably.

The London Herald received the following from Paris: The Five Powers have agreed to a Congress, but the basis and the extent of the discussions are not decided upon. It will be held in a neutral city, and the Hague is mentioned as the place.

A despatch from Vienna, dated on the 20th ult., says: The Ost Deutsche Post warns the public not to place too much confidence in peaceful reports, and says that it is very doubtful whether a congress of European Powers will be convoked.

It is asserted that France intends to protest against the construction of fortifications by the Austrians in Placenza.

According to advices from Rome to the 17th ult., Gen. Grammont has again received a note from Cardinal Antonelli, requesting the immediate evacuation of the States of the Church by the French troops

Advices from Paris state that a review on the Champ de Mars had been held 19th ultimo. The Emperor, the Empress and Imperial Prince were also present. The immense crowd which had assembled received the imperial party with shouts of "Vive la Empereur."

Paris, March 18.—Correspondence of the London Star.—The increased apprehensions of war which, during the week, prevailed on the Paris Bourse, were entirely owing to the rumors of an impending movement of troops towards the south. Nothing hitherto has confirmed those rumors. On Wednesday it had become positively known in Paris that the Imperial government did not look upon the overtures, transmitted by Lord Cowley, as altogether hopeless, and the funds raised in consequence. Concerning these overtures, it was always probable that Austria, as a last means to avoid war, would not object to the convocation of a European Conference at London, to examine into the legality of the four special treaties which she considers as bulwarks of her power in Italy. We may now say that this is already more than a mere probability, it is a confessed fact. But, it must be added, that the Austrian government has expressly guarded itself against any binding power of the resolutions of this conference, the only object of which, in the eyes of Austria, is to be that of bringing the dispute between Austria, on one side, and Sardinia and France on the other, officially before the forum of Europe, to avoid such dangers as might arise from mere misunderstandings. It is further said, that Great Britain and Prussia conjointly consider this, if not as a satisfactory proposition, at least as a basis on which further negotiations, with the object of preventing war, may be carried on.

From the Ost Deutsche Post of Vienna, March 19th.

* * * The Austro-Italian treaties are the bulwarks of Austrian power, and it is now proposed to give up those bulwarks to Piedmont, in fact, to wound the honor of Austria in order to lessen, to the advantage of France, her authority in the eyes of princes and nations This is the beginning of a vast plan—it is the question of the key of the Holy Sepulchre in another form. The Napoleonic dynasty remains faithful to its traditional policy The great European empires are to be humiliated in turn. Russia came first; now it is to be the turn of Austria. Germany will come last Such is the bottom of the question; all the rest is illusion, pretext and falsehood. But Austria will remain faithful to herself, and though her too prudent friends have often abandoned her in her conflicts with France, she has always borne her flag with firmness and perseverance.

REPORTED MOVEMENT OF RUSSIAN TROOPS.—The Neapolitan Minister for Foreign Affairs received the following intelligence by telegraph on the 11th ult —

A hundred thousand Russians are marching towards the Pruth; 120,000 Russians are marching towards the frontier of Hungary; 75,000 Austrians are descending into Lombardy to reinforce the army in Italy, and the families of the Austrian officers in Lombardy are advised to withdraw into the fortresses of Verona and Marghera

From the Austrian Gazette of Vienna, March 19th:

* * * In seeing part of the German press turn from us, and represent that our difference with France does not concern Germany, we must deplore the blindness of those who cannot understand the connection between things in Europe, and who close their eyes in order not to see the net in which it is desired to envelope all the European family If France prefers peace, we shall have it, but if she desires to humiliate us, it will be seen that we have sufficient courage not to yield to menaces or to the fear of a conflict.—Whether we have allies or not, our force is right.

[From the London Times, March 21]

We are happy to state that a Congress of the great Powers will meet either at London or Berlin, to take into consideration the state of Italy and the complication to which it has led. Although we may all have become somewhat tired of Congresses, yet there is no doubt that this solution is the best under the circumstances—in fact, the only one, considering how far each of the two sovereigns principally concerned has committed himself, and how much a retreat would detract from the pretensions of either. The recent conduct of the French and Sardinian Courts is not calculated to insure a happier fortune for Italy, but we trust that, now the settlement of that unhappy country has been committed to Europe, the great Powers, and especially England and Prussia, will make their voices heard in favor of humanity and good government. France and Austria have called a Congress not only to decide the points in dispute between them, but to take counsel for the permanent tranquility of Southern Europe. . . . The Emperor of Austria is quite willing to evacuate the Papal States simultaneously with France, and if the result of such an act chances to be the exposure of the Pope to danger from the revolutionary party, he will not regard with jealousy the return of French troops to Rome, should such a step be taken bona fide for the purpose of supporting his Holiness. As to the separate treaties with the Italian States, Francis Joseph declares that they have been only a burden and hindrance to him, exposing him to constant importunities from the different sovereigns, and that he is willing to consider a plan for placing those States on a more satisfactory basis.

[From the London News, March 22.]

A Congress upon the Italian question has this special advantage: it removes the cause from the contact and contagion of armed Napoleonism, and permits the sympathies of England to regard it as their own by nature and adoption. But we should be deceiving our readers if we pretended to look to the Congress for a final, or even a peaceful solution of the difficulties which are summed up in the domination, not merely in the predominance, of Austria from the Ticino to the Tiber, and from the Adriatic to the Appenines. Until we are assured that the basis of the deliberations of the Congress is to be Austrian concession, we dare not say, we cannot feel, that war adjourned is peace secured.

[Per CANADA, from Liverpool the 24th.]

Austria had consented to the proposed European Congress to settle the affairs of Italy. The other four powers, England, France, Russia and Prussia, had also consented, and the Congress would probably meet at Aix la Chapelle.

Piedmont and the other Italian States were likely to be admitted to the Congress.

It was reported that Prince Napoleon will represent France, and the Earl of Malmsbury England.

ITALY.

At a conclave of Cardinals, the Pope referred to the evacuation of his States by foreign troops, and denied that he had said he felt himself sufficiently strong to dispense with the extraneous assistance as a secular and warlike Prince might have done. His Holiness repeated that it was only to avert a conflict which might lead to a general conflagration that induced him to demand the withdrawal of the foreign garrisons.

It is stated that 400,000 muskets, on an improved model, are being made for the French army.

A GRAND BOOK!!

Fables of Infidelity and Facts of Faith.

BY R. PATTERSON.

For a long time I have felt the need of some book on INFIDELITY which would meet the protean forms in which it now appears, and hurl the gauntlet of truthful and enlightened defiance at the head of ignorant and prejudiced scepticism. I had purposed writing a work on the subject myself, but at length, to my great joy, I find it done to my hand. I have in my library many treatises on the subject, but some are too large, some too small, some too old, some too dull, and though they contain abundance of gold, yet it is not coined ready for circulation.

This book meets the want, and is emphatically the best work on infidelity for the common reader that I have seen. It discusses the question in almost every point of view, takes up one after another of the sceptic's refuges of lies, and scorches them to cinders. Every stroke is like a stroke of lightning Fact, argument, science, reason, sarcasm and appeal lie scattered through the pages. Geology, theology, ethnology, and many other "ologies" come in for a share of notice, and the objections of infidels to the book of God are shown in their proper light. All will be interested and profited by the perusal of this book, even though they may not agree with or endorse all its minute particulars. It is published in one vol 12 mo., more than 300 pages, fine clear type and good paper, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sent by mail post paid, on the receipt of 75 cents. Usual discount to agents. For $6 in cash, a dozen copies will be sent by express to any person.

I would also invite attention to the following valuable works, some of which have received the commendation of many of the most learned and pious persons in various religious denominations. All of them will be sent by mail pre-paid to any address on receipt of the price.

Hypocrisy.

The friendship of the hypocrite is but a snare
To lure the unwary with the smile that traitors wear,
He knows full well the livery of Heaven to prize,
And apes a saint to serve the devil in his guise;
His impious soul in Heaven's own light affects to bask,
His hydra form is shielded 'neath a double mask.

The Maine Annual Conference.

It will be remembered by those who are interested that it was voted at our last annual conference, that the next should be appointed by the Moderator and Scribe, at such time and place as they should designate after consulting the churches. It seems by experience that the early part of the summer is an appropriate time for it, for several reasons I write this notice to call the attention of the brethren to it, and to ask them what church or society wishes to have the conference meet with them this year, and at what time. Will such please write to Bro. N. Smith, of Hallowell, or to me at Richmond, soon? The church in Richmond, though very few in numbers, have sustained it four years liberally, and have enjoyed the blessing of God in so doing, especially the last year I do not know their minds about it for the future, but I think it might be well to hold it in other sections of the country, as opportunity may offer.

In behalf of others,

I. C. WELLCOME.

Richmond, Me., April 3, 1859.

Notice.

There has been recently fitted up in this city a small but convenient house of worship, situated on Warren street, two doors below my residence, which is on the corner of Rumford and Warren streets. The house is open and free, without distinction of party, for all the servants of Jesus Christ who are now publishing the glad tidings of the soon coming kingdom. We are few in number and limited in means; but would say to any, and to all, who feel the cause of God at heart, and are willing to sacrifice for the same, that here is an open door.

Sketches Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 19.

MY DEAR SISTER:—I somewhat digressed in my last letter, in order to explain more fully the distinction between sin, and the temptation to sin. I will now proceed to notice some more of Satan's devices, respecting which we have had too much experience to be altogether in ignorance.

He takes advantage of circumstances, in order to give greater effect to his temptations. Disappointments come, and then comes the temptation to murmur. Bereavements fall to our lot; then comes the temptation to rebel against the divine appointment. Friends prove treacherous; enemies abuse and slander us; then comes the temptation to distrust every friend, and avenge ourselves of our persecutors. Feelings of retaliation and of hate, sue hard for indulgence. Children are troublesome and disobedient; then come the angry thoughts, pressing hard upon the tongue, to incite it to express angry words,—and upon the hand, to impel it to action. Through the fascinating novel and enchanting newspaper story, Satan casts a piercing dart. By means of an attractive dress, or a beautiful ornament, the "lust of the eye" is enticed. Through the alluring charms of taste, the "pride of life" is awakened. By means of elegant furniture, luxurious dainties, and splendid equipages, the "lust of the flesh" is tempted to indulgence. The handsome form and features, the well-arranged apparel, the well-developed intellect, and the large store of acquired information, are all chosen as mediums through which to inject pride, and thus exalt the creature. And may I not say further, that he acts upon the mind by means of the eloquent sermon, the well-expressed prayer, and the talented exhortation? Did the minister, think you, never hear an inward whisper, "What a fine sermon that was! You have done well to-day. The people will like that"? Do you think that a brother or sister, after having much freedom of expression in prayer, or exhortation, have ever had such thoughts as these,—"I prayed beautifully," or, "I spoke eloquently"? If indulged, how filled up they become with feelings of self-gratification, of self-complacency. They begin to think pretty highly of themselves, and suppose that every one else thinks so too, respecting them.

But we will change the picture. An individual, possessing but little self-confidence, prays earnestly to God for assistance in the performance of christian duty. He feels that without the assistance of the Holy Spirit, his exercises are unprofitable and unavailing. In accordance with convictions of duty, he preaches, exhorts, or prays. He seems to himself to have had a barren time. His sermons have lacked, to his view, the divine unction; his prayers have been apparently lifeless; his exhortations dry and uninteresting. Now comes a very specious temptation, clad in very humble garb,—the indulgence of unbelieving, desponding, self-accusing feelings, on account of this apparent deadness in these exercises. Often its effect is immediately manifest by the downcast look, the hidden countenance, the falling tears, and, if in the public assembly, by the silent withdrawal. The soul is overwhelmed with feelings of mortification, and tortured with self-reproaches. Often does the minister think, when under the influence of this temptation, "I have mistaken my calling. I have made such wretched work with my text, that no one will want to hear me again." The brother or sister says, "I have fully exposed my ignorance—my weakness. I have tired the people; it was not my duty to speak; God did not help me. O, I never can speak again before that people!" If it was prayer, —"I had no access to God. I mocked him with heartless words. The Spirit helped me not. I felt much worse for praying. I did wrong. I will not pray in public any more."

Now people are much more ready to indulge such reflections as these, because they assume a garb of humility. The thought of self-complacency would be instantly repelled by them, because they would see that it savored of pride; but these humbling views of their exercises; these self-depreciating feelings; these self-accusations, why, they cannot be wrong! But what produces them? Does the Spirit of God awaken them? Let them be closely criticised. Is it not wounded pride that thus suffers? Is it so much the thought, "I have not spoken acceptably to God," that grieves the heart, as this, "I have not pleased the people?" Is not that the great trouble, after all? But if it be otherwise; if it be that the doubt is awakened of having been called to preach, or speak, or pray, because of a lack of freedom, is not the indulgence of this a sin? Does it not deprive the soul of faith, and turn the eye away from Christ?

With a certain class of minds, this is one of Satan's most successful strategems to discourage and deter them from active duties. If he cannot succeed in persuading them to bury their talents, to cease entirely from public labors, he will harass them continually, if possible; and the only way to escape his attacks is, to put those [illegible] immediately away, and permit them [illegible] in the heart. But [illegible] M. [illegible]

Increase our Faith!

How long shall I a pilgrim roam
Afar from rest, from joy, from home?
How long in weariness abide,
So far from Jesus' bleeding side?

They that believe do enter rest,
With peace and gladness they are blest,
From sin's wild toil and tumult free—
When shall this rest my portion be?

Lord, I believe, though prest with grief,
Wilt thou not help my unbelief?
O, lift my heart and soul above,
To know thy rest and taste thy love!

Lord, thou dost save by grace through faith,
From sin, from sorrow and from death;
To me this glorious blessing give,
Help me to cry, "I do believe!"

On Communion.

It is admitted by close communion Baptist brethren, that true believers on the Son of God, are members of what they term "the invisible church," notwithstanding their error concerning baptism. The question has been asked, "Is it true that a number of believers, meeting in a given locality, are members of the visible church in that place by virtue of their membership in the invisible church?"

A recognition of persons as members of, what is termed, "the invisible church," must certainly be founded on visible christian character. They are visible christians; i. e., acknowledged as such. How then can we deny that a number of visible christians meeting together, are a visible christian church?

If true faith in Jesus Christ, evinced by willing obedience to his known commandments, does not constitute a number of persons assembling for divine worship, a visible christian church; by what standard, short of perfect knowledge, faith and practice, can we denominate any persons such a community? If this standard is adopted, our divine Master has no visible church on earth, "For there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not."—Eccl. 7: 20.

Let us seriously consider whether we have authority in Scripture or reason, to make the knowledge of any one thing, not essential to christian character, essential to membership in the visible church, rather than others of the same category.

Baptism cannot precede visible christian character, for no person is qualified for it unless he evinces such a character. Can it be proper then to affirm of a visible christian, that he pertains to "the invisible church" but not to the visible? Does not the visible church on earth, of the Lord Jesus Christ, consist of all visible believers? It will be admitted that a church, which errs in supposing infant sprinkling to be scriptural baptism, may be more devotional in visible worship and more holy in visible daily deportment, than a church whose members have been immersed on a true profession of faith. Is it not an anomaly to say, that the latter is a visible church, and the former an invisible one?

So long as close communionists unite with unbaptized christians in the ordinances of prayer and praise, they cannot justify their practice in withholding communion at the Lord's supper, by the recorded fact of the New Testament, that believers were baptized previous to uniting in that ordinance, for it is equally a fact, that they were baptized before uniting in prayer and praise. In the true and perfect order, baptism stands next to believing with all the heart on the Son of God, Acts 6: 36–37; 2: 41; 8: 12; 18: 8; and not between the ordinances of worship. Uniting with them at the Lord's table, on the ground of their true faith in Him, is no more sanctioning their error relative to baptism, than uniting with them in prayer and praise.

For many years, I considered that the simple fact of baptism immediately following faith, in the truth of the gospel, determined that it is essential to membership in the christian church. Subsequent examination of the word of the Lord, convinced me that the plain and positive precepts relative to christian forbearance, forbid such a conclusion. To come to a right understanding of any scriptural subject, it is necessary to suspend our judgment until we have examined all the passages relative to the same. Nothing appears plainer to me, than the fact, that the New Testament churches were required, by divine authority, to "receive" those who were "in the faith" of Jesus Christ, on the ground that "God hath received" them, and "Christ also (had) received" them, notwithstanding they were weak, or erroneous, in respect to some things. See Rom. 14: 1–10; 15: 1–7; 1 Cor. 8: 7. Unless we can find a special exception to this rule in respect to baptism, I do not perceive the authority for making it. The manifest incongruity of adopting a principle which requires us to reject from membership in the christian church, some whom we acknowledge are more conformed, on the whole, in spirit and practice to Jesus Christ than some whom we receive, has tended, in no small degree, to confirm me in the belief of the correctness of my present view of this subject.

The discerning reader will perceive that this brief article furnishes no excuse for those who "know their Master's will (on baptism,) and do it not." They have no right in the christian church until they manifest their love to our blessed Lord by keeping his commandments.

"Handling the Word of God Deceitfully."—No. 1.

Paul said he had "renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God."—1 Cor. 4: 2. Here is an important item of christian character for a gospel teacher. He who attempts to teach the Lord's gospel, while there is dishonesty in his heart, it will manifest itself in the use he makes of Scripture to serve a purpose; he will drive his own ideas, or self-interests, by handling the word of God deceitfully. It is to be feared that there is much of this done; yet we should not attribute all wrong application of Scripture to dishonesty; we all may err through ignorance, on some points, and not see the true bearing of evidence, and the meaning of Scripture statements. But I wish to notice a few instances of uses of texts and sentences, used either deceitfully or ignorantly. Teachers should not be ignorant of what they do in teaching others. The common people are not so much to blame: "The priest's lips should keep knowledge."

It has been my lot to hear the doctrine of the world's conversion advocated much, and single texts or sentences frequently quoted to prove it; perhaps, often, ignorantly; but it has sometimes turned out, on close inquiry, to be "deceitfully." We will notice specimens: "I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession."—Ps. 2: 8. Now this looks all fair, and would be much in favor of the theory, did not the rest of the sentence conclusively prove that another purpose was intended. For this reason, the next verse is not quoted; and what is quoted, is "handled deceitfully," because it is declared in the next verse, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Again, Ps. 72: 8,—"He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth." Here it is given that Christ's dominion is universal; and then parts of other texts are cited to show that all are pure and righteous in his kingdom, and of course all are converted. But the next verse speaks thus: "They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust." Again, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."—Rev. 11: 15. This looks pleasant to the person who wants to carry out the idea that this poor, fallen, corrupt world is to be changed into the mild and peaceful reign of righteousness, without any responsibility of the inhabitants, or any overwhelming judgment on the rebellious nations. This passage is "handled deceitfully," to serve a theory. Let the passage be read through, and it says, "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged."

There is more on this point, but enough is seen in these items to show the principle. An honest heart will never so use the word of God, in teaching, unless tradition has blinded him. But some may say, "The man who does it cannot change anything, and why use deception?" Because sin is not cleansed from his breast, and it is blinding and hardening in its tendency, leading him to see only for the present time, to penetrate sectarian views, to sustain a party, to please the rich, or the fashionable, or to profit by it in filthy lucre. Many theories are thus kept alive by the "deceitful handling of the word of God." I wish to allude to some others. In doing so, I wish to make due allowance for limited knowledge of the human mind, limited study, and the blindness of false tradition.

While the word of life is shining so clearly in these last days, and some are rejoicing in the knowledge it affords on the generous plan of salvation, life and death being clearly set before us—the doom of the wicked, and the eternal home of the righteous, it discovers the errors which have corrupted the christian doctrine of the future age, or "world to come." Thus, to shun the reproach of being found in error, and of changing it for something called "new doctrine," a refuge is sought in this part of a text, "Great is the mystery of Godliness."—1 Tim. 3: 16. This is made to cover all doctrine, and exclude a correct conclusion on everything, (excepting our creed.) But let that text speak, and it shows at once that it is "handled deceitfully." The mystery is about "God manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit," etc. When this shelter will not afford perfect darkness, another text is used:—"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."—1 Cor. 2: 9. This excludes all knowledge of the future, (only as our creed, or our imagination informs us.) But read on, and light shines: "But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God."

Kicking.

"Stand firm! what though perchance you fall,
'T is with your armor girded on—
You have obeyed the General's call."

Kick, does he? does he kick? Well, suppose he does kick, will he hurt you? Can you not keep out of his way? What makes them kick? those that kick, generally have something to kick at. Saul of Tarsus kicked, you know, for awhile, but he found it hard work, very hard; so does every one that kicks against the truth, love and mercy.

There is no peace to these kickers; they are like "the troubled sea, casting up mire and dirt." Saul never kicked any more after the scales fell from his eyes; his name was changed to Paul the Apostle. The cause of all kicking against the truth is because truth is hated. Persons that kick do not like to be probed, searched out, their sins exposed, brought to light. We received several letters very recently, kicking, yes, full of kicks. We hardly broke the seal, before a kick—and it was kick, kick, kick, all the way through. These letters commenced in a kicking mood, and kept on in the same kicking mood to the end. And some of these kicks were really in good earnest, straight forward, up and down: first one foot, then the other. And some of these kickers were quite distinguished kickers; one of them was a leader, an officer in a college of some repute, a preacher also, in sacerdotals. The letter from this eminent kicker was made up of kicks from first to last. We do not expect any thing else but kicks from those who hold on to lust, pride, covetousness or oppression. Persons also who manufacture, sell and use rum and tobacco, write novels, puff novels, sell novels, read novels, and the like, are almost sure to kick when reproved; we have found it so. Ministers, editors, theological teachers, that keep back part of the price, cry "peace, peace," when there it no peace, that succumb to iniquity in high places, wink at sin, bow the knee to the popular voice, hush agitation, are almost sure to kick when a word of reproof is dropped in the ear. And a kick from this quarter, of all other kicks, tells, yes, it tells! It's a kick in very deed; we felt this to be true the other day. "Every one that doeth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved."—John 3: 20.

It was kicking in gospel times, it's kicking now, in our times. Haters of the truth kicked then, haters of the same truth kick now, and the same kicking against God's truth doubtless will go on, so long as there are haters of the truth to kick. The true prophets of God were kicked for telling the truth, so also the apostles. Paul was kicked, and kicked time after time, for rebuking sin and sinners. The Scribes and Pharisees of old kicked terribly, when Christ exposed their sins, their pride, covetousness, hypocrisy, their spirit of caste and aristocracy; while they honored God with their lips, at the same time their hearts were far from him; when he compared them "to whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness." See Matthew 23d, throughout.

Luther was kicked severely for rebuking sin in high places; so was Wesley, Whitfield, Bunyan, Baxter, Edwards, Payson, the Tennants. And these same kickings are going on. Our beloved Bro. James Caughey, now in England, has received kicks, not a few, while pulling sinners out of the fires of hell, by thousands; still the blessed man labors on, toils on, fights on, sounds the gospel trumpet of full and free salvation louder and still louder, in the midst of all these kicks, even though kicked by bishops and doctors of divinity.

The beloved Tyng of Philadelphia, who on his dying pillow said to his father, "stand up for Jesus," was kicked out of his pulpit for rebuking sin in high places, opening his lips for the dumb, and those "appointed to destruction." Was he disheartened at these kicks, that kicked him out of his parsonage? Did he stop preaching the truth, close his lips, hush the question of reform and salvation because of this kicking? Nay, he went on in the name of his divine Lord, declaring still more earnestly and faithfully "all the words of this life;" God honored him, gave him a name imperishable. "They that honor me, saith the Lord, will I honor, and them that despise me shall be lightly esteemed." Brother, sister, minister, editor, are you God's, wholly God's—God's now, henceforth and forever? Do you expect to move on heavenward, softly and smoothly, in the path of duty—stand up for Jesus always, without any kicks? We tell you nay, nay.

Where is thy cross? the daily care,
The daily toil, the daily strife—
The warfare thou art called to bear
With foes who aim at more than life.

What says Christ? "He that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall (not may) suffer persecution." "I come not to send peace on earth, but a sword." What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light; and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house tops." "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather, fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?"

Selections.

"God Provideth for the Morrow!"

Lo, the lilies of the field,
How their leaves instruction yield!
Hark to nature's lesson given
By the blessed birds of heaven!
Every bush and tufted tree
Warbles sweet philosophy;
Mortals, fly from doubt and sorrow;
God provideth for the morrow!

Say, with richer crimson glows
The kingly mantle than the rose?
Say, have kings more wholesome fare
Than we poor citizens of air?
Barns nor hoarded grain have we,
Yet we carol merrily.
Mortal, fly from doubt and sorrow,
God provideth for the morrow!

One there lives whose guardian eye
Guides our humble destiny,
One there lives, who, Lord of all,
Keeps our feathers lest they fall.
Pass we blithely, then the time,
Fearless of the snare of crime,
Free from doubt and faithless sorrow;
God provideth for the morrow!

Light in Darkness.

BY H. L. HASTINGS.

"Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness."—Ps. 112: 4.

While the Royal Preacher at Jerusalem surveyed with solemn sadness the unrighteousness of the human family, and sought in vain for men of strict and perfect rectitude, he exclaimed, "Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions."—Eccl. 7: 29. That man's primal condition was one of uprightness is evident. A contrary supposition involves the blasphemy of charging the Creator with the making of unholy things. But that mankind are not now upright is equally evident. By the tree of the knowledge of good and evil they lost their uprightness, and all their many inventions have never repaired that self-inflicted injury.

How, then, shall man, so fallen, become upright, and secure those forfeited blessings which are consequent upon uprightness? For an answer to this question, we refer to the words of David. "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honey-comb. Moreover by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward. Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou me from secret faults. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me; then shall I be UPRIGHT, and I shall be innocent of the great transgression."—Ps. 19: 7–13. Thus by being cleansed "from secret faults," and kept back "from presumptuous sins," man may become upright before God. But in order to this, we "must believe on the Lord Jesus Christ" with all the heart, and, washed from our sins "in his own blood," we shall be written among the upright unto whom light ariseth.

Having thus become upright, the individual shares innumerable blessings. "The generation of the upright shall be blessed."—Ps. 112: 2. His uprightness is first within. He is "upright in heart," but with David he can say, "I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart," "he walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness." He then learns, by blest experience, that "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."—Ps. 97: 11. And with David can say, "my defence is of God, which saveth the upright in heart."—Ps. 7: 10. Hence he will not fear the wrath of the wicked, who "bend their bow . . . that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart."—Ps. 11: 2; and though now "the just upright man is laughed to scorn."—Job 12: 4, it shall not be so forever, for, "upon the wicked God shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup. For the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright."—Ps. 11: 6, 7. "For the Lord God is a sun and shield, the Lord will give grace and glory; and no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly."—Ps. 84: 11.

Such is the condition of the upright. Pardoned, washed in the blood that cleanseth from all unrighteousness and made meet for the service of God. His course is upright,—his heart is upright,—his conversation is upright. He fears no reproach, he flees from no danger, he walks honestly and fearlessly "as in the day." His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord, and his steadfast hope is like an anchor to the soul. He walketh uprightly and walketh surely. Prov. 10: 9. As he journeys, he finds that "The way of the Lord is strength to the upright,"—Prov. 10: 29; and he goes rejoicingly on towards his brighter home. In the midst of perplexities he rejoices in the promise that "the integrity of the upright shall guide them," and in difficulties and dangers he believes that "the righteousness of the upright shall deliver them."—Prov. 11: 3, 6. He fears God, and, standing forth from the society of fawning sycophants and purse-bought flatterers, he looks up to God to learn his duty, and then in the integrity and independence of moral uprightness, he goes forth to do it at every hazard, if he may but win the approving smile, and at last the joyous welcome of that God whom he serves.

And what is the portion of the upright? Is it grief or gladness? Is it gloom or glory? Is it darkness, or is it light?

They judge wrongly who applaud the man that exhausts his garners in feasting and rioting, while they pity him who, amid storm and sunshine, casts his seed into the fertile field. The prodigal may seem the richer now, but when he shall beg in destitution and have nothing, then he who sowed in cold, and weariness and tears, shall find in the ripening plenty which crowns his harvest-fields, the reward for all his toils. So they may seem happier who, for a little while, devour with swinish greediness the vapid pleasures of this world, and sport themselves in lust and wickedness; but the harvest of corruption which they shall reap at last shall finally undeceive them, though too late for remedy.

The righteous then are content with fewer joys until the toils are past. "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."—Ps. 97: 11. His light and gladness are "sown," not reaped; growing, not ripened; standing, not gathered and garnered. Hence his present sorrow. The fruits of heavenly joy are now acid and bitter, until the sunshine and rain shall have ripened them in all their treasured richness in the Paradise of God. So he may well be sad. What matters it, if weeping doth endure for a night, if joy cometh in the morning, and the morning gray already lights the heavens? What matter if privation and scantiness be felt for a few brief days, if the eternal harvest is already ripening on our view? Will not the morning's endless joy wipe out the memories of night's brief sorrow? Will not the angelic songs, as they shout the harvest-home, swallow up the sighs and crying of him who sowed in tears?

But at present the upright are in gloom. The wicked rejoice—they walk in the flickering light of a phantom-fire, and in the sparks which they have kindled,—but their transient lustre shall fade in the gloom of despair,—"the blackness of darkness forever and ever." "They, though in the light, are children of darkness,—the righteous, though in the darkness, are the children of light." They walk in the light, as Christ is in the light—they put off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light; they "are not of the night nor of darkness," and their sun, though briefly obscured, shall soon burst forth in the unclouded and unsetting splendor of perpetual day. To the sinner there cometh gloom on all his glory, but "to the upright there ariseth light in the darkness."

We shall find this sentiment true in the present spiritual conflicts of the people of God. We have proved this very many times. O, how often have sorrows rolled like a shoreless ocean around us! How often has the heart grown sick and sad while darkness like that of Egypt seemed thickening every hour, and our failing strength seemed unequal to our pressing needs; and when in the depth of our anguish we lifted our despairing cries to God, oh then, how sweet the answer that broke the silence of our woe.—"Fear not, I am with thee . .—hast thou not known! hast thou not heard that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary?" "I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not, I will help thee." Thus to the upright there ariseth light in the darkness. Thus when he is tried, he comes forth as gold—thus when the enemy comes in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord will lift up a standard.

We see it again in the providential dealings of God with his faithful servants. Joseph goes into Egypt as a slave—this is darkness; he presides over Potiphar's house—this is light. He is cast into chains, and lies in prison and distress—this is darkness; but he comes forth by God's good providence to rule next the king and to preserve Egypt and his own family. The three Hebrews are condemned to die—this is darkness; but light arises—they walk unscathed among the burning flames, and emerge honored by God and man. Daniel is condemned to death and hurled into the lions' den—and this is darkness; but God's angel shuts the lions' mouth, and Daniel comes forth unharmed to enjoy greater power than before,—this is light. Job is smitten of Satan, forsaken of God, stripped of wealth, derided by his wife, upbraided by friends, insulted by foes, his heart broken with grief,—this is darkness; out of it light arises, and in the peaceful possession of seven-fold blessings he rejoices again in the favor of the Lord. Stephen is dying beneath the stones and curses of infuriate foes,—but light arises and he said, "I see Jesus at the right hand of God,"—and he fell into sleep, so sweet that no fury of men or devils could disturb the soft repose. Peter is lying in prison bound; tomorrow he must die,—this is darkness; but light arises out of it,—the door opens, the angel enters, the apostle goes forth, and the upright in heart rejoice in the Lord. Paul and Silas are in a Phillipian jail,—red from the lash, their feet in the stocks, their hearts sad,—this is darkness; but they pray, they sing,—the prison trembles, the jailor is converted, the stripes are washed, the ruler humbled, the saints comforted, and they go on their way rejoicing that "unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness." Paul is tost by the winds for fourteen days upon the stormy Mediterranean,—but an angel stands by him, light arises, and God gives him the lives of all that are with him. John is an exile on Patmos for the word of God and the testimony of Christ, away from friends, brethren and privileges; but there light arose out of darkness,—vision after vision unfolded the changeful fortunes of the church and world, until finally the harp-notes of the ransomed stirred his heart with floods of liquid melody—the sunlight of eternal glory burst full upon his view,—and, anticipating the joyous scene, the only words which could tell the fullness of his ardent longing were, "Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus!" Thus did light arise out of darkness, and the gloomy hills of Patmos became radiant as the very gate of heaven; and he who had looked upon it as only an abode of dreary exile, found, like the slumbering patriarch in Bethel, that "God was in the place."

(To be concluded.)

Abounding Grace.

The superabounding goodness of God appears in a very interesting light when we see it prevail over the errors and defects of humanity. None of our measures are perfect; yet many of them are blessed. In the multiplied meetings of the present day, every thing is not always done in the wisest manner; yet great good results from them. Sentiments are sometimes uttered which, if not positively erroneous, are at least not so qualified and good as strict truth demands. God is more patient than we are apt to be. He often blesses his own truth, notwithstanding its mixture with some errors. The few grains of wheat are valuable, though mixed with a heap of chaff. Gold amidst rubbish is gold still; but the less rubbish the better.

☞ When we cease humbly and heartily to acknowledge that the Lord is the true light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, and that all the light in our minds which gives the power of reasoning descends from Him by a perpetual, unceasing efflux, the light in us, however it may seem, becomes darkness.

Reading for Youth.

For the Crisis.

Story of a Cow.

DEAR CHILDREN:—I am not a bit of a story-teller; I wish I was, and then I should love dearly to chat with you every week. But I think of you whenever the "Crisis" comes to my dwelling, and wish there was a child's corner in the paper, for I think that the "little ones at home" would be more glad to welcome it, if there was something written on purpose for them. We will see if we can't persuade the good Editor to give up one column for your special benefit, and let those who want to talk with you, do so in that cosy corner, and also permit the children to write there, too, if they wish. I said that I could not tell you stories, i. e., I cannot make them all up myself; but I often read stories that would interest you, and I am going to tell you one that I have read in a very interesting and instructive book, and I want you to read it, and then wish little Annie, Frank, Mary, Carrie, and Freddy, to give me their opinions about it.

There was once a family who owned an old cow, that seemed to be very intelligent. During a part of the year she was fed daily with parsnips, which were usually washed for her; but one day the boy, being in a great hurry, took the parsnips to the cow unwashed. Well, don't you think her cowship was so nice, that she went to work and washed them herself before she would eat them! "A cow wash parsnips!" methinks I hear you exclaim. "How could a cow do so?" perhaps you ask. I will tell you. There was a tub of water that stood near, in which the parsnips were usually washed; so mooly-cow just took up one in her mouth and put it into the tub, holding it by its short tops, and then moved her head from side to side, till she had washed off the dust and then she ate it. She then took another and did the same, until she had washed and eaten them all.

Now do you not think she was a very intelligent cow? The question I have to ask is this—What was it that led that cow to wash the parsnips? Now do not be a bit bashful about answering; write out briefly just what you think of it, and Bro. Grant will let you have a share in the children's corner. Week after next I will tell you another story.

AUNT MARY.

A Word to the Little Folks about the Microscope.

Young friends, did you ever see a microscope—peep into it? Is it not wonderful? It is said, "A little flea is made to appear as large as an elephant; we can see all the wonderful parts of its formation, and are astonished to find that it has a coat of armor much more complete than ever a warrior wore, and composed of strong polished plates, fitted over each other, each plate covered like a tortoise shell, and where they meet, hundreds of strong quills project, like those on the back of the porcupine or hedgehog. There are the arched neck, the bright eyes, the transparent cases, piercers to puncture the skin, a sucker to draw away the blood; six long jointed legs, four of which are folded on the breast, ready at any moment to be thrown out with immense force for that jump which bothers one when they wish to catch him; and at the end of each leg hooked claws, to enable him to cling to whatever he lights upon. A flea can leap a thousand times his own length, which is the same as if a man jumped to the height of 700 feet; and he can draw a load 200 times his own weight" Is not this marvelous? So are all God's works. The heavens declare his glory. His wisdom, power and goodness are seen everywhere.

What for sins—your sins, little folks; do you ever look into the microscope of God's perfect law, and see how, what you may call little sins, magnify? God's microscope is the most wonderful of all microscopes. Beware, young readers, how you sin in thought, word or deed. Be sure your sin will find you out.—Golden Rule.

AN ITEM FOR BOYS.—It is one of the besetting sins of the young men of this extravagant age, to endeavor to get rid of work—to seek for easy and lazy employment—and the consequence is, that many of them turn out worthless vagabonds. Boys, avoid this whirlpool as you would a plague spot; banish from you the dangerous desire to live without work. Labor is honorable, dignified; it is the parent of health, wealth and happiness; look upon it as an invaluable blessing, and never as a burden and a curse. Shun idleness and sloth; pursue some honest calling, and be not ashamed to be useful.

Brotherhood.

"And the Lord said unto Cain, where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not; Am I my brother's keeper?"—Gen. 4: 9.

Hearken to this daring lie and brazen-faced demand which leaps from the mouth of the first murderer, as with hands incarnadine, he still grasps the heavy club, clotted with gore, with which he had even then, laid low his bright-haired brother! There is fierce defiance in his blood-shot eye, and upon that corrugated brow, which shall soon receive that mark, which has ever since been placed upon the burning forehead or in the heart of the willful homicide. But soon he cowers beneath the awful malediction which falls upon him; and with that whining cowardice which ever characterises the murderer, he fears the dreadful fiend which he has just invoked into the world—newly-begotten Death. The bloody records of his guilt are so vividly reflected upon his startled conscience, that he thinks that every one he meets will read upon his very face the damning word, and seek to slay him. But vengeance belongeth unto God; and he will not suffer man to arrogate his high prerogative. Therefore he threatens seven-fold punishment upon him who raised his hand against the branded fugitive. The trembling fratricide turns one long, mournful gaze upon the bleeding clay, and rushes from the scene, eastward from Eden.

The seeds of murder, which first bore fruit that day, have multiplied a thousand fold, and every globule in that victim's blood becomes a drop, and every drop a sea, until there is not a spot on earth, trodden by man, which has not been swept o'er by the ensanguined tide of brother's blood. This statement may seem "high-colored;" but bear awhile, and let us see who are brethren, and what is murder.

In the first place, men are brothers by being born of the same parents, or brethren by consanguinity.

Secondly, they are so, through their species, being members of the human family. And—

Thirdly, they are brethren who are united in purpose and sympathy.

Then there are two descriptions of murder, viz: deliberate bloodshed, and hatred in the heart.

The love experienced by those born of the same parents is called natural affection; and generally is of a warm and lasting description. That which is felt for mankind is philanthropy, and belongs only to the good. And that existing among those united in purpose and sympathy is strong in ratio to the righteousness of the end to which they look.

It is comparatively of rare occurrence that we have a Cain in community, who literally sheds his brother's blood, although even that is not entirely unknown in our day and generation. Nay, there are hands even more accursed than fratracidal, which have been raised against the gray-haired father and the aged mother. But these are solitary instances of monstrous wickedness, and the eye is seldom blasted by looking on them. Yet how often have family quarrels ripened into vindictive feuds, and hatred engendered, so bitter and intense that even the solemnity of the bed of death was not sufficient to awe the estranged brothers into a reconciliation. And this murderous hostility has often originated in disputes between their respective wives, or about a piece of land too small in which to dig the grave of either. We know of more than one instance of such sad alienation; and we presume that many of our readers have also seen the like.

Of the instances of murder direct among the human family, we would say they are innumerable. All classes, from the red escutcheon of the ambitious conqueror to the blood-dabbled rags of the ferocious lazaroni, are spotted with blood. Whether the crimson stain be upon the jewel-hilted sword of the proud invader, or upon the bravo's dagger, it calleth aloud to heaven for vengeance. Assassination not only prowls at night in filthy lanes, and lurks in dark gate-ways, but often visits the dazzling resorts of the wealthy debauchee; and even in broad day light, in the most crowded avenues of the capital, it sometimes darts out upon its victim. The murders which are committed, by indirect and slow degrees, by man upon his fellow man, are still more numerous and baleful. I mean through the agency of intoxicating liquors. Ninety cases out of every hundred of crime and destitution can be traced directly to intemperance; and even a greater ratio can be attributed to the monstrous evil which hurries tens of thousands yearly to an unhallowed grave. RUM! Quintessence of almost everything evil and revolting, wrung from woman's heart and childrens' tears, it fills the almshouse, the jail, the madhouse, the condemned cell, and loads the gallows with its writhing burden. Alas! that such a hideous hyena should for a day exist to pray upon the lives and property, and eternally destroy its millions for the temporary enrichments of a few too lazy and too dishonest to work for an honorable living. If, perhaps, this article may ever reach the drunkard's or a tippler's eye, I pray you pause to "Look upon this picture, and on that."

The bar-room is well lighted, and the walls hung around with questionable pictures. The ceiling decorated with tissue paper, parti-colored, fancifully cut and arranged in circle, square and angle. The bar is one resplendent glow of polished fountain, golden-labelled bottles, sparkling glasses and decanters, and presiding genius in the person of the smart tender who is radiant with mosaic jewelry, smiles and brazen effrontery. Smiles are bought and dearly paid for there. The moneyed fool is overwhelmed with blandest courtesy, and waited upon with the utmost servility. A seedy looking fellow goes to the bar and calls for a drink, which is scarcely given him, although he plants the money first; and yet this very wretch was once the favored guest, the petted patron of that den of ruin. He has squandered his money, become bankrupt in pocket and in character; his poor wife and children are starving for bread, while his unsatiated thirst for drink has converted into rum that last, hard-earned dime. And the proprietor of this hell, after a hearty meal, lies, like a gorged vulture, on a costly sofa in his parlor, while his over-dressed and vulgar wife and daughters flaunt in their silks, and ape, unsuccessfully, the airs of gentlefolks. Ask either of these harpies what has become of A, or B, or C, whose families they have ruined, and their answer would be Cain's—"I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?" And yet the voice of the blood of thousands rises up to the throne of the Eternal, clamorous for vengeance upon those harpies who have fattened upon the lives of the infatuated inebriate and his shivering and despairing family, that they might live in bloated and indolent luxury, and get rich upon more impiously acquired money than that which fills the pouch of the daring brigand, who boldly perils his life for it upon the lonely road. That cry is heard in the destitute habitation of the drunkard, in the cage of the raving maniac, in the clanking of irons in the "condemned cell," in the creaking of the gibbet, and in the moaning wind which sighs a requiem as it sweeps over the uncared-for sleepers in the potter's field! And they shall be avenged. Though drunkard after drunkard drop into their graves, unknelled, almost uncoffined and unknown, the eye of God, which never slumbereth, sees where the victim lies, and in that day of "retribution dire," shall of those alien rumsellers demand: "Where is thy brother?" The Scriptures declare that "Accursed is he that holdeth the bottle to his neighbor's lips;" and they who sell the intoxicating poison surely come within the meaning and spirit of that malediction. And I affirm—

No honest man can traffic in that drug,
Which generates such heaps of human woe.

The sale of it is low, debasing, demoralizing and murderous, and kills more men than all the other tolerated evils in the universe.

The third kind of brotherhood—that which exists among the followers of Christ, is the warmest, most endearing, most enduring of all affections in the human breast. Its purity preserves it from decay; its divine origin prevents it from mingling with alloy. Prosperity in one becomes subservient to the wants of others. Poverty and affliction bind the chil dren of God in closer unity. The fibres of their hearts are twined together, and that which gives the least of the brethren pain, is keenly felt by every sympathising member of the church. There is nothing more injurious to the character of christians than a lack of unanimity, forbearance and charity among them. On the other hand, their love for each other has excited the wonder of pagan and philosopher, and the unqualified approbation of their Father which is in heaven. It rises up like sweet incense to the skies, and like the dew brings forth the flowers of immortality.

"Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.

"It is like the precious ointment upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garment.

"As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion: for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forever more."

Buffalo.

A visit in Buffalo, N. Y., was made last Sunday, by the writer, according to previous request. There is quite an important field of labor in that flourishing city. Once there were many deemed worthy and zealous believers there; but by various causes, one and another became alienated,—painful illustrations of that Scripture, which says: "Woe to the world because of offences! It must needs be that offences come; but woe to him by whom they come"!—Verily, they have their reward. It was not my design to designate an unpleasant idea in association with that goodly and growing city. My ideas are only and altogether grateful. We had rather an agreeable and edifying time, and left with a heart full of thanks.

Buffalo has not been peculiar as to the "falling away." The "woe" quoted applies to Boston as well as Buffalo—to New York as well as Rochester—and to all places where poor, impulsive, unsanctified humanity has had freedom to exhibit its wayward weakness. But we must not moralize further, seeing that—

Our object is only to give notice of the meeting in Buffalo. There are a goodly number of worthy, intelligent believers there, who maintain regular worship, in a comfortable school-house, near the former place of meeting. Bro. Blain and I visited, off Friday and Saturday, from house to house. On Sunday, we had three sermons, baptism and Lord's Supper. Two were baptized in the baptistery of the church edifice, occupied by Elder Ball and congregation. All of us were thankful for the courtesy. It was a blessed good day. "Bless the Lord, O my soul." The brethren are only able, at present, to meet needful expenses; but they will be glad to enjoy a visit from all who are able and willing to AID in maintaining a testimony for the coming King in his Kingdom, in all its revealed relations. Other brethren in B. may yet join this little church, and render important service in sustaining its testimony to the Word. There are materials for quite an effective church there. The truth is evidently spreading; and some persons of standing and means seem disposed to take a strong position on the positive teaching of Holy Scripture, touching the end of evil in God's universe—the destruction of "the devil, death and hell."—Hos. 13: 14; 1 Cor. 15: 55; Heb. 2: 14; Rev. 20: 14. This "destruction" cannot be preservation.

The devil does most richly deserve to be "damned"—"destroyed." (No one of us can object.) "Death and hell" ought to end in the "lake of fire," at the burning day; and "let all the people say, Amen." The Almighty has spoken the word "destroy." He has leveled it at "the last enemy," and all his allies in causing human woe.

This same word of power made this wide earth and these overhanging heavens. The wonders of our world, through all time, have been wrought by this "word of the Lord." And now, meek-eyed faith sees this artillery of heaven arrayed for the demolition of hell!—the destruction of death and him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil, and DELIVER—restore—all things spoken by all the prophets. Amen. Let all hear, "who have an ear to hear," this unfailing, Almighty word.

Brethren in and about Buffalo, who make this word "the man of their counsel," in all the affairs of faith and Godly service, are invited to unite in spreading its hallowed light, and gathering fruit unto eternal life.

The faith that now dares to echo this word faithfully, in a faithless generation, will witness its eternal triumph in the day of the Lord, and share the restitution of all things, spoken by all the holy prophets since the world began. J. B. C.

☞ It is better to yield a little than to quarrel a great deal. The habit of standing up, as people call it for their (little) rights, is one of the most disagreeable and undignified in the world. Life is too short for the perpetual bickering which attends such a disposition; and, unless in a very momentous affair indeed, where other people's claims and interests are involved, we question if it is not better to lose somewhat of our precious rights, than squabble to maintain them.

Brief Expositions.

III. THE CURSE OF THE LAW.

"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them"—Gal. 3: 10.

"The soul that sinneth it shall die."—Ezek. 18: 4.

The words, "it shall die," in the second passage, explain the meaning of the term, "cursed," in the first. To be "cursed" in this world, is to be devoted or condemned to death—the loss of life—perpetual non-existence beyond the judgment day. The soul that sinneth it shall not die, says Satan. The soul that sinneth it shall die, says Jehovah; and we need not for a moment debate whether we ought to believe "the murderer" or the all-perfect, all-merciful Creator. At present, the sentence is only pronounced on Christ-rejecting men; then, at the final assize, it shall be executed in its tremendous import. Thank God that you are yet, oh unsaved reader, in the place of hope!

You will observe that this cursing is impartial—it is on "every one;" and it descends not merely on the man who has committed many sins, but on him who has been guilty of one transgression—"the soul that sinneth it shall die." It is not the soul that sinneth—i. e. the man who sins—openly, grossly or frequently, but simply the soul that sinneth. Perhaps you have thought yourself safe, or that you had no very great reason for alarm, because you have not been, as you conceive, a great sinner; surely your hope must perish now, when you discover that one sin is cursed—that even one sin is sufficient to destroy you forever. There are some serpents that do not need to sting twice; once is enough to slay their victim; and so it is with sin. An anxious sinner once told me that he thought there would have been mercy for him if he had not been so great a sinner. To expose his delusion, I showed him, among other things, from this very text—"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things," etc.,—that, supposing he had been guilty of but one sin, his case would have been just as bad as it was at the moment, since that single transgression would have brought the curse down on him. Well, have you committed one sin? You are cursed whether you believe it or no. At this moment the curse is within you, around you, above you, and beneath you; and if you are not delivered from it here, it will finally kindle and consume you, as certainly and as easily as the fire devours the withered branches of the vine, or the summer-dried prairie grass. Be wise, ere it is too late. Let not this day close on you an heir of perdition. Flee from destruction, to Him who is a hiding-place from the tempest—who delivers from the wrath to come.

IV. LOOKING UNTO JESUS.

"Looking unto Jesus."—Heb. 12: 2.

Parallel to this text is that golden one in Isaiah, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth, for I am God, and there is none else," (45: 22,) with this slight difference, that the prophet records an invitation to sinners to look to the Savior and live, while Paul exhorts the converted Hebrews to continue "looking unto Jesus"—the Divine Word made flesh. Infinite wisdom has connected your salvation, not with looking in upon your own heart, but out to him who invites you to eternal salvation. What is "looking" unto Jesus? I recollect two striking instances of misapprehension of the act called "looking unto Jesus." The first was that of a young person who frequently conversed with me about his salvation, and who sometimes was happy and sometimes miserable. He was, he said, "looking unto Jesus," and seemingly all was right; but his changing perpetually from light to darkness, from joy to wretchedness, was ample proof that every thing was wrong. His idea of "looking unto Jesus" turned out to be the following: He formed in his mind a picture of Jesus hanging in agony on the cross for him; when he could preserve this picture before his mind he was happy; when he was obliged to let it go, he sank into darkness. Generally, he informed me, he went to bed happy; but in the morning all was dark, and he never got comfort, if comfort it might be called, till he again lifted up the picture as before. The second was that of an individual somewhat advanced in years; his idea of "looking unto Jesus" was not unlike the former. He made in his mind a picture of Jesus, sitting on a glorious throne, encircled with the splendors of heaven, and looking down on him with great compassion. He kept his mind looking up to Jesus, and imagined the Savior looking down on him; and when he could preserve this vision before his mind, he had, like the young man mentioned above, peace and joy. He could then have died almost in transport; but as soon as it faded or departed, he became exceedingly agonized. In both instances, the persons were in great spiritual bondage—were making one incessant struggle to gain comfort, and the comfort they had was at best not worth one straw. They were brought to see that they were engaged at—what I could not otherwise describe than—mental picture-making, and that they were quite ignorant of what Paul meant by "looking unto Jesus."

Now, this expression, so liable to be misunderstood, as addressed to the Hebrews, was a figurative form of speech, for continuing to believe what was true concerning Jesus for their salvation, just as they continued to credit what was true about any other person in heaven or on earth. The same idea conveyed in this exhortation is expressed by the words, "keep in memory," in 1 Cor. 15: 2. "By which (the Gospel, v. 1,) ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain," (that is, believed, not in a wrong way, but a lie—a vanity—a false gospel. See v. 16–19.) The Corinthians were exhorted to remember what they had heard concerning Jesus, because in remembering it, they would thereby preserve themselves in a state of salvation—heirs of the resurrection to immortal being and bliss. What had they heard about Jesus? That he died for their sins, and rose again, according to the Scriptures—v. 3. Had they rejected that doctrine for any other gospel, they would assuredly have perished. A sinner begins to look to Jesus when he understands clearly that Jesus was the propitiation for his sins, and that he does not require to expiate them himself; and a saint continues "looking unto Jesus," when he remembers that truth, and goes on drawing all his peace from it, in prospect of meeting his Judge. Thus look—know that God is "well pleased"—know that Immanuel bore your sins in his own body on the tree—the sins which give you so much alarm, and you will be saved according to the promise. He that believeth shall be saved. Moreover, you will experience the force of these precious and song-inspiring words: "Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound; they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance."—Ps. 89: 15.

Immortality.

Is immortality God's debt, or his gift?—C. F. Hudson.—"The gift of God is eternal life."

Travelers worn, and faint and weary,
Wanderers 'mid the arid waste,
Parch'd and feverish, power no longer
On their destined way to haste,—
While the sands of life are falling,
Wasting hourly, one by one,—
Hark! there comes the sound of "Water!
Drink—ere yet all strength is gone."

O! what mercy! how refreshing;
What a blessed gift bestowed;
Now they rise, as on a sudden
Freed from an o'erwhelming load;
With what warmth they praise the giver,
Fervent gratitude inspired,
So in tempo—so essential—
More than aught on earth desired.

What is man's inherent longing
In this wilderness of death?
But for an unending being,
An eternity of breath?
Mortal—tending daily, hourly
To a mark'd and sure decay;
Dwelling 'mid the loved and living
Only for a fleeting day.

An eternal life is offered,
God the giver, through his Son,
Not upon the ground of merit,
Not for deeds that man hath done,—
But of mercy, free, unbounded,
Gift so wondrous, so divine!
All His attributes surround it,
And with bright effulgence shine.

Life eternal! let the angels
That surround the heavenly throne,
Praise him in such lofty anthems
As to earth were never known:
Let the saints when crown'd immortal,
An unending tribute bring;
Yea, let all creation render
Praise eternal to our King.

The One Baptism.

BRO. GRANT:—I once heard one of our most able ministers say that sprinkling, pouring and immersion constituted the one baptism spoken of by Paul. If so, then that minister ought to go through with the process of sprinkling, pouring and immersion, in order to get the one baptism, as well as every other baptized believer; and when this is done, he or they will have been truly buried or planted in the likeness of Christ's death. Yours for the one baptism (immersion.) A. N. S.

☞ There is scarce a time when men meet together, when they could not, if they listened for it, hear the sharp, shrill singing of ten thousand petty bees buzzing around them. Men have violated truth so long, that they have come to lie almost unconsciously.—Notes from Beecher's discourses.

☞ A man may hear this in a few moments which will be of great value to him during the rest of his life.

For the Crisis.

"O, who would seek?"

O, who would seek for earthly treasures?
Our sojourn here cannot be long,
Nor seek no more for worldly pleasures,
But may our hope in God be strong.

This life is like the troubled ocean,
Hoarse and high the billows roar;
The raging waves all in commotion,
Breaking all along the shore.

Storm after storm is ever rising,
The tempest rages long and loud;
And yet, methinks, the Sun is shining,—
There's light beyond the darkest cloud!

There's nothing here that we can cherish,
Our fondest hopes soon pass away,
We see our loved ones fade and perish,
Our fairest flowers soon pass away.

But there's a thought that's ever cheering,
That does our aching hearts sustain;
That Christ, our Lord, at his appearing,
Will bring those loved ones back again.

Prophecy.

From Fables of Infidelity, published by Hastings. Price 75 cents.

"In fifty years all Europe will be either Cossack or Republican." So prophesied the most sagacious of modern politicians, without any pretence to Divine inspiration, other than the inspiration of genius, when calculating the prospects of the future by the light of his past experience. "All genius is prophetic, inasmuch as it grasps general laws, universal in their range, and invariable in their operation, the application of which to particular events constitutes prediction. The Hebrew prophets were sagacious observers of human nature, and made very shrewd calculations of the future progress of events, by a careful induction of the invariable laws of nature from the history of the past. But there was nothing supernatural in that. Every poet, philosopher and politician, is more or less of a prophet. Men of profound genius are rare in any department of science, and ignorance ascribes to supernatural inspiration the sagacity derived from extensive observation; but philosophy traces to the same source the inspiration of Moses and Solon, of Apollo and Ezekiel, of Newton and Napoleon." So says the modern sceptic. * * *

The oracles of the heathen are always immoral in their tendency. From the first spiritual communication through the serpent medium in the tree of knowledge, down to the last spiritual marriage rapped out by the oracle, they are all in favor of pride, ambition, lying, lust, and murder. The oracles of God begin with a prohibition of curiosity, pride, covetousness, and theft: "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." And they are uniformly of the same tenor, forbidding, reproving, threatening vice, and encouraging virtue, down to the last: "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city; for without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie."

This last mark of falsehood belongs to all heathen oracles, from the first utterance by the serpent down to the last response rapped out by the medium. Take any one heathen oracle of which we have any definite account—and the number is very small—and you will find that, if it is not "as equivocal as Appollo," it is false. For instance, infidels very confidently refer to the augury of Vettius Valens, that, "if it be true, as historians say, that Romulus saw twelve vultures at the founding of Rome, that signified that it should exist twelve centuries." It very properly begins with an if, for the story of Romulus and the vultures is exceedingly apocryphal. But whether the story be false or no, the augury certainly is. If it refers to the material city then building, it was false. Brennus, the Gaul, burned it to the ground before it was four centuries old. If it prophesied the permanence of the political constitution, every school-boy knows that within twelve centuries half a dozen revolutions falsified the augury. If it referred to the ultimate duration of the city of that name, or of the Roman people, it is self-evidently false; for now, after the lapse of twenty-six centuries, Rome is larger, its territory wider, and its people more numerous, than for centuries after Romulus saw the twelve vultures. Yet men who have read Roman history present Vettius Valens as a prophet. It is written, "He frustrateth the tokens of the liars."

But it is objected that "the prophecies of Scripture are as obscure as the oracles; are all wrapped up in symbolical language; that many of them have a double meaning; that no two interpreters are agreed as to the meaning of the unfulfilled predictions; and that no man can certainly foretell any future event by means of them." The objection proceeds on a total mistake of the nature and design of prophecy, which is not to unveil the future for the gratification of your curiosity, but to give you direction in your present duty—precisely the reverse of the oracles referred to which, pretend to tell their votaries what would happen, but rarely condescended to direct them how to behave themselves so that things might happen well. The larger part of the prophecies of Scripture is taken up with directions to men how to regulate their conduct, rather than with information how God means to regulate his. There is just as much of the latter as is sufficient to show that the God who gave the Bible governs the world, and even that always urges the same moral lesson: "Say ye to the righteous that it shall be well with him, for he shall eat the fruit of his doings." "Woe to the wicked; it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him." Whenever a vision relates to what God will do in the distant future, it is dark and mysterious; but whenever any direction is given necessary for our immediate duty, then the "vision is written and made plain on tables, that he may run that readeth it." * * * * * *

As to the objection taken from the symbolical language of prophecy, and which seems to a number of our modern critics so weighty that they remove to the purely mythologic ground everything "couched in symbolical language," and account nothing to be prediction unless "literal history written in advance"—I would merely ask, How is it possible to reveal heavenly things to earth-born men but by earthly figures? Do you know a single word in your own, or any other language to express a spiritual state or mental operation, that is not the name of some material state or physical operation, used symbolically? Heart, soul, spirit, idea, memory, imagination, inclination, etc., every one of them a figure of speech—a symbol. Nay, is there a letter in your own or in any other alphabet, that was not originally a picture of something? I demand to know in what way God or man could teach you to know anything you have never seen, but by either showing you a picture of it, or telling you what it is like? That is simply by type or symbol; and these are the only possible media of conveying heavenly truth, or future history to our minds. When, therefore, the sceptic insists that prophecy be given literally in the style of history written in advance, he simply requires that God would make it utterly unintelligible. We can gather clear and definite ideas from the significant hieroglyphics of symbolic language, but the literalities of history written in advance would be worse to decipher than the arrow-headed inscriptions of Nineveh. Just imagine to yourself Alexander the Great reading Guizot, instead of Daniel: or Hildreth, as being less mysterious than Ezekiel; and meeting, for instance, such a record as this: "In the year of Christ, 1847, the United States conquered Mexico, and annexed California." "In the year of Christ—what new Olympiad may that be?" he would say. "The United States of course means the States of the Achæan League, but on what shore of the Euxine may Mexico and California be found?" What information could Aristotle gather from the record that, "In 1857, the Transatlantic Telegraph was in operation?" Could all the augurs in the seven-hilled city have expounded to Julius Cæsar the famous despatch, if intercepted in prophetic vision, "Sebastopol was evacuated last night, after enduring for three days an infernal fire of shot and shell?" Nay, to diminish the vista to even two or three centuries, what could Oliver Cromwell, aided by the whole Westminster Assembly, have made of a prophetic vision of a single newspaper paragraph of history written in advance, to inform them that, "Three companies of dragoons came down last night from Berwick to Southampton, by a special train, traveling 54 1-2 miles an hour, including stoppages, and embarked immediately on arrival. The fleet put to sea at noon, in the face of a full gale from the S. W.?" Why, the intelligible part of this single paragraph would seem to them more impossible, and the unintelligible part more absurd, than all the mysterious symbols of the Apocalypse.

The world has accepted God's symbols thousands of years ago, and it is too late in the day for our reformers to prepare new laws of thought and forms of speech to the human race. David's prophetic lyrics, and Christ's lovely parables, Isaiah's celestial anthems and Ezekiel's glorious symbols, Solomon's terse Proverbs, will be recited and admired, ages after the foggy abstractions of mystified metaphysicians have vanished from the earth. God's prophetic symbols are the glorious embodiments of living truths, while man's philosophic abstractions are the melancholy ghosts of expiring nonsense.

The revelation of future events, however, is not the principal design of the prophecies of the Bible; they bear witness to God's powerful present influence over the world now. For God's prophecy is not merely his foretelling something which will certainly happen at some future time, but over which he has no control—as an astronomer foretells an eclipse of the sun, but can neither hasten nor hinder it—but it is his revealing of a part of his plan of this world's affairs, to show that God, and not man, is the sovereign of this world. For this purpose he tells beforehand the actions [illegible] wicked men, of their own free-will, will commit contrary to his law, and the measures he will take to thwart their designs, and fulfill his own. Nay, he declares he will so manage matters that without their knowledge, and even contrary to their intentions, heathen armies and infidel scoffers shall serve his purposes and show his power while yet they are as perfectly voluntary in all their movements as if they, and not God, governed the world. Every fulfilled prophecy thus becomes an instance and evidence of a supernatural government; and is to a thinking mind a greater miracle than casting mountains into the sea. The style of prophecy corresponds to this design. It is not by any means apologetic or supplicating; but, on the contrary, majestic, convincing, and terrifying to the ungodly.

Charity.—No. 4.

"Charity" is more than simple benevolence.—"Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, ... and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."

A man may do all this, and still be destitute of supreme love to God, and universal love to his race. He may, in fact, be extremely selfish. Many give largely to benevolent objects, and for the spread of the glorious gospel of God's dear Son in our world; and to alleviate the sufferings and wants of the distressed and destitute, and yet have not true charity! They do so because they desire a name and the praise of men—to be seen and distinguished as those possessing large benevolence, or to purchase heaven by their deeds and gifts of charity. All that such persons do, therefore, is known and trumpeted abroad. These should read Matt. 6: 1–3.

True charity is silent, unostentatious, and yet active in doing good to mankind in all conditions of suffering and need, according to the ability and might. It has a heart to feel and sympathise with all in sorrow and affliction, and to take them by the hand and lead them to real fountains and sources of present and eternal good.

Howard was an example of true benevolence or "charity." He had love to God, and universal love to mankind,—in degradation, vice, and suffering. This "charity" led him to expend a large fortune in the cause of benevolence, and devote his days to the amelioration of the condition of his race; and that most neglected class of our fellow men incarcerated in dungeons, and loathsome prisons, and loaded with chains, thousands of whom were unlawfully and maliciously imprisoned, and eking out a miserable existence under the tyranny of government, or the hard-heartedness of their oppressors. He in person visited the prisons, and entered into the infectious and loathsome cells of the enslaved, and there, with the broken-hearted prisoner, shed tears of sympathy with him, and whisperd words of consolation from the gospel and the christian's hope, and bid them look up to Him who came "to bind up the broken hearted; to proclaim liberty to the captive; and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound." He went from government to government of the earth, in the spirit of charity, to tell them of the cruelty and wrongs of the system of prison discipline, as it then existed; and his disinterested kindness won him a pass everywhere he traveled and sojourned. A plain, [illegible] man he lived; and, dying in the christian's hope, there is inscribed on his tombstone the simple epitaph,—"A [illegible] saved by grace." O. R. Fassett.

The Spirit.—No. 3.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

In our last article on "the Spirit," we examined the first eleven passages in the Bible, where the original word occurs, and found it applied indiscriminately to man and all other animals. We have found it used in three senses, to wit: the Holy Spirit, "which proceedeth from the Father"; "a state of feeling," and "the breath of life," or air, we breathe, which is essential to sustain life.

In our examination, we have passed down the stream of time over twenty-three hundred years from the creation, but have found nothing that shows the spirit, or "breath of life" in man, is a conscious entity, existing as such after man returns to dust. Why this silence about an immortal, immaterial spirit, which we are told is the real man, if such a position is true? Suppose we could prove that this "breath of life" were a conscious being in man, we should prove the same true of beasts, for "they have all one (ruakh) breath." We all breathe from the same airy ocean, and all die when there is not sufficient physical strength to breathe any longer. This fact is plainly expressed in Ps. 146: 4. "His (ruakh) breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish;" also, in Ps. 104: 29,—"Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their (ruakh) breath, they die, and return to their dust." We can find no passage of Scripture to show that anything but "the breath of life" leaves man at death; and we feel confident that physiology, reason, facts and common sense harmonize on this point, and stand out in bold relief to sustain the Bible doctrine that the whole man is MORTAL in this life. The word of the Lord shows us plainly how to obtain "immortality"—"by patient continuance in well doing"; and that "this mortal must put on immortality" when the last . . . . trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised . . . then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory."

We will now pass to notice a few more examples where the word ruakh occurs.

The twelfth is in Ex. 6: 9.—"Moses spake so unto the children of Israel; but they hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of (ruakh) spirit, and for cruel bondage." Here is another instance where ruakh is used to denote "a state of feeling." Solomon uses the word in the same sense when he says; "A wounded (ruakh) spirit who can bear?"

13th and 14th. "And Moses stretched forth his rod over the land of Egypt, and the Lord brought an east (ruakh) wind upon the land all that day, and all that night; and when it was morning, the east (ruakh) wind brought the locusts."—Ex. 10: 13.

15th. "And the Lord turned a mighty strong west (ruakh) wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red sea."—Ex. 10: 19. It is perfectly evident that ruakh, in these last examples, does not refer to "a state of feeling," the Holy Spirit, or an organized conscious being; but the atmosphere surrounding the earth, which is denominated "the breath of life." Wind is this air in motion. It is material, but not a conscious, moral being, responsible for its acts, any more than the waters of the ocean which are moved by its powers.

16th. "Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east (ruakh) wind all that night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided."—Ex. 14: 21.

How absurd the idea that the ruakh, spirit, or "breath of life," which is in our "nostrils," is ourselves, our accountability, which goes off to get our reward, while we are left to be buried in the earth and sleep till "the last trumpet . . . . shall sound" to awake "the dead." It is a mystery to us how Satan has kept this fable so long from detection, and caused so many to believe that the spirit is immortal; but we will thank the Lord for the light now shining upon the holy Scriptures, and pray him to diffuse it throughout all christendom. It is now leaping all barriers, and, already, some bitter opposers act as though they were smitten with blindness, like "Saul of Tarsus," when on his way to Damascus to imprison and torment the children of the Lord. They know not what to do, or which way to turn. They are like a ship on a stormy sea, with compass lost and helm torn away. The great moral pirate—Spiritualism—is bearing down upon them with well-directed aim, and soon the dark flag of demons will be run up her mast, and she taken in tow to the whirlpool of destruction, unless they take "the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God," and meet these enemies of Christ with lion boldness, and dove-like meekness, in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, and hurl the bomb of truth into their magazine of error, scattering it to the four winds, and exploding its very foundation, which rests on the [illegible] of their satanic leader, and is inscribed [illegible] their dark piratical banner,—"Ye shall not surely die." We see no room to hope for the escape of the mass of professors of religion from these robbers of God unless they at once clothe themselves with the whole christian armor of truth, and abandon forever the dogma of the devil, that the ruakh, or spirit in man is immortal, and exists as the accountable being, called man, when his physical organism is mouldering in the tomb.

Query.

A brother wishes to know the meaning of Matt. 24: 34.—"Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled."

This is a part of the answer to the question propounded by the disciples in the third verse, when they said, "Tell us when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Between this question, and the statement in verse 34, is a long chain of events that were to transpire before the great event of the Lord's coming could take place. There are several reasons why the expression, "this generation," does not mean the one living when Christ was upon the earth.

First. The Savior said in Matt. 12: 39–40, when speaking of that generation,—"An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas; for as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." This sign is not included among the many signs in the 24th chapter; and even if it were, it could form no part of the answer to the question, "what shall be the sign of thy coming?

Second. The signs of Christ's coming, mentioned in Matt. 24: 29, cannot be signs of the destruction of Jerusalem, in that generation, because they were not to take place till "after the tribulation of those days." It is absurd to suppose that the Savior would give signs of an event already past; besides it may be clearly shown, we think, that "the tribulation" mentioned occurred during the dark ages, under the Papal abomination, when fifty millions of the saints were slaughtered by that great persecuting power. The signs of the Lord's return are not to transpire till after that "great tribulation;" hence we do not see the first sign,—the darkening of the sun—till after the "great tribulation" is over.

Third. Some of the events included in the expression, "all these things," cannot take place till the last generation, or the one living when Christ makes his second advent. For instance, in verse 30, he says, "Then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." This event is certainly not in the past. Again, in verse 31, he says, "He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." This is one of the events to take place in the "generation" named, but cannot transpire till the close of the last one. The generation living in Christ's time were scattered at the destruction of Jerusalem. When speaking of the destruction of that city, he says, as recorded in Luke 21: 20, 21, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies . . . . then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains." This is the opposite of gathering. But when He comes he will "gather together his elect."

After giving the signs of his coming, he says, in verses 32 and 33, "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near even at the doors." Know what is near? The event involved in the question of the disciples—the coming of the Lord. Or as in the margin, know that he is near. Luke says, (chapter 21: 31,) "Know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand?"—How near will it be when these signs are seen? "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." What generation? The one that sees these signs of his coming. Then it follows that the people who see the signs must live to see the event signified.

It is common with the Lord and his prophets, when giving a chain of events, or when speaking of some particular one, to use the present tense. Hence in Isa. 9: 6, we read, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." Although this is expressed in present tense, he was not born till about seven hundred years afterwards. Paul says, "God . . . calleth those things which be not as though they were." Rom. 4: 17. We might refer to many such examples if it were necessary. We only notice one or two more.—"Ye hypocrites! well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying, this people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me." Matt. 15: 7–8. Esaias had been in his grave hundreds of years before the Savior came and made the application of this prophecy; yet the prophet said, as he looked, in vision, upon the Jews, "this people." So in Matt. 24: 34, after giving a connected chain of events from his first to his second coming, when speaking of those who witness the signs of his advent, the Savior says, "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." We most firmly believe we are now living in the generation specified.

Baptism.

This is at all times a solemn ordinance, when we contemplate that which is set forth by the symbol,—a burial, and resurrection through Jesus Christ. On Wednesday last, I had the privilege of attending this ceremony; and it was the more interesting to me, as at the same place, some eighteen months ago, I was buried with our Lord in baptism by the same servant of God, Bro. Grant, who administered the precious sacrament to three candidates. There were present, Elds. Hudson, Hastings, Ingham, Moncrieff and White, besides a goodly number of the lay brethren and sisters, and also a crowd of spectators, who, from their quiet decorum, seemed more than ordinarily impressed with the solemn rite. It was a blessed season to the church, and we hope not without its good effects upon some of the lookers on. May God bless his work abundantly. Jno. F. Cotton.

For the Crisis.

"Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."

There is much dispute as to the meaning of this declaration of our Savior. Some contend that the comma should be after "to-day," making it read, "Verily I say unto thee to-day, shalt thou be with me in Paradise." If such was the case, it would settle the question on that point. But let it remain as it is, and even then there is no proof that the Savior was in Paradise that day. There is not one word to show he was. If he was not there, the thief could not have been there. The sentence reads, "Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise"—not, "I say thy soul, or spirit, shall be with me, or mine." If Jesus had meant this last, he would have said so. Now if Jesus was not in paradise that day, of course the penitent thief was not there. If he and the penitent thief, or either of them, had gone there, it would have been mentioned by some, at least, of the evangelists; and as it is not named by those who lived in those days, and who had every opportunity to know all about so great an event, what right has presumptuous mortal man now, centuries afterwards, to declare to the contrary? to stigmatize as "infidels," or "heathen," those who believe the plain record of an event to mean just what it says? We love the Savior as much as they. They may ridicule, if they please; it is no argument to convince any one of error. They may heap approbrious names on us, till language is exhausted; it does us no harm, nor them any credit.

Jesus died and was buried,—nothing said about his spirit being alive. He—his body—not his spirit—rose from the tomb, was seen by his disciples on earth, and by them seen to ascend up into heaven. The thief died, and probably was buried. There is no mention of his resurrection, or of his soul or spirit going to paradise. The fact that many bodies (not spirits) of the saints rose at the crucifixion, was mentioned; and if the thief's body had risen, or if his spirit had mingled with the throng, or soared to paradise alone, is it not reasonable to suppose that inspired men would have mentioned such fact? But we must believe that he is, with the rest of mortals, asleep; and, like them, unconscious of the lapse of time; whether a minute or a thousand years pass away, it is all the same to them, and so will continue till the morning dawns, and the trumpet awakes them from slumber, and "this same Jesus" comes again to take his people home. And when that glorious sight greets us—

"O that with yonder sacred throng,
We at his feet may fall,
And join the everlasting song,
And crown him Lord of all!"

Brethren, Pray for us.

We need your prayers—those who preach the gospel, especially. If we go down into the horrible pit to seek sinners, you must stand and hold on to the rope, by prayer, lest we fall.

It is stated that Joseph Wolffe was once traveling in the East, preaching the Kingdom of God, when he came to a place where two roads parted. Hesitating a little, he chose one of them; and after going a little way, he looked over in the other path, and there stood a lion, which would have devoured him, had he taken the other road. He recorded the incident in his journal, and on his return to England related it to his sister, who, on comparing her journal with his, found that at that very hour she, thousands of miles off, was pouring out her soul in an agony of prayer before God, for her absent brother. Her prayer was answered, and he was saved.

Brethren, pray for us! Pray that the Word of God may run, and that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men; for all men have not faith. Do you pray for us? Who prays for me, a poor, bruised reed? I trust I have your prayers, and also Christ's. Thanks be to God for them. H. L. H.

What shall we Do?

Christian, why ask what to do? Look around thee, and see what work there is for thee to do, ere the sun shall set in midnight darkness! Look at those clouds arising in yon eastern horizon, so portentous of a dreadful storm, soon to burst upon a wicked and devoted world. Then look at the infidelity, the scepticism, the sin and iniquity of Spiritualism and its kindred doctrines,—spirits of devils working miracles, that are deceiving thousands, and if possible, will deceive the very elect. Yes, brother, it is working like magic, even in our very midst. Don't you see it? If so, why ask what to do? We hear Christ say, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."—"In my name shall they cast out devils." Ah! where is the faith to cast out devils in these last days? Well did Jesus ask; "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" O, let us, who believe in the soon coming of our Lord, get hold of his promises by faith! Lift up the standard of truth! Cast out devils, by tearing down their walls and taking away their "corner-stone," and so leave them without a starting point, or whereupon to build. Put them to confusion and open shame by exposing to them the lie of the devil; then point them to Him who has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.

We see that evil men and seducers are waxing worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived; that many are departing from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils; and it does seem as if the very elements were giving way to the Prince of the power of the air, and he coming down upon us in great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time. Yet, how little do we realize the condition of the world! that very soon probation will end; then he that is filthy will be filthy still; and he that is holy will be holy still! Do we realize that this will soon be the condition of things? Don't we know it to be so? Is God like unto man that he should lie? Is not his word yea and amen? and has he not told us of things that must shortly come to pass—that the time is at hand? O! do we believe it? Do our lives tell to others that we believe Jesus is soon coming? Are we consistent, and give of our substance to the cause of Christ, and for the support of those that leave their families and homes to tell the story to a dying world? Why are there so few to labor, especially here in the West, where one must travel from two to three hundred miles north and south to preach the word of life, and yet hardly get enough to pay traveling expenses? Or are we hoarding up treasures upon earth; adding farm to farm, house to house, and dollar to dollar; heaping up riches that shall eat as doth a canker, and which will stand as a witness against us in the last day?

Is this the condition of things? And shall we thus come up to judgment? O let us remember that we are stewards, and nothing more, and should not bury that which our Lord has entrusted to our care; but let it be at work as it ought, scattering tracts and books, and in every other way that will be for the advancement of truth and the glory of God. We want the approval of our Lord when he comes; let us work; there is enough to do, and but few to do it, and, I may add, but a short time to do it in! Let us not stand all the day idle, as though there was nothing to do; and those of us who have enlisted at the eleventh hour, should do whatsoever our hands find to do with our might.

May God give us wisdom to discern between right and wrong, and make a proper application of all our means to the glory of God, and be accounted worthy of life through Christ. Amen. S. K. O.

Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy.
No. 1.

THE PROPHECIES OF MOSES.

There were many striking prophecies uttered by this eminent law-giver and prophet, prophecies which, by their remarkable fulfillment, demonstrate his divine commission. They had special reference to that people whom he had brought forth by divine authority from Egypt, and were so diversified, and yet connected, and so far-reaching in their application, and yet so definite in their arrangement, and so perfect in their accomplishment, that they afford a most striking illustration of the foreknowledge of God; and fully justify the language of the apostle Peter, when, after referring to the glorious exhibition of the Redeemer's kingdom, as seen by him and others on the "holy mount," he exclaimed, "Nevertheless, we have a more sure word of prophecy!" How can any one who reads the predictions of Moses, a mere man, of like passions with others, and then compares these predictions with history, written by various authors during successive ages, doubt for a moment that he "spoke as moved by the Holy Ghost?" Do not they carry with them unmistakable evidence of divine inspiration?

Let us briefly examine a portion of those remarkable predictions. Turn to Deut. 28: 29. Read the curses pronounced upon the people, if they forsook the Lord and turned unto other gods to serve them. They were to suffer with pestilence and famine, to perish by the sword, and be driven by the hand of their enemies, and carried captive by them into strange lands. In reading the history of the Kings, we find them thus afflicted. At one time seventy thousand were destroyed by pestilence; and at one time the people were so reduced by famine as to eat their own children, previous to the siege of Jerusalem. See 2 Kings 6: 2–23. Moses had foretold this distress:—"And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons, and of thy daughters." For three years and six months the rain of heaven was withheld, and great were the sufferings of the people. The heavens were like brass, and the earth iron, and "the rain of the land was powder and dust," as predicted by Moses.

He expressly foretold the dispersion of the Jews among all nations. Thou "shalt be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth." "And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth, even unto the other; and among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest." There is not another nation under heaven of whom this can be truthfully spoken. Other nations have been conquered, but not scattered. The Egyptians, Grecians, and Romans, have been subdued, but not dispersed among all nations. Says one writer; "While prosperous they were proverbially unfaithful to their law, but as soon as troubles came upon them, they began pertinaciously to adhere to some of the external requirements of their legislator, by which their identity as a people has been preserved, and now their number is as great as when they were first uprooted from their own soil. The lapse of ages cannot soften their peculiarities, or wear away their national stamp. They are exposed to all influences, and all are alike inoperative. Other people with a change of climate have degenerated, or improved; with a change of government have been thoroughly transformed; but climate, art and education, must beat in vain against the rocky prejudices of the Jews.

And where are they? Rather let us ask, Where are they not? They are in the old world, and in the new, and in every part of each. Not only are they in every country of Europe; but visit the cheerless plains of Siberia, the Russian prison, and the descendants of Jacob are there! Penetrate into the Chinese empire, from which you were excluded till within a few years, and you will find that for centuries the descendants of Jacob have been there. They have there, as here, their synagogues, and their congregations, and their Bible corresponding with ours; though when they entered the region, no historian can tell. Even go to Africa; visit the borders of those regions in which it is said no European can live; pierce there as far as ever white man pierced and returned, and you will see and hear of the self-same people around and beyond you. Wonder of wonders! who can account for it? Were they all over America only, still it would be strange! Were they all over Asia alone, their native continent, still it would be strange! But in Europe, Africa, Asia and America are they dwelling, and even on many isles of the deep. Observe, too, there is not a people on earth that have so strong attachments to their own land, and so intense desire to dwell in it. They worship toward Jerusalem, and the holy land to them is, as it were, the stepping-stone to Paradise."

Most emphatically has the prophecy been fulfilled; "thou shalt be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth . . . and the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other." W.

A Retrospect.

God, who is infinite in justice, love and mercy, hath invariably carried out those principles in every age of the world. Reader, turn over the pages of the Holy Book, and there mark the goodness of our Heavenly Father; when his love and mercy have been rejected, and justice demanded that punishment should be inflicted, timely admonition has been imparted.

Mark the dispensations of warning to God's favorite creature, man, in the days of Noah, Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Micah, Nahum,—all the threatenings of those holy men, as given in advance, are now matters of history. Read them, and if the words spoken by angels were steadfast, and every transgression received a just recompence of reward, how shall we escape if we neglect to hear Him that speaketh from heaven?

Never did a people have such a multitude of evidences as this generation; consequently, those that reject now, sin against greater light. All the literal fulfillment of God's declarations in the past, for six thousand years, now clothes the last lingering message ringing in the ears of a sleepy church and a guilty world, with a strength and majesty unlike any that hath preceded it, for grandeur and power, to move and convince all that can be, by this great God-designed and heaven-instituted dispensational truth.

For many years God permitted me to enjoy a love for holiness, and the institutions of the gospel; but when I heard the "gladly solemn sound" of the coming of the Just One, it did most truly stir my heart to see that Jesus was coming to wake his sleeping saints, and receive them to himself; instead of going, promiscuously, at death. Now I understand, I humbly trust, those seemingly dark passages—David is not ascended into the heavens—no man hath ascended up to heaven—we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent (or go before) those which are asleep—till the heavens be no more they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep. Now I can see a beauty in the Holy Scriptures. My mind was always gloomy, when thinking of departed friends, whom I had every reason to believe were lost, and wailing amid the damned in hell. Now, thank God, the true light shineth. The unjust are reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished! What then? An everlasting destruction awaits them. Truly, God's ways are right, notwithstanding the traditions of the elders, who try, with a zeal worthy a better cause, to make it otherwise. Death to the soul that sinneth, is written by the mandate of heaven, and death it will be. Then the wickedness of the wicked will come to an end. Amen.

Thanks to God for light on his word; and love, and joy, and peace, and confidence in believing. O, what beauty I now see in God's holy and blessed word! I stand in awe, and long to save my fellow mortals, who are exposed to death. God assist me to convert sinners from the error of their ways, that I may save souls from death, is my prayer.

Truly, everything speaks in most encouraging terms, to the tried and tempted ones. We were brought out from our former association, by the preaching of that good old man, Wm. Miller. It was as necessary, in my opinion, that a people should be separated from the time-serving organizations of this day, as it was that Luther should be in his day. Luther's associates would and did oppose him; ours did and do oppose us. It is not purely the time that now keeps us distinct; but the fact that we do believe that the next event is the coming of the Lord, and, in addition, the difference of opinion on the unconscious state, and the destruction of the finally impenitent.

I by no means intend to justify all that I have said or done, or ascribe to the Infinite mine own and others' inconsistencies. I confess most humbly; others must do as they think right and proper.

May God in mercy keep me from placing too light an estimate on the truths that have separated me, with many others, from the world, and caused us to bear taunts and scoffs from many of whom we should expect better conduct. Yea, how much clerical scoffing have we read and heard, for simply setting our watch a few short moments in advance of time. I do not wish to be presumptuous, nor do I believe God can be pleased with such as are. But I do most conscientiously believe, where a person is sincere, and believes, with all the heart, the coming of the loved One, God is much better pleased with such, than he is with those very cool, calculating ones, that ever and anon we hear whining, "O, I believe as much in the coming of Christ as you do;" and as soon as they get out of debt, plunge into fresh speculation, and cry, "O, I do wish I could help the cause!" Away with such inconsistencies! Show us works corresponding with faith, such as God's word evidently demands, and be content with laying up treasure in heaven.

For one, I must, for the present, after prayerful, serious, calm deliberation, maintain an identity with the unpopular doctrine of no life out of Christ, and a firm, uncompromising belief that the truth of God has made me separate, for believing and preaching the immediate coming of his Son. Correspondence.

From L. A. D.

To the Children scattered abroad:—I love you all as children of one family—heirs together of the same blessed inheritance—lonely travelers to the kingdom of our God,—a company who are to be sanctified through the truth, and made ready for his kingdom by strict obedience to his blessed word. What does his word teach us to do? To "fear God and keep his commandments." For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, for they are not grievous. No, thank his dear name, I have found it easy to keep them, and bear the cross of Christ, when I was willing to keep humble at the feet of Jesus; then, truly, the yoke of Christ is easy, and his burden light; and I mean by his divine assistance to bear it till he calls me to himself, and I have strong faith to believe that will be ere long.

Come, dear children, lift up your heads and rejoice, for his coming draweth near. We have no time to lose, or spend in any other way, than shall be for the glory of God, in the advancement of his holy cause. It will not do to stand still now, and look on to see others work; but to work for God ourselves should be our daily employment. Not spend all our time and talents in worldly affairs, or hoarding up something to be burned when our blessed Lord shall come. God grant we may one and all be up and doing something in the vineyard of our Master, that when he comes we may each have it said unto us, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

In the midst of all my afflictions I find it safe and good to trust in God, for he careth for us: and, what is better than all, now that we have found peace in him, he will never leave or forsake us, unless we first forsake him. Then let us never cease striving and praying, and fighting the good fight of faith, till we obtain eternal life through Christ.

From Jane E. Stevens.

Readers of the Crisis:—Being often refreshed and stimulated to greater diligence in the cause of my Master, by reading our valuable, sweet-spirited, instructive paper, "The Crisis," I feel always like confessing what a blessing it is to me; at which you will not be surprised, when I tell you I am not favored with any other means of hearing what I believe to be a pure Gospel. Time has been when the number professing to love the appearing of our Lord was large and strong in this city, as I have been told. But now, alas! few indeed are known to feel sympathy with the despised but sincere believers in this blessed hope and promise, that he would come again—He whom absent, we love; whom not having seen, we adore.

Dear Fellow Pilgrims—I am not seeking the honor that comes from the world, nor do I covet the friendship of the world; for we are told that the friendship of the world is the enemy of God. I want the honor that comes from above. I am striving for the victory that overcomes the world, even our faith.

I rejoice that I ever found the Lord to the satisfaction of my soul, and having found the Lord precious, I desire a continuance of his favor, and to be made a partaker of his holiness. I have no greater desire than to be dead indeed to the world, and alive to God. I intend thus to live, not depending on my own strength or wisdom, for my own strength is such perfect weakness that I am sure I must fail without I look to the Lord, and by faith adopt the language of Paul, and say, I can do all things through Christ strengthening me.

The last year has been one of trial, perplexity and spiritual depression; but I have tried to remember the promise, that I should not be tempted above what I was able to bear. I have been comforted with the words, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life." I want the crown of life. I want a healthy constitution. I want eternal life, and to hear my Father say, "Well done," for which I am watching and praying, and feel assured it is not labor in vain in the Lord.

Bro. Grant:—How sweet the thought, and how glorious the prospect, that ere long God will redeem his people. In the midst of perilous times, and false doctrines of men, let us remember the words of the Savior—"Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Pilgrims, who are care-worn and weary, be patient; for God will fulfill all his promises to his people. Be faithful a few days, and shortly the little flock will be gathered home.

I am glad that my heart was made willing to receive the great truth of a future life, and immortality through Jesus, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. May we live in such a manner that we may be found among those to whom the King will say—"Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

Bro. Grant:—I have attended Baptist meetings for a time past, but it does not satisfy my hunger. I long for that preaching which presents the Word in simple purity. How my heart aches to hear preaching that condemns the Word instead of sustaining it! Three times this winter my soul has been fed; three times have we been twenty miles to hear the Word preached in Poultney. O that some true follower of Christ would come to Hebron!

There has been a stranger preaching here for more than a week. The first, second, and third time I heard him, I thought he had a part of the truth, and was seeking for more; but he failed, and in failing he destroyed all the heart-searching truth he had uttered. He preached the Savior near and coming in the clouds of heaven with his angels, the dead raised, the living changed, the earth and all changed and fitted for the home of the redeemed; in a word, the kingdom of Christ not mental, internal, invisible, but a kingdom in reality. Last evening, the 25th, he preached from these words,—"For I know that my Redeemer liveth."—Job 19: 25. He said,—"This is a secret, yet it is revealed." He also read—"Though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." He translated it thus,—"Yet in his flesh or spirit, as it may be rendered;" also, that "dying is going home; when saints die, they are carried by angels up to paradise." "He shall come with ten thousand of his saints." "The ten thousand here does not mean ten thousand, it means all." Also, "God will or did come incarnate in the person of his Son." There was enough more like those. But my heart sickens as I think of the way they handle the word of God.

There are many in this place that would be willing listeners to the truth if there was one to proclaim it.

Bro. Grant:—The Quarterly Conference, at Elkport, Iowa, has passed, and good results will be manifest, we hope, in the future. Bro. Y. Higgins principally preached. The state of things was bad, and the preaching seemed to have the most weight on the non-professor. He remained there a few days, then commenced a meeting at Little York, the 24th of Feb., and continued until March 1st. The meeting commenced with a short notice, and under very unfavorable circumstances, but we were under the necessity of getting a larger place for the meeting, as the regular place would not hold the people. A great interest was manifested to hear the word of God. As the present result of the meeting, I had the happy privilege of burying two with Christ in baptism. One was a sister seventy-seven years old, who had lived fifty years in disobedience. If these lines should meet the eyes of any such, follow her example of obedience before it is too late.

Brethren, pray that the preached word may bring forth fruit to the glory of God. The Macedonian cry is from all directions—"Come over and help us!"

From F. Douglas.

Bro. Grant:—I take it for granted that you are always glad to hear from any person who may feel desirous of communicating to you any benefit that he or she has derived from the reading of your excellent paper. 'Tis true, less than one year ago I was a stranger to your paper, and the doctrines advocated by its numerous contributors. The fore part of last winter I visited some friends at Oneida Lake, in this county. I found the inhabitants of that usually quiet community in a state of religious excitement. The true cause of this unusual stir in religious matters was soon made known to me. The good Lord sent Bro. C. B. Turner there, to proclaim the gospel of the kingdom, in the second coming of Christ, as the final Judge of the world, as also immortality only through Christ, and that by a resurrection from the dead. I was at this time a lukewarm professor. I thought I was better off out of church than in it, and when I opened the Bible and read its sacred contents, there were apparent contradictions; my mind would become beclouded, and I would shut the book with a chilled heart. I had a desire to hear this preacher of strange doctrines. The Sabbath following my arrival, the Lord favored me with the privilege; and as the burning truth fell from his lips, my heart was strangely warmed, and my prejudices, though strong at first, became so modified, that I firmly resolved to search the Scriptures, and see if these things were so. Bro. Turner preached every evening during the week, having for his opponents two diplomatised ministers, whose lexicons failed to prove that man has an immortal, never dying soul. The more the matter was discussed, the brighter the truth shone; and the stronger my convictions that the Bible guaranteed to man a future life, through Christ, by a literal resurrection from the grave, of such as should be lying in the arms of death at his coming; and the changing of the righteous living, who, with the righteous dead, "will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air," while the finally wicked will reap the "blackness of darkness" in the "second death."

Ever since that time, my mind has been grasping after Bible truth. Through the silent watches of the night, as well as at mid-day, my thoughts have dwelt upon religious matters, to the exclusion (for a long time) of almost everything else. I am a firm believer in the doctrines you advocate, and I am able to give a reason for the hope that is in me. I have received the last four numbers of your paper, and find much instruction in perusing its columns. The last communication from Bro. Turner cheered my heart. The Lord bless him, and may he be faithful to his high calling. I love him as a brother, because it was through his instrumentality I was led to see the sandy foundation upon which I stood. My feet are now planted upon the "Rock of ages," for whose coming and kingdom I earnestly pray.

I am teaching school this winter, and the family with whom I board are very excellent, pious Presbyterians. I am blessed with many christian privileges, but I do not hear the gospel preached as I find it in the Bible. I have much liberty in speaking and praying in prayer meetings, which are held every evening. My trust is in the Lord, and I expect to receive still greater light, for it is my prayer that the Lord would show me the path of duty, and give me grace sufficient to walk therein.

Bro. Grant, I pray the good Lord to speed you on in your blessed work of enlightening the minds of the people on religious subjects.

From Eld. J. T. Ongley.

Bro. Grant:—I am anxious to have the Crisis in this neighborhood. It is a new place, and quite an interest is manifest. The truth is getting a strong hold on the minds of the people, but opposition rages. I am now at another new place, where there has not been any Advent preaching, except once or twice by Father Wilson, some seven years ago. Four weeks ago I preached one discourse on the Christian's Hope, and quite an interest was manifest, and left an appointment for last evening. Found the roads so bad that it was impossible to get through in time for any meeting. Left my wagon and harness, mounted my horse, and reached the place in time to find the school-house nearly full of people waiting.

At that time I lost my horse, and not being able to walk a great deal, owing to poor health, I cannot labor as I have done; and am at a stand to know what is best to do. My prayer is, good Lord, direct, and open the way for me. If it is duty for me to still proclaim the blessed truths of the soon coming King, I think the way will be opened. There are some brethren that are owing me some little for books, etc., which, if I had, would help me.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Kennebunk, Me., April 8th, 1859, Mrs. Mary E., wife of Capt. Lewis Wormwood, aged forty-nine years.

Sister Wormwood suffered much during her sickness, but bore her sufferings with christian patience and resignation. For several years she was troubled with a cancer in the breast, which was taken out Nov. last, by Dr. Lord, of Portland, after which time her sufferings were almost unparalleled until her death. She fell asleep in hope of being raised to an incorruptible life at the coming of Christ.

Her funeral was attended by the writer. Discourse from Heb. 4. 9.—"There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God."

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Per steamship city of Baltimore, from Liverpool March 30th.

In Parliament, Lord Malmesbury made some explanations in regard to Lord Cowley's mission. He expressed a hope that peace would be maintained. There was less confidence felt at Paris, Vienna and Turin, where warlike preparations continue.

The meeting of the new European Congress has been fixed for the 1st of May, probably at Baden. It will be attended by five Cabinet Ministers, viz.: Malmesbury, from England; Walewski, from France; Gotchakoff, from Russia; Buol, from Austria, and Schemit from Prussia. The Italian States will be indirectly represented. The English Government is said to have given its consent for the admission of Sardinia. Also, that Lord Cowley will assist Malmesbury, and M. Drouyn De Huys act as second to Walewski.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times says, that although Austria consents to attend the Congress, she has no belief that peace will be maintained, and therefore continues her armaments.

The latest advices are that while Piedmont will have a seat in Congress, she will not have a vote, and that other Italian States will be admitted on the same conditions.

All the war material recently prepared, such as artillery projects, clothing, tents, etc., were to be stored at Lyons and Marseilles.

Paris letter writers state that armaments were going on in France without relaxation. The government had also decided upon adding a fourth battalion to each of the hundred regiments of the line.

Count Cavour writes to the Sardinian Ambassador at London, in reply to a question propounded by the British government, that it will be impossible for Sardinia to remain defenceless in the face of the provoking and armed attitude of Austria.

It is computed that, by the close of March, Austria will have in Lombardy seventy battalions infantry, which, added to artillery, cavalry, engineers, etc., would make her army in Italy number about 220,000 strong.

Letters from Piacenza announce that 1200 Austrians, with fifty cannon and other war munitions, had arrived there. The church had been converted into a flour magazine. Warlike preparations were also going actively forward in other portions of Italy.

It was rumored in Paris on the 28th that a collision had actually taken place in Lombardy between an Austrian detachment and some recruits who wished to escape the service. One killed and several wounded.

It is officially announced in Germany that the Federal Assembly has voted supplies for arming fortresses.

Prince Frederick of Wurtemburg has been appointed Commander-in-Chief Eighth Federal Corps d'Armee.

There is nothing of political importance from India.

RUSSIA.

A disagreeable sensation has been produced in official circles at St. Petersburg by the declaration of the committee of the government of Tiver respecting emancipation, that the nobility express the opinion that this reform is to ruin the Russian nobles. The committee demand recompense for the lands ceded to the peasants, and advise the nobility to break off all communication with them. The document indicates a profound sentiment of bitterness and irritation.

Per Europa. From Liverpool April 2d.

FRANCE.

Count Cavour is reported to have reached Paris full of doubt and misgivings, but after his interviews with the Emperor he became quite buoyant, and according to rumor had declared that he had then no apprehension of the future, and in fact that he was master of the situation.

Cavour was believed to be bent on war, and it was reported that he would not leave Paris till the admission of Piedmont to the Congress was settled one way or the other.

A second division of the army of Algeria was shortly to arrive at Marseilles.

PRUSSIA.

Advices from Berlin state that the Prussian government intends demanding from the Chambers a credit of twelve millions thalers, for increasing the Navy and improving the defences of the coasts of the Baltic and the North Sea.

Austria had objected to the Peace Congress meeting at Baden. France had left the choice of town to Austria. Piedmont is not to be admitted as a great power, but on similar conditions to other Italian States. Count Cavour left Paris for Turin on the 30th.

DOMESTIC.

A Battle with Indians.—New York, April 16.—A New Orleans despatch says that Captain Ford's company of Texan Rangers, numbering forty-seven, had been surrounded by 800 Indians in the north of the State, and a desperate battle ensued, in which Ford and four of his men cut their way through the Indians. Great excitement prevails on the frontier, and large companies will proceed in search of the Indians.

Mexico.—Washington, April 16.—New Orleans papers of the 11th contain details of Mexican news by the Tennessee. The Liberal army, 13,000 strong, nearly surrounded the city of Mexico, and had succeeded in cutting off supplies, provisions and water. A capitulation is expected to take place soon; if not, a great battle is anticipated, both armies being reinforced. The liberals are confident of success. The whole country is in a deplorable condition.

Thurston, the Æronaut.—Adrian, Mich., March 8th.—The remains of Ira J. Thurston, the Æronaut, who met his death in the unfortunate ascension from this city, on the 16th of September last, were accidentally found on Sunday evening last, about ten miles from the place of his second ascent. The remains were brought to this city and fully identified.

Destruction of St. Peter's College by a Landslide.

All who are familiar with the city of Troy know Mount Ida, the beautiful but treacherous hill lying to the eastward of the town. Since the year 1845, the Trojans have been timid respecting these landslides—the one occurring in that year having left such terrible marks that, to this day, Troy is looked upon somewhat in the same light as the villages standing at the foot of Vesuvius. In the slide of 1845 a mass of the mountain, many thousand tons in weight, gave way with a most terrible crash. In a moment streets, houses and human beings were covered. Men and women were overtaken flying. Many were smothered in their beds. The slide occurred early in the morning. The whole city was engaged exhuming the dead and rescuing the living. One woman was found dead in bed with two children in her arms. Another was bent over a stove, half consumed. A man had been sawing wood; the avalanche overtook him before he could drop the saw, which fell under him, and in his struggles the instrument cut him nearly in two. Many other equally terrible incidents were connected with it; and under the circumstances, it will create no astonishment that the old fear has been somewhat awakened by the late occurrence.

St. Peter's College was dedicated on September 19th, 1858, by Bishop M'Closkey, and was intended as one of the handsomest Catholic establishments in the country. Up to this time $25,000 have been expended on it. It was 200 feet in length, and would have been five stories in height. It is situated on a flat surface, about four acres in extent, lying within thirty feet of the slope of the hill, and was reached by a broad flight of steps.

The slide occurred on the morning of March 18th, an immense mass of the hill moving gradually down until it reached the rear wall of the college; here, for a moment, it seemed to pause, but only to gain a new impetus by the accession of a larger avalanche. Through the walls it burst, with a noise that was heard for miles, carrying away the heavy walls and timber like so much paper. The college is a total wreck, so much so, that it has been officially announced that a transfer of the site is to take place to Mount St. Vincent, on the south bank of the Poestenkill Creek. It is a matter of some astonishment to those who are familiar with the terrible effects of these slides, how it ever happened that St. Peter's College was thus located. The hill is now in a very dangerous state; and many of the occupants of the houses in the eastern part of the city are removing to places of greater safety.—Harper's Weekly.

Rules for Traveling.—The following rules are important to travelers, and are not as widely known as could be desired:

It has lately been decided that applicants for tickets on railroads can be ejected from the cars if they do not offer the exact amount of fare. Conductors are not bound to make change.

All railroad tickets are good until used, and other conditions "good for this day only," or otherwise limiting the time of genuineness, are of no account.

Passengers who lose their tickets can be ejected from the cars, unless they purchase a second.

Passengers are bound to observe decorum in the cars, and are obliged to comply with all reasonable demands to show tickets. Standing upon the platform, or otherwise violating a rule of the company, renders a person liable to be put from the train.

No person has any right to monopolize more seats than he has paid for, and any article left in the seat while the owner is temporarily absent, entitles him to the place on his return. The above rules are based upon legal decisions.

For the Crisis.

"Fear not; I am thy Shield."

The christian is fearless, for God is his stay,
And Jesus, the Savior, himself leads the way;
The light of his darkness thy presence shall be,
O, God of our fathers, whose trust is in Thee!

The christian is fearless, for lasting his love;
Firm linked are the fetters that bind him above;
And firm as Mount Zion they ever abide,
Whose trust is our Father, his glory their pride.

The christian is fearless—unfurl'd every sail,
He'll traverse life's ocean unheeding the gale;
Through the spray of its surges, its billows' white foam,
Jehovah will guide him safe, safe to his home.

The christian is fearless—unsheathed is his sword,
He is girded with strength by the arm of the Lord;
When his banner of triumph in vict'ry shall shine,
Great Captain and Leader, the glory is thine!

The christian is fearless—within him is light,
Though shrouded in darkness and blackness of night;
Still the rainbow of promise encircles the throne,
And ne'er has our Shepherd forsaken his own!

The christian is fearless, surrounded by foes;
Though the gall of life's bitterest cup overflows;
Though veiled by the darkness, the promise shall stand,—
Whoso trusts in the Lord is upheld by his hand.

The christian is fearless, though nearing the tomb,
For the torch-light of promise shall light up its gloom;
Christ says, I will raise thee again, do not fear,
Thy Father, thy Portion, thy Savior is near!

The christian is fearless—oh, bless'd be Thy name!
Thou, Jesus, our Savior, art ever the same,
The Shield of thy people thou ever shalt be;
Our trust and our portion are centered in thee!

Spirit of Christ.

"If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."—Rom 8: 9.

Any man, young or old, rich or poor, king or slave, wise or unwise, minister or church member; if he have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his! Without that spirit, your christian name, your observance of the ordinances of the gospel, your fervent prayers, loud exhortations, eloquent sermons, great or small deeds of charity, and persecution and sufferings—are all in vain—you cannot be a christian. Do not be deceived on this point. You are in imminent danger here! This is the fatal rock on which many have wrecked their eternal all.

Do you inquire what it is to possess the spirit of Christ? We answer: it is not some sudden burst of joy that fills the soul in the attitude of prayer, or while hearing the Word preached, or giving the warm exhortation. Such sudden ebullitions of feeling are no certain evidence that we have the spirit of Christ: for the wild fanatic and pleasure-seeking worldling have such feelings; they become uncontrollably happy in their delusions and vain amusements—but have not the spirit of Christ.

The spirit of Christ is the spirit of love, purity, kindness, patience, meekness, benevolence, long suffering, faith, hope, joy, and every other lovely spirit or principle that characterizes the gospel. To have his spirit, those principles must live and reign within us, and govern all our acts. They constitute the "mind of Christ," which, in order to be his, must be in us.

Do we possess this mind, this spirit, or do these heavenly principles dwell within and control us? Are our words moulded and influenced by them? Do they give direction to the meditations of our hearts? and are our works their righteous and precious fruits? If so, then we have the spirit of Christ, and are his; but if not, then we are not his. Let us see well to this matter, that we may be found ready to meet the Lord at his coming, which is nigh, even at the door.

A GRAND BOOK!!

Fables of Infidelity and Facts of Faith.

BY R. PATTERSON.

For a long time I have felt the need of some book on Infidelity which would meet the protean forms in which it now appears, and hurl the gauntlet of truthful and enlightened defiance at the head of ignorant and prejudiced scepticism. I had purposed writing a work on the subject myself, but at length, to my great joy, I find it done to my hand. I have in my library many treatises on the subject, but some are too large, some too small, some too old, some too dull, and though they contain abundance of gold, yet it is not coined ready for circulation.

This book meets the want, and is emphatically the best work on infidelity for the common reader that I have seen. It discusses the question in almost every point of view, takes up one after another of the sceptic's refuges of lies, and scorches them to cinders. Every stroke is like a stroke of lightning. Fact, argument, science, reason, sarcasm and appeal lie scattered through the pages. Geology, theology, ethnology, and many other "ologies" come in for a share of notice, and the objections of infidels to the book of God are shown in their proper light. All will be interested and profited by the perusal of this book, even though they may not agree with or endorse all its minute particulars. It is published in one vol. 12 mo., more than 300 pages, fine clear type and good paper, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sent by mail post paid, on the receipt of 75 cents. Usual discount to agents. For $6 in cash, a dozen copies will be sent by express to any person.

I would also invite attention to the following valuable works, some of which have received the commendation of many of the most learned and pious persons in various religious denominations. All of them will be sent by mail pre-paid to any address on receipt of the price.

"Handling the Word of God Deceitfully."—No. 2.

As stated in my first, the man who has a dishonest heart will show it in his teachings. But the real christian has renounced "deceit," "craftiness," and "dishonesty," "speaking the truth in his heart;" although he may speak erroneously and ignorantly. But to handle the word of God deceitfully, is to use Scripture to prove a point of theology, when it contains no evidence on the subject; or to use a part of a testimony to prove a question, when the whole would disprove it, if quoted; or, to use texts to prove a doctrine to be true, and then to deny the same use of it to others, when they wish to prove something by it which they disbelieve. I have more than once seen this done on these texts:—Rev. 6: 9, 10; Rev. 20: 4,—"Souls under the altar," "souls of them that were beheaded." And Rev. 22: 9,—"I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets." These have been quoted, and strongly urged, as proof of the conscious state of the dead, by those in high standing as theologians; but when Spiritualists have used the same texts to prove their views, and Post-Millennialists use Rev. 20: 4, to prove a spiritual resurrection, in controversy with the same writers, they have argued to prove that Rev. 6: 9, 10, was a symbol of the waiting condition of the slain martyrs; and that in Rev. 20: 4, the souls represented real persons resurrected, and not in a state separate from their bodies; and that the souls had been dead, until the resurrection.

Again, that the man in Rev. 22: 9, was not the spirit of an old prophet, but a "fellow-servant of the prophets"—an angel that labored for man's salvation with the prophets. Surely, a right heart could not use both these theories, unless a conversion had taken place, and this we had no reason to believe. I have seen it argued that the rapping spirits could not be good, because God had forbidden his children consulting the dead; and if so, it would be a sin to disobey. Therefore it must be sin for the spirit of a good man to attempt to communicate with men in the flesh. Yet the same men argue that good old Samuel did come and talk with Saul, (without sinning of course,) and Saul was much to blame—God-forsaken, a most wicked man. Yet "to-morrow" to die and be with Samuel. There is a whole basket-full of such, but I leave it for another subject.

It is often argued by popular teachers, that Matt. 24: 34—"This generation shall not pass," etc., referred to the generation living when Christ was here, and the "things," to the overthrow of the city of Jerusalem; and yet the same ones will jealously quote the thirty-eighth verse to some of us who speak of knowing something of the time of Christ's coming to judge the world,—"But of that day and hour knoweth no man."

I have heard it strenuously advocated by a very popular teacher, that no man could properly be an Elder in the church of Christ unless he had a wife; and if she die, his eldership must cease; that he must also be the father of children, or not be an elder. It was attempted to prove this by 1 Tim. 3: 2, 4,—"The husband of one wife," . . . . "having his children in subjection." Had he not handled God's word deceitfully, he could not have attempted such an effort; and had he known himself, and been honest, believing the sixth verse, "Not a novice, but being lifted up with pride, he fell into the condemnation of the devil;" perhaps much mischief would have been prevented, which his labors have caused.

With much force it has also been argued that it was the duty of all christians to sell out their possessions, and have all things common; and as proof of this, Acts 4: 34–37 is quoted. Many who do not think for themselves, and are told that it was a christian requirement, are thrown into confusion by this deceitful handling of the word of God. To give it more force, chap. 5: 1–8 is quoted, to show that Ananias and Sapphira were killed by the Lord, because they kept back part of the price. Let this be read, and we find no command was given to sell their all; no such requirement was made. Neither did these die because they did not give all into the public purse; but because they deceived, and "lied unto God." Peter tells them "it was in their own power." The action of the church was voluntary, to make what they thought the best use of their means; and as they continually expected Jerusalem to be destroyed, and Judea overcome with the enemy, they wished to be ready to "flee" from it with all speed. But, as the record of Paul's labors shows, it was a premature act, though kindly done, and perhaps turned to a good account; but the desolation of Judea did not take place for some years, and the church at Jerusalem became poor, destitute and [illegible]. Paul says he robbed (took [illegible]) other churches to supply them. He begged for them, and they were supplied by the [illegible] by their liberality.

Future Punishment.

BY J. PARKER.

"These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."—Matt. 25: 46.

We will notice, in the first place, the necessity of a Revelation, to make known a future state of existence, future rewards and punishments connected with such a state.

Without an authentic and reliable revelation from the Divine Being, we are utterly in the dark one single step beyond the grave! Cast adrift on an unfathomable and unbounded ocean, without a chart, a compass, or an helm; left to the flounderings of a bewildered imagination; and tossed on the billows of doubt, anxiety and despair.

Is it possible that God has left his creatures in such a hopeless state; that he has denied them any knowledge of a future world? If so, we may reasonably conclude that there is no such state of existence, or he would have given us some intimations of it; and yet, nature reveals no such secrets, that can be relied on, so as to constitute a reasonable ground for faith to build on.

Men have not been contented in this state of uncertainty; and have invented to themselves innumerable theories, in a vain effort to fathom this dark abyss; and these phantoms of imagination only serve to bewilder us the more, in an interminable chaos of absurdities. In the midst of all this confusion, worse confounded, the Bible is presented to us as a revelation sent from God.

It is not my intention now, to enter into an elaborate argument to prove the authority of the scriptures of the Old and New Testament; this has been done by abler hands than mine. All I have to say on this subject is, that if the Bible is not what it professes to be, it is utterly in vain to seek truth elsewhere. Every effort that is made to weaken our faith in this book, as a revelation from God, is most cruel and inhuman, unless something better and more reliable is given in the place of it; which, I hesitate not to say, has not been done for nearly six thousand years. I mean to cleave close to this sacred book, till some one can substitute a better. I take no leap in the dark—hold on to the last plank, and perish thus, if it must be so—rather than relinquish my present hope of immortality, as the gift of God, through faith in Jesus Christ, by a resurrection from the dead, at the judgment of the great day, when the wicked "shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."

That the Scriptures reveal the fact of future punishment, few will be bold enough to deny. There is a distinction kept up between the righteous and the wicked, between those who love and serve God, and those who will have none of his ways. There can be no amalgamation here, and though they may be permitted to live together in this world, they will be separated, as tares from the wheat, in the world to come. We hear a great deal in the present day of progress; but the progress of the wicked is downward; evil men and seducers wax worse and worse. This is the sort of progress the antediluvians made, when men lived eight and nine hundred years. There were giants in the earth in those days—giants in wickedness, oppression and violence; so that it became necessary to destroy that generation, and to shorten the life of man to three score years and ten—space and time enough for repentance, but not for centuris' growth in wickedness. Look at "Young America," in our day. Our government is not yet one hundred years old, and should it make a like progress in another century, in corruption, fraud, luxury and dissipation, it will long ere that be as ripe for destruction as ever Sodom was.

If there is one truth more clear than another in the word of God, it is this:—"The wicked shall not go unpunished," either in this world or the world to come.

Now we come to inquire into the nature and extent of future punishment. Our heading plainly declares the extent of it—it is everlasting, eternal! The same word, in the original, is here applied both to the eternal life of the righteous, and to the eternal punishment of the wicked, and ought to have been thus translated. These shall go away into eternal punishment, and the righteous into life eternal.

As to the nature of future punishment, our text does not inform us, only as to its duration. We must go elsewhere to get information on this head. The context indeed declares, in the 41st verse, that the King will say to those on his left hand—"Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," (or, as we should say, agents.) But eternal, or unquenchable fire, would, in the nature of things, utterly destroy and consume everything cast into this destructive element, as chaff, thorns and tares. The fire being everlasting, and not to be quenched, seems to indicate that there could be no possible time or circumstances, where the finally ungodly could escape punishment.

There are three prominent opinions on the subject of future punishment, that demand our attention; I shall briefly notice each of them.

First. That the wicked are to suffer eternal conscious torture, either in literal fire, or in [illegible] remorse and despair. Strange to say, this is the Orthodox doctrine, in the noon of the nineteenth century! This is the creed of nearly all of the self-styled evangelical churches, as well as the church of Rome. Countless millions of our race do now, and will forever exist, in unutterable woe, cursing God, each other, and themselves; and increasing in guilt and misery throughout all eternity! The wickedness of the wicked will never come to an end! Surely such a system as this cannot originate in heaven; it is more akin to the malignity of satan than to the love and mercy of God! It is revolting to the best feelings of human nature, to dictates of reason, justice, holiness and truth. It is in direct contrast to the character of God, as revealed in his word and works. "He retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy." "God is love."

What sort of love is that which creates innumerable multitudes of creatures, for no other purpose than to torment them forever, and take pleasure in their agony and woe? The most implacable monster in the universe would not thus treat his bitterest foe! No cruel mortal would thus treat a mad dog, but as speedily as possible put him out of his misery.

It is not to be wondered at, that this idea of future punishment should produce a reaction in the minds of men who dare think for themselves; and, as we are, in cases like this, always prone to extremes, it is more than probable that many, in their examination of this subject, are driven to the opposite extreme, and try to persuade themselves that there is, in reality, no future punishment, or at most, only for a limited duration; and that by no means extreme. This brings me to notice

Secondly. Universalism, or final restoration.

Some "Universalists" do not believe in any future punishment at all, but hold the opinion that the consequences of sin and guilt, in this world, bring their own punishment with them, thus: "Can a man put fire in his bosom, and not be burned?"

Others allow a degree of future retribution, for deeds done in the body, but they consider this discipline always reformatory, and that it will terminate in universal salvation. This is somewhat similar to the purgatory of the church of Rome, except as it is applied to all, and not merely to the faithful. I must confess that this system is a great improvement on the former; and, if it could only be proved from the Bible, thousands would be glad to embrace it.

But here is the difficulty; there, it is neither asserted or implied; but, on the contrary, our text, and many others in like manner, plainly declare that the punishment of the finally impenitent is everlasting, eternal, without end! Now, may there not be a middle way between these two extremes, where we may find the truth? Even virtue has its sacred limits; which, not being strictly observed, it ceases to be virtue. Hence the proverb, "The extreme of virtue is vice." What are we seeking for? We want something that will vindicate the justice of God, in the punishment of sin; and, at the same time, put a final end to sin, sorrow and death. Is there such a system revealed in the Scriptures? This, after all, is our only rule for faith and practice. "If they speak not according to this word, . . . there is no life in them."

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 20.

My Dear Sister:—I must confess that it was somewhat consoling to me, when I found that such a great and good man as Stephen Olin had suffered, at times, the same feeling of deep mortification which has been such a source of painfulness and embarrassment to me for many years. Most heartily could I subscribe to the following incident.

"He (Stephen Olin) at this time occupied the Methodist pulpit of that city, and the next Sunday evening his chapel was crowded with the elite of the community, including several clergymen. He preached long, and, as he thought, badly and confusedly; in fine, he felt, at the close of the discourse, confounded with mortification. He sank, after the benediction, into the pulpit, to conceal himself from view, till the assembly should all be gone. By and by he espied some eminent individuals, apparently waiting in the aisle to salute him. His heart failed him. Noticing a door adjacent to the pulpit, he determined to escape by it. He knew not whither it led, but supposed it had communication with the next house, which had once been a parsonage, as he recollected having heard. He hastened to the door, got it open, and stepping out, descended abruptly into a graveyard, which extended beyond and behind the former parsonage. The night was very dark, and he stumbled about among the tombs for some time. He reached at last the wall which closed the cemetery in front the street, but found it insurmountable. Groping his way to the opposite side, he sought to reach a back street by penetrating through one of the gardens which belonged to a range of houses there. It was an [illegible] endeavor [illegible] though in these he was assailed by an house dog. Having prevailed in this encounter, he pushed on and reached the street, with some very reasonable apprehensions that the neighborhood would be alarmed by his adventures. He now threaded his way through an indirect route to his lodgings, passed unceremoniously to his chamber, and shut himself up for the night, but slept little or none, reflecting with deep chagrin on the strange conclusion of the day. On the morrow he hardly dared to venture out; but, while yet in his study, Mr. ——, one of the first citizens in Charleston, and a leading officer in a sister denomination, called at the house; he was admitted to the preacher's study with reluctance; but what was the astonishment of the latter to hear him say that the sermon of the preceding evening had enabled him to step into the kingdom of God, after many years of disconsolate endeavors, during which he had been a member of the church. The same day, a lady of influential family came to report the same good tidings. Other similar examples occurred that morning, and this failure was one of the most useful sermons of his life."

The following incident in the life of Bishop Asbury shows that great and good men are tempted to abandon their work because of discouragements. Says the writer, "The worth of souls lay near his heart, and he was not satisfied unless he was conscious sinners were awakened and converted through his instrumentality. Once, after having traveled hard through a western wilderness to reach a quarterly meeting, on his way to a distant conference, he was unusually tempted at not having seen for some time any direct evidence of his personal labor in the conversion of souls. He felt inclined to the belief that his mission had expired, and he had better retire from the work. With this depression of spirit he entered the love feast on Sabbath morning, in a rude log chapel in the woods, and took his seat, unknown to any one, in the back part of the congregation. After the usual preliminary exercises had been gone through with by the preacher, an opportunity was given for the relation of christian experience. One after another testified of the saving grace of God, and occasionally a verse of some hymn was sung, full of rich and touching melody. The tide of religious feeling was rising and swelling in all hearts, when a lady rose, whose plain but exceedingly neat attire indicated that she was a Methodist. Her voice was full and clear, though slightly tremulous. She had traveled many miles to the meeting, and her feelings would not allow her to repress her testimony. She remarked that she had not long been a follower of Christ. 'Two years ago,' said she, 'I was attracted to a Methodist meeting in our neighborhood, by being informed that Bishop Asbury was going to preach. I went, and the Spirit sealed the truth he uttered on my heart. I fled to Jesus, and found redemption in his blood, even the forgiveness of my sins; and have been happy in his love ever since.' She sat down, and, ere the responses which her remarks had awakened in all parts of the house had died away, Bishop Asbury was on his feet. He commenced by remarking that he was a stranger and a pilgrim, halting on his way for rest and refreshment in the house of God, and that he had found both; 'and,' said he, with uplifted hands, while tears of joy coursed each other down his face, 'if I can only be instrumental in the conversion of one soul in traveling round the continent, I'll travel round it till I die.'" Yours as ever, M. D. W.

Exercising.

"Live for something; be not idle,
Look about thee for employ;
Sit not down to useless dreaming—
Labor is the sweetest joy."

They don't exercise enough physically. Ministers, editors, students,; male and female. Sedentaries are perishing for want of regular, systematic, every day exercise in the open air.

We saw a few days since a beloved student preparing for the ministry, feeble in body and in mind for want of some three or four hours daily, energetic exercise. He looked feeble, was feeble, sickly, dyspeptic; his system was gradually undermining, and ere long we fear an early grave! The spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak. This dear brother, with multitudes in like circumstances, is committing suicide—may be, ignorantly, unconsciously, and yet none the less certain. There are scores of feeble, sickly, pale-faced ministers in our city, dying by inches! Nature demands this regular systematic, daily, physical exercise. She cries out for it importunately, and repeatedly, louder, and louder, and if not heard and obeyed, the lash must come, sure to come. We know this to be true from sad experience. Our choicest, golden prime was sacrificed. A too close application to study, without sufficient out-door exercise, was suicidal. When too late, alas! for recovery of former vigor, strength of nerve, and useful, active mental life, we discovered our mistake, and our folly; consequently by this one improvident step of disobedience to the calls of nature, we go limping, halting, quivering with the multitudes all our life, with one foot in the grave, comparatively useless.

Friends, will you lend a listening ear to the entreaties of a dead man still in the land of the living?

By disobeying the laws of our being, during our preparatory course of study, we suffered ten years under the [illegible] actively engaged in God's service, [illegible] a healthy body, physical strength. Our bodies are God's—our souls, our all; and we have no right to abuse them. What says the apostle, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." 1 Cor. 3: 16.

Reader, hearest thou this, and will you obey God; the God of grace, the God of nature, and the calls of nature? Wake up, rouse up out of your musty domicils, up, out, inhale the fresh air of heaven—grasp the axe, the saw, the plane, the hoe, the shovel, the pitchfork, anything good for labor, in the workshop, vigorously, in the gardens, the fields, the forests, anywhere; up stairs, down stairs, in the garret, in the cellar. Walking merely, will not suffice, every part of the system requires renovation and perspiration. Nothing short of some three or four hours regular, daily, laborious exercise, will meet the demand of the system.

The celebrated Lyman Beecher, now past three score and ten, we are informed, had heaps of sand in his cellar, and when no better exercise offered to renovate his system, he would retire to his cellar, and shovel these heaps of sand from one side of the cellar to the other vigorously, till perspiration flowed freely.—Golden Rule.

Fruits as Food.

So far as I am acquainted, it has been customary among us, until within a few years, to eat fruit of most kinds at all times and hours of the day, whenever the appetite, however capricious, seemed to dictate. Seldom, if ever, till quite recently, has it been eaten as a part of our meals, like the soup, the fish, or the potato. When used at the table, it has been as an adjunct, and not as a principal dish; or, at most, as a dessert. Thus, baked sweet apples, or berries, with milk or raisins, apples, grapes, oranges, figs, or the like, have been used as a dessert, time immemorial. But within a few years, the custom of having fruit at the table, from the first of our sitting down, and of regarding it as a principal dish, has been gaining ground very fast. It began with the rich; but has been followed, to a greater or less extent, by other classes. It is hoped and believed that what is so well begun will in a few years be perfected. Should the potato continue diseased, I am not without the hope that the apple may be its substitute. It differs, of course, in its properties, from that excellent and long-tried friend; and yet, on the whole, would probably be almost as valuable. And, by proper management, it could be had, at all times of the year, in nearly as good condition as the potato.

It will doubtless take some time so to fasten upon the public mind the idea that fruits are food, as to give to the apple a standing and character among us similar to that which the potato now sustains. For there will not then, at first, be any place for our acrid condiments,—our mustard, pepper, saleratus, etc.,—or even our sugar and salt. Habit, as you know, is exceedingly powerful. Sugar, milk, molasses—and perhaps certain sauces—we might indeed soon learn to relish on our fruit; for some advancement in this department has been made already. But, to learn to relish apples, or strawberries, or peaches, when well besprinkled with mustard or cayenne, or well permeated with gravies, or even well showered with salt, will be a work of slower progress. And yet, in the nature of things—apart from custom or fashion—I know of no reason why mustard or pepper are not as well adapted to an apple, baked or raw, or to strawberries or cherries, as to a potato.

Some have endeavored to show that the word which, in the Scriptures, is translated bread, as used in a general sense, might as well mean fruits as farinaceous articles. This certainly may be the Scripture meaning occasionally; but I think it must be but rarely, after all. When the Savior and Paul so often broke bread, can any one believe they had nothing before them but fruit?

Fruits are not so good in the evening as in the early part of the day. We have an old adage, that "Fruit is gold in the morning, silver at noon, and lead at night." In any event, it is best in the early part of the day. If the first meal is not received till ten or eleven o'clock, that is the best time for fruit; but, if the custom of taking a very early breakfast is to be continued, my advice is to use the fruit at the second meal, or dinner.

Those fruits are generally best for health, which, when perfectly ripe, dissolve most readily and completely in the mouth. Those which have thick skins, or large seeds, or hard insoluble masses in the centre, should be eaten with great care, and their doubtful parts rejected. Fruits with stringy pulps are not so good as those whose pulps are more friable and tender.

Fruit, to be useful as food, should be perfect. It should be neither unripe, nor in a state of decay. It should be adapted to the other articles which are conjoined with it, to the temperament and habits of the individual, and to the season of the year in which it is used.

Taken properly, and in the order I have mentioned,—that is, when they are ripe,—they have a tendency to prevent disease. I know that a different opinion has in times past prevailed. But, if fruits ever cause disease, it is when they are imperfect or improperly used; for, if rightly used, they are better as preventives than a whole world of medicinal agents.

Currants, gooseberries and apples, plucked ere they are half ripe, and stewed, or made into pies, are exceedingly common. Many think that cooking, with the addition of sugar and other seasonings, removes their bad qualities and renders them healthy. Now I do not hesitate to say that much more sickness is caused by these unripe fruits after they are cooked than before. In their crude state, uncooked, comparatively few would be eaten. Then, again, cooking only makes unripe fruit soluble, and the addition of condiments renders it agreeable, and tempts us to eat freely of it. But the cooked fruits contain all the noxious ingredients that the raw ones do. The sun, in the process of ripening, may change them to healthy ingredients, but cooking does not and cannot do it. All is included that was included before they were cooked; and to this we have added the mawkish, [illegible] Health.

The Land of Rest.

BY H. L. H.

The land of rest
In outspread beauty now before me lies,
The home of all the ransomed blest
Enchants my longing eyes!

I'm almost there!
From earth's sad toils soon will I be at rest,
In those bright mansions pure and fair,
With peace and glory blest.

I see my home
Beyond earth's scenes of sorrow and of strife;
And there in peacefulness I'll roam
Beside the stream of life!

While passing on,
Fighting the fight of faith, facing each foe,
I long to hear the victor's song—
His holy raptures know.

Fair Paradise
In loveliness and splendor now appears;
Its glorious scenes refresh my eyes,
My weary spirit cheers!

There I shall rest,
Beyond the sea-storm's rage, the battle's wrath,
Where nought but peaceful blessedness
Shall ever cross my path.

Light in Darkness.

BY H. L. HASTINGS.

"Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness."—Ps. 112: 4

(Concluded.)

And how oft have we seen the wrath of man thus made to praise the Lord. In the hour of the saints' extremity the mercy of the Lord has appeared, and just when the wicked were hoping for our downfall, deliverance came. How strangely their schemes were thwarted and their purposes overturned, and on the upright, who in despairing hope had committed his cause to God, how sweetly did light arise out of darkness! Ah! let not the wicked triumph, nor glory while there lives an Omnipresent God who beholdeth the upright with love, and who will not suffer his feet to slide.

And when poverty and sickness come on, when there is but a handful of meal in the barrel, when hunger, and want, and sickness are heaped upon us, when the cold world and a colder church look heedlessly on, when Priest and Levite pass on the other side, how sweetly does the light arise as some dear disciple of the Lord comes to our relief, and when God's wondrous providence supplies our needs, and teaches us, by tokens known to those that trust in God, that "the very hairs of our heads are all numbered." So, too, when the business of this world has bound us in chains or plunged us in sorrow,—when we see no way of escape from the whirlpool that sucks us down,—then how often light ariseth, and the trembling expectation that "the Lord will provide" is changed to the exulting exclamation, "The Lord is my strength and my song—he also is become my salvation."

In nature's last extremity, in the darkness of death's valley, in the gloom of death's shade, in the hovel of adversity, or in the abode of comfort, in the desert, in dens and caves, in the damp and noisome prison-house, in the flame of the faggot fire, or wherever the child of God has met and has struggled with his last enemy, the grim King of Terrors, there has light arisen out of darkness. When all earthly lights are quenching,—when the gloom of despair settles sadly over the wicked, who "are driven away in their wickedness,"—then "the righteous hath hope in his death," and in the certain prospect of a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, he can sweetly fall asleep in Jesus, with the light of hope glancing into the darkness of the sepulchre, and the glory-beams of eternity bursting in auroral splendor along the clouds and gloom of time. Thus "unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness." And we can, with joyful interest, "mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." We may take a broader glance, and view the same principle in the dealings of God with his chosen nation in ancient times.

Egypt was to them a place of darkness,—but light arose, and they bade adieu to bondage and went forth to worship God. The Red sea's border was to them a place of darkness, as Pharaoh urged his infuriate hosts in hot pursuit, but light arose,—the Red sea was divided, and soon they sang the song of victory upon the distant shore. Mizpeh was a place of darkness when Philistia's haughty lords gathered their swarming myriads against repentant Israel, but Samuel prays—unto the upright there ariseth light, peal upon peal of thunder rolls above their heads—lurid lightnings glance among the invading ranks until they flee, and from rejoicing Israel the shout goes up, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." Again, when the countless hosts of the Assyrians gathered around Jerusalem, and the boastful Sennacherib poured forth his insulting blasphemies and threats, it was a time of darkness,—but when God heard the cry of Hezekiah, and his angel went forth and laid an hundred and eighty-five thousand dead upon the plain, and sent the rest affrighted to their homes, then light arose out of darkness, and Israel could rejoice in peace and quietness beneath the divine protection. Babylon was a place of darkness, but when, in the midst of riot and revelry, Belshazzar was slain, the captives who had wept by the Euphrates' waters felt that the chains were bursting, that light was rising, and a voice was saying, as in days of old, "Let my people go!" The cruel decree of Haman overshadowed the nation with gloom,—but light arose—God wrought deliverance by Esther, and the malice of Satan was defeated by the love of God.

We may take a still wider view and comprehend the universal church of Jesus Christ. We see them scattered, oppressed, persecuted, dejected and disconsolate. We see them subjected to innumerable sufferings. We see them in dungeons and affliction. But in all this light ariseth, even the glorious light of hope. The scene of groaning and bondage and oppression will be over,—the agonies and sorrows shall have an end; and when the unjust with their kingdoms, sceptres, diadems and thrones, are ground to powder and swept from the earth as by the besom of destruction, then "the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning." Ps. 49: 14. In that morning, when the light [illegible] away. The curse shall be removed—the power of the oppressor broken—the prince of darkness dethroned, the groaning creation delivered, and Christ, the head of his redeemed and glorified church, shall be enthroned amid the shouts of the rejoicing universe.

Christ hath abolished death, but it is prospectively. Christ hath brought to light life and immortality, but the immortality is not yet "put on," and the life is yet "hid with Christ in God." Now the church is in the gloom of death's sentence, or in the darkness of its execution. Our treasures are in the mouldering tomb—our heart's idols are rotting in loathsome sepulchres—our joys are turned to dust and ashes beneath the valley's clods. Our dearest friends are so vile and putrid that we would not touch them. A nauseous stench comes up from those whose flesh was fresher than a child's. The cheek that glowed with roseate beauty is but a festering mass of filth, and where the eye once glanced in love, the death-worm revels and corruption reigns. And this is death—it has rifled our homes, and slaughtered our friends, and crushed our hopes, and blighted our joys, and made this world a waste and howling wilderness to us. Our eyes are dim with weeping, and our hearts are broken with grief,—and still the work goes on; while we write, he reaches for our heart-strings; while we read, the death-lock of his grasp is upon the friends that we love the best. O how the church of God, for nigh six thousand years, has fallen like sere grain before the mowers' scythe—how few are left,—nothing but the gleanings remain. But shall the sword devour forever? Shall death make an utter end? Is there no healer of the breach,—no deliverer of the captive hosts who have slept in chains so long?

Yes, even here, "unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness. There is death—there shall be RESURRECTION. There is sorrow—there shall be joy. The reign of the destroyer shall cease—the thrall of the monster shall be broken—countless myriads shall emerge from the grave in angelic beauty, and stand forth, glorious before the throne of God. And of prostrate death whose sting is now in every heart, and whose victory is in every dwelling, it shall be inquired in tones of lofty and perpetual triumph, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!"

Such are some of the illustrations of the great truth of light for the upright, which sparkle like stars of brightness along the dreary night of ages past, and which spread like a sea of glory into the illimitable future. The full development of light is future—the exceeding "weight of glory" is yet unrevealed. But it shall be revealed. Out of the darkness of human oppression and misrule shall come a purer era, when the Desire of all nations shall appear, and "He that ruleth over men shall be just, ruling in the fear of the Lord, and he shall be as the shining of a morning without clouds"—as a sun that shall never descend from its meridian brightness to scenes of darkness and of gloom. And in that morning the upright shall have their dominion and their glory; for the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be "given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." The upright, long lost with the troubled tumult of an unrighteous world, shall there find their congenial element in that "new heaven and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." Here the sorrows that have swelled his bosom shall subside, and the rivers of water that run down his eyes "because they keep not the law," shall be forever dried up. The voice of the oppressor shall be heard no more, and the weary captives and bondmen shall be forever free.

The ruinous work which death has carried on, lo, these many centuries, shall be undone "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," and countless myriads, brilliant as dew-drops from the womb of the morn, shall soar to meet the Lord as on the lightning's wing. The ransomed church, in all her congregated glory, shall out-sing the ocean's billows, and the echoes of her lofty anthems shall burst like peals of mighty thunder along the distant heavens.

And if upright, we shall be there! You and I, reader, may prove, after our earthly experience of sorrow, that "unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness." You and I may shine then as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars forever and ever. But are we upright? Are we walking in the fear of God? Have we been pardoned and cleansed from secret faults? Are we then upright in the sight of the Lord? He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness, shall abide in God's tabernacle. The upright shall remain in the land when wicked doers are cut off. Let us see to it that we are upright in heart, and in walk. Let us watch, that we be found in Christ at last. Let us be penitent for our sins, and clad in Christ's righteousness,—so unto the upright light shall arise out of darkness and our sun shall no more go down. Reader, will you be there? Writer, will you be there? Grace be with you all—Amen.

Beautiful Error.

The following poem first appeared some four or five years ago in the Springfield Republican, (Mass.), a secular paper, ably edited by Dr. Holland. It was composed by a lady in Hinsdale, N. H., who writes for the Republican over the signature of "Lizzie Lincoln." It has been much praised, and of late has again been going the rounds of the newspapers generally. Here is the poem, the main sentiment of which I propose dissecting.

OVER THE RIVER.

Over the river they beckon to me,
Loved ones who've crossed to the further side;
The gleam of their snowy robes I see,
But their voices are lost in the dashing tide.
There's one with ringlets of sunny gold,
And eyes the reflection of heaven's own blue—
He crossed in the twilight, gray and cold,
And the pale mist hid him from mortal view;
We saw not the angels who met him there—
The gates of the city we could not see—
Over the river, over the river,
My brother stands waiting to welcome me.

Over the river the boatman pale
Carried another—the household pet;
Her brown curls waved in the gentle gale—
Darling Minnie! I see her yet.
She crossed on her bosom her dimpled hands,
And fearlessly entered the phantom bark;
We felt it glide from the silver sands,
And all our sunshine grew strangely dark.
We know she is safe on the further side—
Where all the ransomed angels be—
Over the river, the mystic river,
My childhood's idol is waiting for me.

For none return from those quiet shores,
Who cross with the boatman cold and pale;
We hear the dip of the golden oars,
And catch a gleam of the snowy sail,
And lo! they have passed from our yearning hearts,
They cross the stream, and are gone for aye.
We may not sunder the vail apart
That hides from our vision the gates of day—
We only know that their barks no more
May sail with us o'er life's stormy sea;
Yet somewhere, I know, on the unseen shore,
They watch and beckon, and wait for me.

And I sit and think, when the sunset's gold
Is flushing river and hill and shore,
I shall one day stand by the water cold,
And list for the sound of the boatman's oar;
I shall watch for a gleam of the flapping sail,
I shall hear the boat as it gains the strand,
I shall pass from sight with the boatman pale,
To the better shore of the spirit land.
I shall know the loved who have gone before,
And joyfully sweet will the meeting be,
When o'er the river, the peaceful river,
The Angel of death shall carry me.

There, now, is what we call a beautiful specimen of error in divine things. But some will wonderingly exclaim, "where is the error? Is not the rhythm perfect? Is not the strain easy and gliding? Is not the conception in the highest style of fancy? Are not the words like the ripple of a summer sea? Is not the whole thing pure and ennobling? Does it not touch the tenderest and noblest chords of the soul, to sing in so sweet a strain of the departed loved ones, and wake the highest aspirations of our nature, to draw so fine and enchanting a picture of that 'better shore,' 'where all the ransomed and angels are? Has not the Independent and the rest of the leading journals copied it, with eulogies on its exquisite and touching beauty as a poem?" Yes. We freely accord all of this praise, and we have read it over and over, as the proof of our sincere admiration. It strikes home. We have all seen, with tearful eyes, some "idol," it may have been "a brother," or our "darling Minnie," enter that "phantom bark," now loosened "from the silver sands." And we have not forgotten how our "sunshine grew strangely dark," nor the bitter grief that begloomed the hour. And did we not vow to meet them at "the gates of the city," and hear the loud welcome of "the angels," and wear with them the "snowy robes?" The piece is very pretty, and it seems a pity to disturb its calm beauty, spoil it by cool criticism, or be obliged to find any fault with the doctrine of the fine authoress. But beauty is less than truth, and all is not gold that glitters; and we must submit the golden fruit to the touch of the finger of inspiration, even if that touch turns it to dust and ashes. Besides, every wise man knows it is just Satan's method of getting good people to swallow the pills of error by coating them all with sugar.

But where is the great error you ask? I reply, in supposing the loved and pious dead to be all safely over death's river, when the fact is, they are all still in the river, and sunk to its very bottom!

Poets and poetesses, we know, are not inspired, but that is no reason why they should not study their Bibles, so that when they rhyme inspiration they may be orthodox, and not "wrest the Scriptures." The poets, as one has said, are the law-makers of a nation, and in this case the popular belief will sustain "Lizzie's" sentiments without doubt. But is the obnoxious idea true or false? Did it never occur to the good sister up in H——, that she is a little too fast? She makes the river, not death, or to be dead, but—dying. So that when once fairly dead they are safe over death's river! As though this life was one shore, the mere event of dying, the river, and to be utterly dead is to gain the other shore! Now against this theory I assert that this mortal life is one shore, and the resurrection life is the other; and, carrying out the figure, the river is death, whose dark waters roll all the way between, deep and cold, and, says Pollock, "villainously still." The view we oppose is as if the resurrection was at death. Were this so, then the two shores would meet, and there be no river at all. If the resurrection be not a fable, and that had come, then the dead would be out of the river; but so long as the Master is not here, the dead will still "sleep in Jesus" down in its black waters. But, alas! how many have mistaken a fog-bank for the resurrection-shore. The loved are still in the river then, and the other shore not yet reached. Don't say this is a chilling view, for the glorious promises shine clear down to the bottom, and the bow of hope gilds the lowly pillows of the dead; and when He comes, they will come up like Israel from the dead sea of death, and the great shout will go up! Don't say they are lost, for Omniscient eyes watch them evermore. Don't say my view is false, till you have first proved that to die means to more than live. It is the Bible view, papers, poets and pulpits to the contrary. Our sister took her eschatology from "Pilgrim's Progress," and has followed, with the rest, the Prince of dreamers instead of the Prince of Life, and her gospel is, therefore, the gospel of Bunyan, and not that of Jesus.

Death may be properly styled a river, but they err, none the less, who draw its type from Jordan. For the word Jordan is composed of two Hebrew words; viz., Jor, which signifies "river," and Dan, which signifies "Judgment of God." It was called by the Hebrews Jor-dan, because it took its rise in the lot or inheritance of the tribe of Dan. So Jordan is the river of Judgment, and not the river of death, as many imagine. It has not in its typology the remotest allusion to death, but the famous passage over Jordan is the grand type of the transit of the church, in a body, over the judgment era, at Christ's coming. As Joshua led Israel over, so Jesus will lead his redeemed over in triumph. As the waters of Jordan, though at their highest (Josh. 4: 15) rise, were dried up at Joshua's command, so that Israel passed over dry shod, so the terrors of the judgment all disappear for us; indeed, there is no judgment for the righteous, only an acquittal. As the people when they had come up out of Jordan entered Canaan, the promised land, so the church of God, at the day of judgment—and not sooner—will enter in upon her reward,—an everlasting kingdom.

But how came men to make Jordan signify death? I answer, they builded one error upon another, and clinging to the dogma of the soul's deathlessness, they forgot, or disregarded the fact that the Scriptures put the judgment at a fixed epoch—an "appointed day"—(Acts 17: 31,) i. e., at Christ's second personal advent; and locate it at the event, "hour and article" of death, and so of course death's cold river is the Jordan. And this is particularly the view of those who hold that, at death, the saint goes right up to be with God and the angels. And so ministers preach funeral sermons from Joshua 1: 11, and Jer. 12: 5, and talk eloquently about "the swelling of Jordan," and then sing about "Jordan's stormy banks," all the while meaning death;—and its "deathless spirit," "undying soul," "gone to heaven," etc., etc., till in their rhapsody death is made an angel of light and love, and the sermon is in fine a truthless compound of "death in the pot" and beautiful error!

O! when will christians study their Bibles, and not take everything for granted? When will the church cease to take up with death as her chief good? When will she refrain from putting everything at death which belongs exclusively at the resurrection?

As for me, I do not believe the "last enemy," (Cor. 15: 26) or any body else but the Lord, could ferry me over to the "other side," if they would; and I will not give him so much credit as to believe he would pilot me thither if he could. I do not believe his "bark" has "golden oars;" and if there is anything of the "angel" about the grim old "boatman pale," it must savor of the angel of the bottomless pit.—Rev. 9. The fact is, Messrs. Death, Satan & Co., would tip us all over into "the mystic river," and, sinking us like lead to the bottom, keep us there "lost in the dashing tide," if it were not for the Lord of life and glory, who is coming soon to annihilate the diabolical firm (and all the hands in their employ, consisting of two or three hundred "dire diseases,") and give a glad release to all their pale victims. Ah, that will be a happy day!

In spite of her error—a very catholic one—"Lizzie Lincoln" is one of the poetesses, and it is to be hoped she will gild her pen with the light of inspiration, the next time her muse prompts her to write about Death's mystic river.

"Lizzie," we are strangers, but I here take the liberty—with grave-yards all around us, and an open Bible before me—of telling you and all others of similar credo, thatthe dead have not yet got over the river, either of Death or Judgment, but that the King of life, our Lord and Prince, will soon be here, the very Jesus who consecrated the waters of judgment for us, as beautifully emblemized by his burial in the waters of an earthly Jordan, and who, for our sakes, did not shrink from a deadly baptism in death's dark waters; and at his command the black flood will roll away, and the lost gems—"brother and Minnie" with them, I hope—will leap from their hiding-place in immortal lustre, and the great Jehovah in heaven will, as of old, crown his conquering Son with glory; and amid all the terrors of that day, his voice will be heard, as by Jordan's river, saying, in tones of thunder, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased!" And that Son will turn toward the ransomed multitude on that great morning, and with a voice sweet as the dulcimer, and a smile of ineffable brightness, say, as he said to a group of loved ones on another shore, and another morning, "ALL HAIL!" May we be there to hear the wide, wide welcome. Amen, and amen.

The Rest.

"There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God."—Heb. 4: 9.

Yes, there is rest, perfect, enduring rest, eternal repose, beyond this vale of tears. And who are prepared for it? Who are ready to enter the New Jerusalem, and walk those streets of gold,—to mingle with those holy beings who surround the throne of God, clothed in white robes where

They chant their lay 'mid choirs above,
And strike their lyres to songs of love.

Where are the precious few, who, in their intercourse with this world, discover that simplicity of character which betokens an entrance to the abodes of blessedness and love?

Rest is before us,—rest is in store for the weary pilgrim; soon, if faithful, we shall be freed, entirely and forever freed, from all the remains of sin. Soon the last sigh will heave the breast of the mourning pilgrim, and the last tear will fall from his eye. Soon shall we see the King in his glory; soon shall we mingle with prophets, apostles and martyrs, and with all who sleep in Jesus; for them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

There crystal waters ever glide,
Thro' groves of spicy gardens fair,
Where not an ill can e'er betide
The happy souls that mingle there;
Where the Redeemer spreads his seat,
Where holiness will ever reign;
Where not a breeze of sin or wo
Their perfect bliss can ever stain.

But that will be perfect rest when the Son of God descends to dissolve the slumbers of his children, which have fallen asleep in Christ, and re-animate each one; for "the hour is coming in the which all they that are in the graves shall hear his voice;" and oh! how rejoicing it is to the lonely pilgrim to think that we shall renew that sweet intercourse with those we once loved, which before was imperfect, but now complete and eternal. To think that the very eyes which once smiled so kindly upon us, the very tongue which spake so comfortingly, the very hands which have administered so faithfully, the very bosom which we have pillowed so tenderly, we shall meet again.

May the Lord help us to be ready to enter into that "rest."

The Christian's Faith.

"I will trust, and not be afraid."

Let the winds blow high or low,
Let the storm-king come or go,
Wintry cold, or summer's heat,
Driving rains, or frost, or sleet—
In the Lord I will confide,
He is ever by my side.

God, my helper—I'll not fear,
Though the tempter may be near,
And with power aim fiercest dart
Often to afflict my heart;
Still in Christ I will abide,
He is ever by my side.

That proud pinnacle of fame
Where the gifted leave a name,
May to me close fast its doors,
Wealth withhold its golden stores,—
Loss is gain, while I confide,
He is more than all beside.

Though a pilgrim I may roam,
Never an abiding home;
And the world with pity see
All the woes that fall on me,—
Friends may fail, and foes deride,
Still in Him I will confide.

Future Punishment.

BY J. PARRY.

"These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."—Matt. 25: 46.

(Concluded.)

Thirdly. Death—everlasting destruction—is the punishment due to the finally impenitent, at the judgment of the great day of God Almighty.

Death is a punishment; and is considered, by all nations, the highest penalty the law can inflict. Some would endeavor to make us believe that death, to the sinner, would be no penalty at all! This is not consistent with reason, experience, or common sense, to say nothing of Scripture. To answer such a quibble, we need no argument; it is a plain contradiction of fact; and a man must be driven to close quarters for argument, who can find no better ground to stand on. When I speak of death, I do not mean a fiction, but a reality; not a translation from one state of existence to another, but the loss of existence, the extinction of life and all consciousness: to be as though we had never been, this is death; the wages of sin.—"The soul that sinneth it shall die!"

But, it is asked, is death an everlasting punishment? I answer yes; if there be no resurrection, it is an everlasting loss of life; a loss of himself; and when a man loses himself, what more has he to lose?

Again it is said, there can be no punishment without consciousness. How is that to be proved? It is a mere assertion—it is not true. Many are punished, even in this life, who are not conscious of it. Shame and disgrace are the natural punishments of crime; and yet, many are so hardened in sin, that they lose all consciousness of it, and glory in their shame! Again, God says he maketh diviners mad. The loss of reason is here made the punishment for necromancy or witchcraft. Here is a palpable punishment; but no consciousness of it,—a mad man thinks all the world crazy except himself! The punishment of the wicked consists chiefly in the loss of immortality, eternal life; to see Abraham, Isaac, and all the faithful, enter into life, and they themselves thrust out; they shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them.

But the great argument is, the soul of man is immortal, and therefore cannot die, or perish. Prove this, and the work is done; everlasting punishment must be everlasting sin and misery; the wickedness of the wicked will never come to an end; the kingdom of Satan never be destroyed, and justice will never be satisfied. It is this doctrine of the immortality of the soul, that has brought us into this dilemma of endless torment. If the Bible be true, and the wicked are immortal, there is no possible escape; it must be so,—these shall go away into everlasting punishment,—where God is, they never can come,—the door of mercy and hope is shut forever.

But where do you find this boasted doctrine of the immortality of the soul, so much talked of, but never found? You will say, probably, it is in the Bible. But where? Let us have chapter and verse. "Everywhere, from Genesis to Revelations, the Bible is full of it." But put your finger on the point; I know of but one.—"And the serpent said unto the woman, ye shall not surely die." There is not another text in the Bible that is so plain as this. Learned divines, who have searched the Scriptures all their lives, have been obliged to confess that the immortality of the soul was not asserted, but only implied in the Bible!

The Bible teaches a very different doctrine; God only hath immortality; it is an attribute of Deity, not of any creature. Immortality and eternal life are always spoken of in the word of God as a gift, a peculiar privilege; something to be sought after and obtained,—only by patient continuance in well doing. "I give unto my sheep eternal life," etc. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son," etc. This blessing is promised only to the righteous, to those who would make a good use of it. Death, destruction, perishing, burning up like chaff and thorns,—this is the end of the ungodly.

If you inquire where the popular doctrine of the soul's immortality came from, I answer, from heathen philosophy. Plato, Socrates, and their disciples, hatched it out of their own brains; and thus it was early introduced into the church, by some who had been converted from heathenism, who introduced this, amongst other heathen dogmas, into the church, "darkening counsel by words without knowledge."

I am aware that, finding the Bible will not serve their turn, some have attempted to prove the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, by advocating the theory of "spiritual communications" from the dead to the living. It is not my purpose, at this time, to controvert the doctrine of "Spiritual communications;" I will merely state that the whole phenomena may be attributed, with more semblance of truth and without contradiction of the word of God, that plainly declares "the dead know not anything,"—to demonology, sorcery, witchcraft, necromancy, and the unlawful intercourse with "familiar spirits;" not the spirits of the dead, but a separate and distinct race of spiritual beings, so often mentioned in the New Testament, but never as the spirits of dead men.

But supposing all this to be true, that the soul does survive the body in a state of consciousness; that it goes to heaven, hell, paradise, or the spheres; that it communicates with the living, or it does not; all this, and much more, added to it, would not prove the soul's immortality; it may, after all, perish; what has had a beginning, may have an end! It may pass through many changes of place and circumstances; and be, at last, utterly and forever destroyed. There is no hope or security for eternal life but the promise of God. I would rather have this, than all the schemes of philosophy that man ever invented; than all the systems of religion the world ever knew. I would rather have this one declaration of Christ, my Savior, on which to build my hope for eternal life, than all the wisdom and research that six thousand years could furnish.—"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

The great day of judgment, of final retribution, is yet to come; when the dead, small and great, shall arise from the grave, and stand before Christ, the judge of the quick and dead; those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; those who have done evil, to the resurrection of condemnation. What is that condemnation? The wages of sin is death; all the wicked will God destroy; they shall be punished with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power; they shall be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death; there shall be found no place for them; these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal. If all this does not prove the utter destruction of the wicked at the day of judgment, where can we find words to express the tremendous fact,—"The soul that sinneth it shall die?"

My dying fellow sinners, let me entreat you to trust to no refuge of lies; believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they be of God. Take the Bible for your guide, and trust not to an arm of flesh, or to the creeds and opinions of fallible men. This is the only ark of safety on the stormy ocean of life; if not safe in this last and sure refuge, you will suffer shipwreck, and perish in the overwhelming flood, that shall destroy all the workers of iniquity. Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world,—he invites you to come to him that you may have eternal life; it is his gift; I give unto them (my sheep) eternal life—they shall never perish—none shall pluck them out of my hands—I will raise them up at the last day—"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Will you come, even now, at this eleventh hour? All things are ready; soon the door may be shut. Now is the day of salvation. Why will ye die?

I have endeavored in these brief remarks to steer a middle course, between two extremes; universalism on the one hand, and endless misery on the other. I sincerely believe the Bible sustains my position. It is a matter of deep importance, worthy of anxious inquiry and earnest effort; and if there is yet a reasonable doubt in the mind of any who may read this with regard to his prospects for the future,—oh! do not smother it in levity and indifference; but seek to Him, who has said; "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth unto all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him."

May God grant his blessing on the feeble effort made to point the dying sinner to the way of life, and to Him shall be all the praise.—"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts." Amen.

For the Crisis.

Earthly Fame vs. Heavenly Gain.

Fame, although one of the highest aspirations of the natural man, often bends with a resistless dread, and casts her diadems at the feet of the dread messenger. Monarchs may guard their kingly prerogatives by the loyalty of their armies; earthly honors, crowned with the obedience of subjugated nations, may roll in upon them like the murmuring surges of the ocean upon the hidden strand; they may possess the wealth of a conquered world, and the homage of a thousand regal cohorts; their diadems may reflect back the undimmed lustre of gems, that decked the brow of royalty, long since swept over by the waves of oblivion, and the glory of their insatiate ambition may circle around them like gems of the heavens around the glorious orb of day; these may be characteristics of earthly aspirations, but they are as a mass of rubbish when placed in the scale with the religion of Christ. Every member of that order wears a badge, whose motto is wisdom, righteousness, sanctification. This rich legacy, which was purchased for him by the Man of sorrows, whose weary feet were urged up the hill of Calvary, the droppings of whose blood redeemed him from eternal death,—he will guard with all the jealousy of a King, watching his kingly prerogative.

But while we reflect upon the struggle that man in his sinful nature puts forth for his own personal aggrandizement, we, with blissful emotions of mingled hope and joy, dwell upon the unborn glories of immortality. Jehovah's promise to Abraham remains this day unfulfilled. The fifth kingdom is yet to be established, and its ruler, Christ Jesus, has not taken possession of his throne, who will reign by personal manifestation. But we do not have to pierce far into the dim vista of the future, to behold by faith that predicted age, when that glad morn of restitution shall break in upon us,—when the seventh trumpet will sound, and the angel of judgment shall have poured out the awful contents of the seventh and last vial on the earth; when the loud and mighty cry shall reverberate through heaven and earth,—It is finished! and the fate of humanity be irrevocably fixed. Then the judgment, and with it the reward of the faithful Israel of God. Then that rest, for which the faithful have so long yearned.

It is impossible for man, with the narrow scope of human intellect, to comprehend the joys prepared for those who love his appearing, except he can define the hidden meaning of eternity. Stupendous thought! who can compute those ages that unceasingly wheel their flight around the throne of the Eternal?

O, then, let us watch, and be sober, looking for and hasting unto the day of God, when, if faithful, we shall meet with those who have long since gone to rest amid the shadows of the dark valley, to await their glorious redemption from the land of the enemy; and though they may have passed through the dark turbid river of death, they will stand unharmed on the fair banks of the New Jerusalem, clad in immortal beauty. Their eyes, which have so long been shut from earthly things, will have regained their vision, in a clime of never fading youth. Their shoulders, that have bowed beneath earthly crosses, will stand erect, in the presence of their Redeemer. Their brows, that have felt the pressure of earthly thorns and sorrows, will be fitted to wear the golden crown of angels. Our voices then will blend in harmony with the songs of angels, and our Redeemer will be our everlasting light, and the days of our mourning will be ended; and with faces beaming with the reflected glories of the Lamb, we shall pass in beyond the white gates, unto Him who hath said, "Come ye blessed!"

Savior, hasten thine appearing!
Bring, oh, bring the glorious day!
When the awful summons hearing,
Heaven and earth shall pass away;
Then with golden harps we'll sing,
Glory, glory to our King!
Alleluia, Amen!

Prophecy.

From Fables of Infidelity, published by [illegible]

To attempt to illustrate the Divine wisdom displayed in [illegible] predictions, covering the destiny of the nations of the world, and extending from the dawn of history to the end of time, by presenting two or three instances of the fulfilment of specific predictions, would be something like exhibiting a fragment of a column as a monument of the skill of the architect of a temple; yet, as such a fragment may excite the curiosity of the traveler to visit the structure whence it was taken, I shall present two or three prophecies in which specific predictions are given, concerning the geographical, political, social and religious condition of three of the great nations of antiquity—Egypt, Judea and Babylon,—the fulfilment of which is spread over the surface of empires and the ruins of cities, patent to all travelers at the present hour, and abundantly attested in hundreds of volumes.

Could human sagacity have calculated that Egypt—the most defensible country in the world, bounded on the south by inaccessible mountains, on the east by the Red Sea, on the west by the trackless, burning desert; able to defend the mouths of her river with a powerful navy, and to drown an invading army every year by the inundation of the Nile; which had not only maintained her independence, but extended her conquests for a thousand years past—Egypt, which had given learning, arts, sciences, and idolatry to half the world, and which had not risen to the height of its fame or the extent of its influence for twenty-five years after the prediction—should be invaded, conquered, spoiled, become a prey to strangers and ever-are to strangers, never have a native prince, sink into barbarism, renounce idolatry, and become famous for her desolation? Yet the Bible predictions are specific on all these matters: "I will make the rivers dry, and sell the land into the hand of the wicked; and I will make the land waste, and all that is therein by the hand of strangers. I the Lord have spoken it. Thus saith the Lord God, I will also destroy the idols, and I will cause the images to cease out of Noph, and there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt."*

Let infidels read the fulfillment of these predictions: "Such is the state of Egypt. Deprived twenty-three centuries of her natural proprietors, she has seen her fertile fields successively a prey to the Persians, the Macedonians, the Romans, the Greeks, the Arabs, the Georgians, and at length the race of Tartars distinguished by the name of the Ottoman Turks. The Mamelukes, purchased as slaves and introduced as soldiers, soon usurped the power and selected a leader. If their first establishment was a singular event, their continuance is not less extraordinary; they are replaced by slaves brought from their original country.† Says Gibbon: "A more unjust and absurd constitution can not be devised than that which condemns the natives of the country to perpetual servitude under the arbitrary dominion of strangers and slaves. Yet such has been the state of Egypt above five hundred years. The most illustrious sultans of the Baharite and Beyite dynasties were themselves promoted from the Tartar and Circassian bands; and the four and twenty beys, or military chiefs, have ever been succeeded, not by their sons, but by their servants."‡ Mehemet Ali cut off the Mamelukes, but still Egypt is ruled by the Turks, and the present ruler (Ibrahim Pasha) is a foreigner. It is needless to remind the reader that the idols are cut off. Neither the nominal Christians of Egypt, nor the iconoclastic Moslem, allow images to appear among them. The rivers, too, are drying up. In one day's travel forty dry water-courses will be crossed in the Delta; and water-skins are needed now around the ruined cities whose walls were blockaded by Greek and Roman navies.

"It shall be the basest of the kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations, for I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations."§ Every traveler will attest the truth of this prediction. [illegible]

[illegible]

…ness, neither nobility, clergy, merchants, nor landholders. A universal air of misery in all the traveler meets points out to him the rapacity of oppression, and the distrust attendant upon slavery.—The profound ignorance of the inhabitants equally prevents them from perceiving the causes of their evils, or applying the necessary remedies. Ignorance, diffused through every class, extends its effects to every species of moral and physical knowledge. Nothing is talked of but intestine troubles, the public misery, pecuniary extortions, and bastinadoes."*

Here, then, we have conclusive proof of the fulfillment at this day of four distinct, [illegible] and improbable Bible predictions: [illegible] the country—the rulers—the [illegible] and the people of Egypt.

Let us note now a distinct and totally different judgment pronounced against the transgressors of another land. Pre-eminent in inflicting destruction on others, her retribution was to be extreme. Degradation and slavery were to be the portion of the learned Egyptians, but utter extinction is the doom of mighty Babylon. It is written in the Bible concerning the land where the farmer was accustomed to reap two hundred fold: "Cut off the sower from Babylon, and him that handleth the sickle in the time of harvest. Every purpose of the Lord shall be performed against Babylon, to make the land of Babylon a desolation without an inhabitant. Behold the hindermost of the nations shall be a dry land and a desert. Because of the wrath of the Lord it shall not be inhabited, but it shall be wholly desolate."†

Proofs in abundance of the fulfillment of these predictions present themselves in every volume of travels in Assyria and Chaldea. "Those splendid accounts of the Babylonian lands yielding crops of grain of two and three hundred fold, compared with the modern face of the country, afford a remarkable proof of the singular desolation to which it has been subjected. The canals at present can only be traced by their decayed banks. The soil of this desert consists of a hard clay, mixed with mud, which at noon becomes so heated with the sun's rays, that I found it too hot to walk over it with any degree of comfort."‡ "That it was at some former period in a far different state is evident from the number of canals by which it is traversed, now dry and neglected; and the quantity of heaps of earth, covered with fragments of brick and broken tiles, which are seen in every direction—the indisputable traces of former cultivation.§ "The abundance of the country has vanished as clean away as if the besom of desolation had swept it from north to south; the whole land, from the outskirts of Babylon to the farthest stretch of sight, lying a melancholy waste. Not a habitable spot appears for countless miles.‖

As the desolation of the country was to be extraordinary, so the desolation of the [illegible] Babylon was to be remarkable. When the prophet wrote, its walls had been raised to the height of three hundred and fifty feet, and made broad enough for six chariots to drive upon them abreast. From its hundred brazen gates issued the armies which trampled under foot the liberties of mankind, and presented their lives to the nod of a despot, who slew whom he would, and whom he would allowed to live. Twenty years' provisions were collected within its walls, and the world would not believe that an enemy could enter its gates. Nevertheless the prophets of God pronounced against it a doom of destruction as extraordinary as the pride and wickedness which procured it. Tyre, the London of Asia, was to become a place for the spreading of nets, (Ezk. chap. 26) and the infidel Volney tells — its commerce has declined to a trifling fishery; but even that implies some few resident inhabitants. Rabbah, of Ammon, was to become a stable for horses, and a couching place for flocks. (Ezk. chap. 25.) Lord Lindsay reports that "he could not sleep amidst its ruins for the bleating of sheep, that the dung of camels covers the ruins of its palaces, and that the only building left entire in its Acropolis is used as a sheepfold." Yet sheepfolds imply that the tents of their Arab owners are near, and that some human beings would occasionally reside near its ruins. But desolation, solitude, and utter abandonment to the wild beasts of the desert is the specific and clearly predicted doom of the world's proud capital. The most expressive symbols are selected from the desert to portray its desertion.

"Babylon, the glory of the kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, nor dwelt in, from generation to generation. Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; but wild beasts of the desert shall be there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there; and the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant places." (Isa. chap. 13.) [illegible] "It is a [illegible] metropolis," says Mignon, who, [illegible] by six Arabs, could [illegible] induce them by any reward to pass the night among its ruins, from their apprehension of evil spirits. So completely fulfilled is the prophecy, "The Arabian shall not pitch his tent there." The same voice which called camels and flocks to the palaces of Rabbah, summoned a very different class of tenants for the palaces of Babylon. Rabbah was to be a sheepfold, Babylon a menagerie of wild beasts—a very specific difference, and very improbable.—One of the later Persian kings, however, after it was destroyed and deserted, repaired its walls, converted it into a vast hunting ground, and stocked it with all manner of wild beasts; and to this day the apes of the Spice Islands, and the lions of the African deserts meet in its palaces, and howl their testimony to the truth of God's word. Sir R. K. Porter saw two majestic lions in the Mujelibé, (the ruins of the palace,) and Fraser thus describes the chambers of fallen Babylon: "There were dens of wild beasts in various places, and Mr. Rich perceived in some a strong smell, like that of a lion. Bones of sheep and other animals were seen in the cavities, with numbers of bats and owls."

Various destructions were predicted for Babylon. "I will make it a habitation for the bittern, and pools of water," says one prophecy. (Isa. chap. 14.) "Her cities are a desolation, a dry land, and a wilderness," says another. (Jer. chap. 51.) How can such contradictions be true? says the scoffer.

But the scoffer's contradiction is a fact. God can cause the most discordant agencies to agree in affecting his purpose. Babylon is alternately an overflowed swamp from the inundations of the obstructed Euphrates, and an arid desert under the scorching rays of an eastern sun. Says Mignon: "Morasses and ponds tracked the ground in various places. For a long time after the subsiding of the Euphrates, great part of this place is little better than a swamp." At another season it was "a dry waste and burning plain." Even at the same period, "one part on the western side is low and marshy, and another an arid desert."*

Another, and widely different agent, to be employed in the destruction of the great centre of tyranny and idolatry, is thus specifically and definitely indicated in the prediction: "Behold I am against thee, O destroying mountain, that destroyest all the earth; and I will stretch out my hand against thee, and roll thee down from the rocks, and make of thee a burnt mountain; and they shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, or a stone for foundations, but thou shalt be desolate for ever, saith the Lord." (Jer. chaps. 50 and 51.)

"There is one fact," says Fraser, "in connection with the most remarkable of these relics, (the Birs Nimrod,) which we cannot dismiss without a few more observations. All travelers who have ascended the Birs have taken notice of the singular heaps of brick work scattered on the summit of this mound, at the foot of the remnant of the wall still standing. To the writer they appeared the most striking of all the ruins. That they have undergone the most violent action of fire is evident from the complete vitrification which has taken place in many of the masses. Yet how a heat sufficient to produce such an effect could have been applied at such a height from the ground is unaccountable. They now lie on a spot elevated two hundred feet above the plain, and must have fallen from some much more lofty position, for the structure which still remains, and of which they may be supposed originally to have formed a part, bears no marks of fire. The building originally can not have contained any great proportion of combustible materials, and to produce so intense a heat by substances carried to such an elevation, would have been almost impossible, for want of space to pile them on. Nothing, we should be inclined to say, short of the most powerful action of electric fire, could have produced the complete, yet circumscribed fusion which is here observed. Although fused into a solid mass, the courses of bricks are still visible, identifying them with the standing pile above, but so hardened by the power of heat, that it is almost impossible to break off the smallest piece; and, though porous in texture, and full of air-holes and cavities, like other bricks, they require, on being submitted to the stone-cutter's lathe, the same machinery as is used to dress the hardest pebbles."†

Egypt was to be reduced to slavery and degradation, Babylonia to utter barrenness and desolation; but a different and still more incredible doom is pronounced in the Bible upon Judea and its people. The land was to be emptied of its people, and remain uncultivated, retaining all its former fertility, while the people were to be scattered over all the earth, yet never to lose their distinct nationality, nor be amalgamated with their neighbors: "I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries into desolation; and I will bring the land unto desolation, and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you, and your land shall be desolate and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her Sabbaths as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land, even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her Sabbaths."—

(Lev. chap. 26.) "Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate, and the Lord have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land. But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return and shall be eaten, as a teil tree and as an oak, whose substance is in them when they cast their leaves." (Isa. chap. 6.) "The generation to come of your children, AND THE STRANGER FROM A FAR LAND, shall say, 'Wherefore hath the Lord done this to this land? What meaneth the heat of this great anger?'"—(Deut. chap. 29.) * * * * *

The word of God specifies no less distinctly and definitely the destiny of the Jewish than of the Babylonian capital, but fixes on a widely different kind of destruction.—Babylon was never to be built again, but devoted to solitude—busy Tyre to become a place for spreading nets—the caravans, which once brought the wealth of India through Petra were to cease, and the doom was "to cut off him that passeth by and him that returneth." But Jerusalem, it was predicted, should long feel the miseries of a multitude of oppressors, should never enjoy the luxury of solitary woe, but "be trodden down of the Gentiles."—(Luke, chap. 21.) Saracens, Tartars, Turks, and Crusaders, Gentiles from every nation of the earth, fulfilled the prediction of old, even as hosts of pilgrims from all parts of the earth do at this day.

So minute and specific are the predictions of Scripture, that the fate of particular buildings is accurately defined. One temple to the living God, and only one, raised its walls in this world, which he had made for his worship. Its frequenters perverted it from its proper use of leading them to confess their sinfulness, seek pardon through the promised Savior to whom its ceremonies pointed, and learn to be holy, as the God of that temple was holy. They hoped that the holiness of the place would screen them from the indulgence of pride, formality and wickedness. The temple of the Lord, instead of the Lord of the temple, was the object of their veneration. But the doom went forth, "Therefore for your sakes shall Zion be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become as heaps, and the mountain of the house like the high places of the forest." (Micah, chap. 3.) History has preserved, and the Jews to this day curse, the name of the soldier, Terentius Rufus, who plowed up the foundations of the temple. It long continued in this state. But the Emperor Julian the Apostate conceived the idea of falsifying the prediction of Jesus, "Behold your house is left unto you desolate," (Matt. chap. 23,) and sent his friend Alypius, with a Roman army and abundant treasure, to rebuild it. The Jews flocked from all parts to assist in the work. Spades or pickaxes of silver were provided by the vanity of the rich, and the rubbish was transported in mantles of silk and purple. But they were obliged to desist from the attempt, for "horrible balls of fire breaking out from the foundations with repeated attacks, rendered the place inaccessible to the scorched workmen, and the element driving them to a distance from time to time, the enterprise was dropped."* Such is the testimony of a heathen, confirmed by Jews and Christians. The enclosures of the mosque of Omar forbidding them all access to the spot on which it stood, leave it desolate to the Jews to this day.

For the Crisis.

Fear Him!

Question. "Who is the nameless one spoken of by our Savior in the following words?—'And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.'—Matt. 10: 28. 'But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear: fear him, which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him.'—Luke 12: 5. A writer in the Christian Watchman and Reflector carries the idea that Satan is the one whom we are to fear. Please give us an exposition of the above."

S. S.

ANSWER.

1. There is no place in the Bible where we are told to fear the devil. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, but I never knew that it was a christian duty to fear Satan.

2. We are constantly commanded to fear the Lord, and hence it would seem probable that Jesus would teach us the same, especially as he says nothing of Satan in the connection, but mentions the Lord and his providence immediately after the expression, "Fear Him."

3. There is no proof that Satan has power, after he hath killed, to cast into gehennah. Those prevalent notions about the devil tormenting souls in the lake of fire, and mocking wicked men in the terrible agonies of eternal pain, that shall cause perpetual wailings to roll along the "burning marl of hell," are all pure fancy. Christ will turn wicked men into gehennah with his awful word, "Depart!" He hath power to destroy both soul and body there.

4. Satan will have all he can do, I apprehend, to attend to his own affairs without tormenting others, when he encounters the [illegible] and is cast into the lake of fire; and hence I do not think he is the one to be feared.

5. Satan has power to kill the body, if permitted by God. See Job.—"Spare his life." Heb. 2: 14, etc. He works in persecutors, the children of disobedience. "Some of you Satan shall cast into prison." Hence he and his hosts are what we are not to fear. Fear not, little flock. Take the shield. Quench all the fiery darts.

6. The judgment to be feared is utter destruction of body and soul in gehennah, after death. But there is no proof that Satan will tempt, torment or destroy men beyond this life.

Hence, not knowing what arguments the writer in question could have to support his view, I conclude we are to fear God; and when we fear him, we may "overcome the wicked one" and fear him not.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1859.

The Spirit.—No. 4.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Having noticed the first sixteen examples in the Bible, where the word ruakh occurs, but found no proof that, when it is applied to man, it means any thing conscious after death, we pass to notice some promiscuous examples. "Then their (ruakh) anger was abated toward him." Jud. 8: 3. In this example, ruakh is used to represent "a state of feeling." The same is true of the following from 1 Sam. 1: 15. "And Hannah answered and said . . . I am a woman of a sorrowful (ruakh) spirit."

"And there came forth a (ruakh) spirit and stood before the Lord, and said, I will persuade him. And the Lord said unto him, wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying (ruakh) spirit in the mouth of all his prophets." 1 Kings 22: 21, 22. In this last example we have ruakh used to represent a wicked being, "unclean spirit," "demon," or evil angel. This "lying (ruakh) spirit" proposes to deceive the prophets of Ahab, and is permitted to undertake the work, to accomplish the destruction of that wicked king. We believe similar beings are trying now to lead our race from truth to error, by means of what is known as "Spiritualism." These beings exert an influence similar to that of a good mesmerizer, and control their mediums by a similar influence, using them as agents to express their sentiments. Persons who had submitted to be influenced by one of these, were said to have "a familiar spirit." These familiar spirits are all lying ones, and hence those who leave the Lord and his truth and consult them for information, "are an abomination unto the Lord." As Paul says, "they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie." They are left in this deplorable condition because they choose lies rather than truth.

We have now noticed examples of the four general uses of the word ruakh.

1. An intelligent being.
2. An influence proceeding from a being.
3. A state of mind or feeling.
4. The atmosphere, or breath of life.

This word is rendered in twenty-two different ways, which we shall notice in due time, giving all the examples in the Bible.

We will now consider the Scripture at the head of our article.—"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the (ruakh) spirit shall return to God who gave it." Eccl. 12: 7. This passage is very often quoted to prove that the real man does not die. Let us look at this point, seeking wisdom from the unerring word of truth. How much of man is included in the expression, "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was?" We can settle this question, we think, by referring to man's creation, as recorded in Gen. 2: 7. "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." This is a plain statement, easy to be comprehended. Shall we dispute the record and say man was not formed of dust, but only the house in which he was to live? Why not believe the Lord? He says man was formed "of the dust of the ground." When man is analyzed, he is found composed of carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, sulphur, phosphorus, iron and lime. These are all earthy substances, and when he created man from these materials, he made the most wonderful piece of mechanism of which we have any conception. The lungs, with their million of air cells, were prepared, in connection with the air, to purify the blood that had passed through the system, and fit it for another revolution. The atmosphere, "or breath of life," is a material substance made to move the wonderful machinery of the being called man. When that is taken from him, the whole machinery stops as certainly as when the water is removed from the wheel, or the steam from the engine; but the water, or steam, is of no use without the machinery, nor the machinery without the water or steam; so the atmosphere is of no use to a dead man, and a man is of no service without "the breath of life." Says David, "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their (ruakh) breath, they die, and return to their dust." Ps. 104: 29. This passage explains death in such a simple manner, it seems as though all could understand it. The word rendered breath in Ps. 104: 29 is the same that is translated spirit in the passage at the head of our article. Does any one suppose that the breath, taken away from man at death, is the real accountable being? The idea seems absurd. That is not a conscious agent, but is essential to sustain life in this world. We come back to the question, "How much of man is included in the expression, 'then shall the dust return to the earth as it was?'" Why, of course, all that was made of dust. Certainly. Well, the record does not say a part of man was made of dust, or that a "prison" was made of dust to put a man into, but MAN, the WHOLE MAN was made of dust; then it follows as a sequence, when the dust returns "to the earth as it was," the whole man has returned to dust. When we take this position, Gen. 3: 19 is plain. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." This explains also Isa. 26: 19. "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." "Marvel not at this," said Jesus; "for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth." John 5: 28. We find no intimation that any part of man is conscious when "the breath of life" has left him.

We now inquire, what leaves man at death? or what is meant by the expression, "the (ruakh) spirit (or breath) shall return to God who gave it?" It cannot be the man, for he has returned to dust, and he cannot return to two opposite places at once. What was added to the man?—The breath of life. What, then, is there to take away to cause certain death? This breath which is in his nostrils. Says David in Ps. 146: 4, "His (ruakh) breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." How plain and positive!

We have yet to learn that there is a single passage of Scripture to contradict the position we have taken. As it takes this wonderful organism and "the breath of life" to constitute a living man, it remains to be shown by our opponents, that when the breath is taken away, and this organism has returned to dust, that the man is still alive in heaven or hell.

New Bedford.

We spent Lord's day, April 17th, in the "city of palaces." The church in this city have enjoyed a refreshing revival season during the past winter, under the labors of Bro. F. H. Berick, A. Ross, and H. Munger, and a deep interest is still manifested by many, who, till quite recently, have been comparatively indifferent to the blessed hope of the gospel. Our meetings Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings, were quite interesting and well attended. Several asked questions relating to the sleep of the dead, and the immortality of the soul. We have never seen the people so generally interested on this subject as at present. We find it so in all places we visit.

Lord's day, we met at the Pierian Hall, a large and beautiful room, which is said to hold over a thousand people. It was about two thirds full in the morning, and crowded in the afternoon and evening. The truth is spreading, and the people are embracing the true gospel hope of the sleep and resurrection of the dead, the literal coming and kingdom of Christ, and the destruction of the wicked. We had a good social meeting at noon, when we heard the glad testimony of many who seem to be established in the truth of the Bible, having on the "armor of God," and prepared to meet the fabled theology of the day, which teaches that a dead man knows more than a living one. We felt the strengthening hand of the Lord while contending "for the faith which was once delivered to the saints."

Discussion at Lewiston, Me.

A gentleman who is known as the Rev. Gibson Smith, formerly of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and who claims to be the first Spiritualist in America, having become one some three or four years before the manifestations at Rochester, has been lecturing in Lewiston for several evenings, and awakened much interest on the subject of spiritual communications. He manifested much boldness and assurance, inviting the people to ask questions, and challenging any one to meet him in discussion. A few ventured to ask some questions, but were usually made subjects of ridicule. The ministers of the place, fourteen in number, all stood on their dignity, and refused to go near, except one, a Universalist. They seemed to think that the people who went to hear the lectures on Spiritualism were beneath their notice, and for argument, gave contempt and ridicule, which only served to confirm in his favor those who attended Mr. Smith's lectures. The people reasoned,—if the ministers can meet this man, why do they not do it, like faithful shepherds when their flocks are in danger? Why allow him to take some of their sheep out of their pens if they can prevent it? Why not meet the wolf themselves, instead of hiding away, and leaving the lambs exposed to destruction?

Seeing that no one would consent or dare to meet this bold opposer of the word of the Lord, Bro. Stephen Field wrote to have us come and sling the stones of truth at this Spiritualist Goliah, that was defying all the children of the Most High, and producing such terror in the minds of the faint-hearted.

We left Boston at 7 o'clock, Monday evening, April 18th, and had a pleasant sail on the Steamer Lewiston, over a calm sea during a beautiful moonlight night, landed in Portland before sunrise, and took breakfast with Bro. Brooks, who informed us that they are having interesting meetings in that city. Our late conference there has resulted in much good, establishing a goodly number in the faith of the gospel; at the same time arousing several ministers to preach against our blessed hope. When we took the cars for Lewiston, we enjoyed the company of Bro. Berick, who was on his way to Poland, Me., to preach the funeral sermon of Sr. Jordan.

We commenced our discussion Tuesday evening, at Central Hall, which is large and elegant. We had the following question:—"Is man immortal? and can his spirit return and communicate with mankind in the flesh?" A large and attentive audience was present which seemed anxious to know the truth. We were presented with a long string of assertions from our opponent; among the rest the following:—"Nature is God's only infallible revelation." "The inspired portions of the Bible are from fallible men." "The body is but a garment." "Man is the interior soul or spirit." "The spirit is in the form of the outside man." "The spirit can not be decomposed." "All matter is eternal." "Oxygen is immortal." "Nothing superior to the spirit man." "Resurrection is founded on fable." He said Luke declared that "Christ appeared first after his resurrection to the two on the way to Emmaus, and that he ascended from Galilee." But Luke says no such thing. He endeavored to show other contradictions in the New Testament, by saying that "Joseph embalmed Christ's body while the women stood by, and that the record says the women went to do it themselves, after that." Those who study the Scriptures know that there is not one word about embalming in the whole Bible, only what is said in Gen. 50: 2, 3, 26. Many saw the hideous deformity of error in its true light, and the simplicity of truth as they had not seen it before. Some backsliders were reclaimed, and others were strengthened in the blessed hope of the gospel. We hope the discussion will prevent some from being crushed by the Juggernaut of Spiritualism. Its appearance had become quite formidable in the place, and many seemed to think it was the god, and were bowing down to worship with a blind zeal, worthy of a nobler cause.

Spiritualism is the prince of delusions, and those who adhere to it are sure of destruction if they remain in its slimy pit. Spiritualism is as sure death to christianity, where it takes root, as arsenic to the physical system.

Prayer Meetings.

At this season of the year, and for three or four months to come, people are inclined to neglect prayer meetings on account of the shortness of the evenings. But let us remember there are still twenty-four hours in a day, and can we not spend as much time worshiping the Lord in the cheerful, blooming Spring, and delightful Summer, as in the cold and dreary Winter? Is there less reason to meet and adore Him from whom all blessings flow? We have ever noticed that those who fall off from the prayer meetings during the warm season, grow cold in the cause of Christ.

In view of the signs of the times and the perils around us, it seems all important that we meet often and pray together and exhort one another as we see the great day of the Lord approaching. We see no room to doubt that we are very near the happy day when the christian's toils will all be o'er. Let us keep ready, with our lamps trimmed and burning, and we like those who wait for the coming King.

Once more we say, do not let your seat be vacant, nor your voice silent, at the prayer meeting. Please remember us when there, that we may meet you all at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

THE CHURCH IN BOSTON is very much comforted and edified in the preaching of Bro. Wm. Glen Moncrieff, formerly of Edinburgh, Scotland. He is favored with large audiences of intelligent hearers, who are deeply interested in the Bible hope of life only through Christ. Our prayer meetings at the Crisis office, Monday and Thursday evenings, are cheering to the weary pilgrims, and afford rest to those traveling to the "city of the great King." We invite our friends who may visit the city to meet and worship with us.

MANY THANKS to those who have assisted in obtaining new subscribers for the Crisis; and to those who have aided in making the paper interesting by their valuable contributions. Please keep us well supplied, and look for your reward when the King comes. Let us all try to make our paper the best in the world. Mingle prayers with your writings, that the reader may be blest and strengthened. We earnestly request that our patrons will ask the Lord to give us wisdom to do all to his glory.

Public Prayer.

Is it sin? That seems to depend on the state of the [illegible] prayer. But there are those now, as there have been before these days, who seem to be ignorant on this point, and think it sinful to pray before an assembly, or even before an unbeliever, and are "[illegible] so," (yet they believe it duty to pray in secret, and also to pray in an assembly of believers.) Their text is Matt. 6: 5, 6. "And when thou prayest thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. . . . But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." This is plain, and as we profess to be followers of Christ, obeying his commands, these teachers naturally enough enforce it by—"If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments;" and, "This is the love of God, that ye keep his commandments;" with all that class of texts which teach the duty of obeying Christ, and following him, together with the assertions that Christ gave this as a command for all the church, and all prayer,—that Christ never prayed publicly before sinners, only on the cross, and then he could not get away to do it in secret,—that the apostles never prayed in public,—that there is no proof in the New Testament that they ever prayed before the wicked, only Stephen, and he could not get away from his murderers,—that it is all hypocrisy to pray in public, etc.

When reference is made to the examples of public prayer in the Old Testament, we are told that we are under the new dispensation, and have to abide by the commands under it. Very well, let us look at it. The Scriptures are so full and clear on this subject, I should never think of writing in reference to it, but for the fact that some teachers are so very ingenious as to prove any thing they try for, in the estimation of those who take them as their teachers, and some weak ones are being misled in various places.

1. It is true we should not be "as the hypocrites," standing in the synagogues and streets, "praying to be seen of men." It is evident that many do this, and I am glad, indeed, if such are leaving it off. I will be glad if others can be led to leave it off; but not glad to have it taught that all who pray publicly are hypocrites, or that they pray like them, "to be seen of men." When Jesus gave that instruction, he was under the law—the old dispensation had not closed. The church was proud,—many of the priests were hypocrites,—made a great show of piety,—were honored of men,—looked up to as great. Christ chose a few poor fishermen and publicans to go on a mission, to say to the Jews, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." They went and did as he told them, but they knew very little of the character of their Master, or his kingdom; they felt well in their work, and soon began to show human nature prominently. They found some casting out devils in Christ's name, and they forbade them, because they did not follow in their train. Jesus rebuked this. They wished of Jesus to call fire down from heaven to consume those of a certain class. Jesus reproved them. Again they came, greatly flushed by their success, and felt almost like lords of the earth, saying, "Master, even the devils are subject to us through thy name." Jesus again rebuked them.

It is evident that they came to Jesus with this same spirit, feeling desirous of making a grand display,—to come up beside the honored priests around them, and gain the applause of men, when they said, (Luke 11: 2,) "Lord teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples." This is a record of the same transaction mentioned in Matt. 6. Jesus, seeing their tendency to follow the hypocritical priests, told them not to do so, and then told them how to pray, giving a true idea of the nature and object of prayer,—that it was not to make a show of talent or piety before men, but to make known their wants before God, who could see in secret and reward openly. It struck at the root of their pride, and it should have the same effect now on those whose vanity leads them to make a vain show in praying, preaching, singing—in doctrine, in strange tests, or notions, which make them conspicuous as leaders of a sect.

But, says one, It is a command, and must be obeyed. Yes, it is, and so Jesus commanded the same disciples not to go in the way of the Gentiles, not to salute any man by the way, not to take purse nor scrip, not to go from house to house. Do you obey these commands? They are the commands of Christ, and there are many more commands of his not obeyed now, nor to be; they were either personal or local, and for special occasions.

2. But if it is believed that this command about prayer is to be observed by all, at all times, then the words he taught them to use in prayer are the only ones to be used; for he says, "Use not vain repetitions as the heathen do;" but, "After this manner therefore pray ye," etc. Some take this ground, and only repeat the Lord's prayer.

But here they are switched off the track again, for Jesus prayed a very different prayer recorded in John 17, and another in the garden, just before he was taken; and in many other cases. So also did the Apostles, both publicly and in their letters.

3. Leaving the Old Testament examples of public prayer, after citing you to 1 Kings 13: 6, where the man of God prayed for God to restore the hand of the wicked king Jeroboam, and to 1 Kings 18: 36, 37–39, where Elijah prayed before a host of rebels, of priests and people, and it was answered by fire, converting also the people, we will look into the character of the Apostles of Christ, under their last commission to "go into all the world," etc., "but to tarry at Jerusalem until endued with power from on high."—Luke 24: 49. Shall men obey this last mentioned command in these days? Perhaps they had better. Turn with me to Acts 6: 6. Was it secret prayer, and in the closet? Look at Acts 8: 14–18. Was this closet prayer? Was this Simon a brother? I trow not. Look at Acts 16: 13–18. Was the river-side a closet? Was the prayer offered there secret? Was the damsel possessed with a spirit of divination a holy woman? See verse 25. Paul and Silas were in secret, but they prayed so loud that the prisoners heard them. God answered, and the jailor was converted. See Acts 21: 5. Was this in the closet? Was the door shut? A great closet this. Do you think these were all believers, children and all, who went in to that great closet down by that ship on the shore? Did the seamen hide, so as not to hear them pray? See Acts 27: 35. Paul gives thanks to God for food with some that were not very pious. Did he not probably do it "by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving?"

Once more, Acts 28: 8. Were these barbarians all christians? Was Publius? Remember, these are some of the acts of the Apostles. Did they obey Christ's special command? Let us now look at Luke 8: 21. Did Christ only pray in secret? See John 11: 33–42. Is there no element of public prayer in this? Luke 23: 34, 35. Did not Jesus pray before the multitude? Could he not have prayed to God, and the people not heard him? Now read 1 Cor. 11: 4–18, and 1 Cor. 14: 13, 14, 15, and believe God and live for eternal life in his kingdom.

NO. V.—THE ONLY SACRIFICE.

"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."—John 1: 29.

The name given in this verse to Jesus, is obviously derived from some of the sacrifices offered under the ancient dispensation. We read of the paschal lamb, first slain in Egypt to save the first-born; and of the lamb slain in the morning and evening in the Jewish temple; all of them foreshadowing, like the other victims, the great sacrifice for sin that had been promised to the world. When the Baptist gave the appellation, "the Lamb of God," to Messiah, he virtually said to his disciples, "Behold the Lamb who was represented by all the victims immolated since the world began;—he has now appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself."

He had come to take away the guilt of the world—not the guilt of a portion of the world merely. When John saw him he was, as the original should have been rendered, taking, or bearing away, the sin of the world. It was then resting on him. He was expiating it by his vicarious life, and ere long he completed the propitiation by his sacrificial death. It is not true that he is now taking away the sin, or rather guilt, of the world; he has taken it away, and it cannot be found. When he groaned and expired on Calvary, he finished transgression—finished it in the sense of answering for it with his blood. He tasted death for every man.

That he has expiated your guilt is clear from this, that you are in "the world" for which he died; and that he is now in the midst of the throne. Had he not removed every governmental barrier to your free forgiveness, he never would have been summoned from the tomb to the right hand of the Majesty on high. His resurrection and coronation on his Father's throne, are full proof that he has borne, and borne away, your sins, so that they do not now call for vengeance to be inflicted on you, their author. "His blood speaketh better things than the blood of Abel;" the blood of Abel cried for vengeance—the blood of Jesus cries for mercy—for mercy to YOU!

Behold the Lamb—see him with your mind. He is the chief evidence of God's wonderful compassion for you; and the sacrifice by which, if you trust its efficacy, every sin recorded against you shall be forgiven. Behold him oppressed with your sorrow—drinking your cup in the garden—bearing your sins in his own body on the tree! Is it not enough? You have an all-sufficient sacrifice; is it possible that you could wish more? Believe and enter into rest.

NO. VI.—A FATHER'S LOVE.

"Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father, thou art the guide of my youth?"—Jer. 3: 4.

Jehovah addressed these words to his ancient people when they were exceedingly wicked and degraded, and he now delivers them with as much tender anxiety to ungodly men everywhere. Wonderful, that the King of kings should speak and so speak to a death-deserving sinner! You have forgotten God, but you observe he has not forgotten you. He has received from you no expression of filial dependence and reverential love, yet he has not blotted you out of his affections as you might reasonably have expected him to do. Having lips wherewith to praise him, you have been silent as the rocks; having a mind furnished with powers for apprehending his paternal love and infinite beauty and holiness, you have hastened after all knowledge save the knowledge of Him in whom you live and move and have your being. Oh! shameful ingratitude—inexcusable forgetfulness. Yet behold his amazing love for you just as you are! He even condescends to beseech you to call him "my Father." No tongue can tell the guilt involved in the fact that you ever needed to hear such a request; and oh! what kindness in his permitting you to receive it. You listen to the words, "Cry unto me, my Father," in place of "Depart from me, ye cursed!" Verily you must be dear to him; verily he must be desirous to have your affections and homage.

How mildly he exhibits himself to you! He does not say, cry unto me my Judge, my Sovereign, my Lawgiver, but "MY FATHER." His aim is to calm and soothe you, not to agitate and terrorize your mind.

Wilt thou not "from this time" cry unto him? In the first place, let me admonish you, it is sin to delay a moment longer; it seems to be a more heinous offence to refuse such a melting solicitation, than even to disobey one of his more stern, positive, royal commands. How long will you sin?

But second, the words necessarily imply that you need no preparation for taking up the exclamation, "my Father." You are welcome to employ this language now—just as you are in his sight. You need no preparation—in fact, none is possible. You can do what is right only by doing what is here required—call on him as your Father; claim him as your God in Christ, and render yourself up to his paternal guidance for evermore. He asks no toilsome penance—no days of groaning and agony as the prerequisite to your re-admission into his family; he simply demands that you immediately break your sinful silence, and cry, "my Father!" Then you will be overwhelmed with contrition that you ever denied him glory, and confidence, and affection. But break the silence—down with your arms of rebellion—away with opposition to his plans. Now, even now submit, and you shall be welcome to his arms. Delay will only increase your guilt; the proposal to make yourself better in order to return, is just an attempt, in your ignorance, it may be, to take from him the glory of a portion of your spiritual renovation. He saves not the half-cured, but the dying; he applies the blood which cleanses from all sin, and we entreat you to repair to his merciful throne at once. Jesus has opened the way for your instantaneous return; and in his name you are as welcome as any angel in heaven to cry, "Abba, Father!"

The Working of Leaven.

Plan of the Creation; or, Other Worlds, and Who Inhabit Them. By Rev. C. L. Hequembourg. 12mo. pp. 396. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. 1859.

We are of course interested in any new book that teaches, as the revealed doctrine of final punishment, eternal death instead of immortal woe. And this book is curiously interesting. Who the author is we know not. The only glimpse of personal history he gives is this,—that he became acquainted with the above heresy "long ago," during "some pastoral labors with a class of Adventists," with whom, on several other points, he does not agree. He regards the second coming of Christ as having taken place in the judgment upon Jerusalem. The resurrection also began then; not in a body of spirit, as Swedenborg and others hold, but in a material body, with material organs, that lives upon material meat and drink and air. But this resurrection is accomplished not on the earth, but over all the universe of worlds, which is still young and waiting to be peopled with the ripe fruits of creative and redemptive work in this world. The author is not alone in making earth the moral centre of the universe, or in regarding the universe as still infant. But in thus making earth the seminary of the universe, he aggravates the difficulties which Chalmers strove to meet in his Astronomical Discourses; and which he so much respected as to suggest that possibly the incarnation of Christ in Palestine was not a single redemptive act in the universe, but one of many in God's eternity. It is amusing, along with so much discovery of "highly figurative language" in the Scriptures, and with so far-reaching speculation, that the author should presume to wish that Professor Bush might return from his error to the church, of which he was so bright an ornament.

The book is a good sign of the times, as showing that one of its heresies is not inseparable from Advent views, but may be held in the strongest contrast with them. Indeed, we are credibly certified that Rev. T. L. Harris, Editor of the Herald of Light,—who detests the vulgar Spiritualism as a proud doctrine of self-indulgence, and who finds a better gospel of self-denial,—holds that immortality depends on faith in Christ. So, whatever are the logical connections of this doctrine, there are other ways to come at it than by the Advent faith. We know another gentleman who agrees in some points with our author, all whose philsophy favors such a distinction between the worthy and the worthless, the wheat and the chaff. And we have heard such a sceptic even as Ralph Waldo Emerson pronounce this view "eminently philosophical."

With all its heresies, as we regard them, Mr. H's. book is excellently worth reading. Abating one or two adjectives of censure, it is a rare union of speculative boldness and confidence, with modesty and gentleness. It shows a good deal of reading and no small ability. His remarks on the right of private judgment, and the evils of sect, are very well put. The book, as a whole, will set people a thinking; and whatever does that in Christ's name, does good.

Correspondence.

From N. Colburn.

Bro. Grant:—We read that we should pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks, and I verily believe that if God's children would pray more, we might see the cause of Christ in a more flourishing state at the present day. O why is it that we are so slack in the cause of our blessed Master, expressly when we believe we are living so near the end of time? While I look around upon God's professed children, who seem to be asleep, and losing so much precious time, I cannot hold my peace; but I am led to cry out, Awake, awake! put on thy strength, O Zion! If there ever was a time when the church ought to awake, it is now; and my prayer is, that God would give us such a shaking that we cannot sleep; but that we may arise and trim our lamps, and go to work for the salvation of souls. There has been in this place, for about ten years past, almost a famine; not of bread, but of the Spirit of God; but of late God's children have began to pray mightily to the giver of every good and perfect gift, for an outpouring of his Holy Spirit in our midst; and I believe that we are united, for the work of the Lord is being revived, sinners are inquiring what they must do to be saved; the wanderer is coming home to his Father's house, and the luke-warm are stirred up. My prayer is, that the church in this place, as well as in other places, may feel more of a laboring spirit. O that we might arise and go to work for our lives, and for the lives of those around us, that the blood of souls may not be required at our hands when Jesus comes to take the faithful home. Time is very precious. Let us improve each moment as it passes. And may we have wisdom from above, that we may know how to improve them to the honor and glory of Him who has made us, and called us to work in his vineyard.

Bro. Grant:—The Lord permitting, I shall again spend several months in the Eastern States; and brethren wishing me to preach on Lord's day, or lecture, or hold discussions during the week, can write me here, to the care of Bro. G. T. Adams, or the Crisis office.

I shall make it a prominent object in my travels to spread books and tracts, not only my own, as noticed in the Crisis, but also those of Brn. Storrs, Hastings, Grant, Grew, Hudson, and others, and all new works on our views, as they come out.

Any wishing my works to sell on commission, can have them by sending orders to me, or to Eld. Grant.

Boston, April 25, '59.

From E. Shaw.

Bro. Grant:—It is about one year since we formed a church here in Goshen, and we are still determined to do our Master's will.

O, for a faith that will not shrink,
Though pressed by many a foe;
That will not tremble on the brink
Of poverty or woe.

A faith that shines more bright and clear,
When tempests rage without;
That when in danger knows no fear,
In darkness feels no doubt.

Such faith is a well springing up into everlasting life.

Bro. Pratt has been here a short time, but has now gone to other fields of labor. Am thankful to God for the opportunity of again hearing from him on the shores of time. We partook of the Lord's supper last Sabbath evening; it was a solemn and precious season to our waiting souls. We have been fed with the bread from heaven, and oh, may God help us to overcome all things, that we may have a right to the tree of life, and live forever on the new earth with our blessed Savior, where there shall be no more death, and where the inhabitants will no more say, I am sick.

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow!"

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Poland, Me., April 18th, 1859, Mrs. Emma S. Jordan, aged thirty-three.

The subject of this notice suffered a severe and protracted illness of ten weeks. The disease which terminated so fatally was congestion of the liver. There was nothing that could be done for the deceased but what was done, whether it refer to medical aid, the kindness of a companion, or the care and sympathy of friends. By day and night she was attended, and had it been in the power of mortals to have baffled the disease, it would have been done. But the more they did to arrest its progress, the more did the malady mock their efforts. It seemed that death had marked her for his victim, and, with heart relentless as his step was bold, was determined on his prey. The warning was sufficient to have assured the friends that death must come; notwithstanding, they seemed to hope against hope. Perhaps it was not so much hope as desire, prompted by the purest affection, often developing itself in its ejaculations, the sorrow of heart experienced by a kind companion and loving friends.

But she is gone! How these words crowd upon the mind filling the heart with sorrow! How the reality chills the whole being! She is gone! Another jewel has been deposited in heaven's casket. Another dear one sleeps in Christ. Safe! yes, eternally safe!—"Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord;" "yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." Difficult to find one whose example was more worthy of imitation than that exhibited in the life of the deceased. She was an exemplary christian, meek, unassuming and retiring. Her religion was not of a boisterous, but of an intelligent character, exhibiting the same constancy in every position of life. She was an every day christian, moved rather by principle than impulse.

As to her faith, she was a firm believer in the speedy, personal advent of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the renovation of the earth. These great truths, in connection with other principles, were held sacred to the day of her death.

In her decease the Church and community have sustained a great loss. This is also true of her friends, and particularly so of her twin-born sister. But there are none who will feel the loss more sensibly than her companion. None but those suffering a like bereavement can tell of the anguish of heart realized under these circumstances. May Heaven sustain the relatives of the deceased in this hour of trial. May the hope of meeting a companion, a daughter and a sister, cheer the hearts of all the mourning friends; and may the blessing of God attend them through life, and at last give them the kingdom, where friend will meet friend, and parting be known no more.

"So fades the lovely, blooming flower"

Died, in Yarmouth, Maine., April 12th, Albert L., a twin-child of Bro P. U., and Sr. Sarah Hutchins; aged 4 months 10 days.

Two "little flowers" of promise fair
Upon stern Winter's frosty air;
In love and innocence complete
Disclosed their hues of fragrance sweet.

Ere Summer's "gentle zephyrs played,"
One of those flowers did droop and fade:
'Twas plucked by death's relentless hand,
And borne to his dark, dreary land.

But soon he'll loose his "tyrant power,"
And yield again this lovely flower,
When it will bloom to fade no more
"On Canaan's bright and happy shore."

FRANCE.

The movement of the troops and war material in France continues on a large scale.

The Herald's Paris correspondent states that about 25,000 men are on the way to reinforce the army of Lyons.

The Paris correspondent of the Times writes that the question of peace and war is still in conjecture. Piedmont manifests no intention of disarming, while Austria insists upon this step as a preliminary condition to the Peace Congress.

The feeling that war is inevitable prevails at the French Foreign Office, and is shared by some of the highest functionaries. Count Cavour is reported to have said that he could, at any time, apply the match to the materials of conflagration at his command, and force France to join him.

The Daily News correspondent says that orders have been sent to Toulon, that sixty-eight vessels which have long been repairing there, should be made ready to put to sea upon a day's notice if required. Eight vessels also have been ordered at once from Brest for Toulon.

All Marseilles vessels in the Adriatic are returning home, considering those waters unsafe, and no freights from Trieste can now be had.

Prince Gortschakoff, the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, is expected in Paris.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News, writing on the 7th says that all the news during the week was decidedly warlike. The Director-General of the Sardinian Railways had had a long interview with the Emperor. It was announced that the National Guard of Paris was likely to be increased from 30,000 to 150,000, so as to render the regular army of Paris available for a campaign. Lastly, it was reported, that the English squadron at Malta had been ordered to the Adriatic.

An important election is about to take place in the Department of the Gironde, when the government candidate is to be opposed by the new proprietor of La Presse, whose rallying cry will be peace.

AUSTRIA.

An analysis is published of Count Buol's reply to Russia's proposal of a Congress. He declares that the whole difficulty is to be found in the policy of Piedmont, and regards the Congress as a means of putting an end to the danger which threatens Europe. Should other questions be mooted, they ought to be stated beforehand. The clash of arms should not accompany negotiations. If Piedmont will disarm, Austria will do so likewise. Until preliminaries are settled, Austria may relax, but will not suspend operations. Her troops will continue to march towards Italy.

Advices from Milan state that the following order of the day had been posted in the barracks of that town:

"Austrian soldiers—The Emperor calls you around his banner to beat down for the third time the pride of Piedmont—to expel from their den those fanatics who destroy the tranquility of Europe. Advance against enemies who have always fled before you. Remember the victories of '48 and '49! Remember Novara, where your foes were dispersed and annihilated! Let your watchword be 'Viva il Imperatore! Our rights forever!'"

The Vienna correspondent of the Times telegraphs as follows:

"Vienna, Friday evening. The long expected crisis is at hand. A corps of 40,000 men goes from this city to Italy to-morrow, and on the following day another corps of 60,000 men is to be assembled here. A reserve corps of 70,000 will be placed in Bohemia and Moravia. The reserve of the army in Italy and of the corps about to leave the city have been called in.

The Vienna journals continue to be most hostile to the government of the Tuileries, and to tauntingly say that Count Cavour is the only man in the world that possesses the French Emperor's secret.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times writes: "The sincerity of the French government is about to be put to the test, for this government a day or two since proposed a general disarmament. If France accept the proposition, peace will probably be maintained; if she rejects it, war is almost inevitable. Sardinia persists in refusing to disarm unless Austria does so likewise, but the latter cannot possibly suspend her preparations for war as long as the Emperor of the French continues his armaments."

The Austrian Gazette says: "For us the Congress is but a secondary affair; the capital point is that the armaments should cease. The Congress cannot meet for a month, and its deliberations will last at least two more. Are we to be spending our money all this while in armaments which will be of course highly useful if we are to fight, but superfluous in the contrary case?"

SARDINIA.

The London Morning Post publishes a long and important memorandum presented by the Sardinian government to that of Great Britain on the condition of Italy. It is dated Turin, March 1, and is an answer to the interpellations of the English government. It points out the change by which the danger of war or revolution would be warded off, and the Italian question at least temporarily solved.

It is now asserted that Cavour is anything but satisfied with the result of his trip to Paris, and has lost confidence in the fulfillment of his hopes.

ITALY.

A correspondent of the Times, at Rome, says the general opinion there is that the Congress will simply delay war, but cannot prevent it, because they will not effectually settle the Italian question.

It is confidently stated that neither the Papal government nor the King of Naples will send representatives to Congress.

The Independence Belge says the King of Naples is rapidly sinking. Other accounts represent him as better, but not out of danger. The latest dispatch says five of his physicians have declared him incurable.

The Papal government are preparing an official note relative to the proposed Congress, to be addressed to the great powers.

By way of Russia it is reported a famine was prevailing in the southern part of China.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The report of the confidential committee appointed to inquire into the state of the English Navy, as contrasted with that of France, has been published. It seems that the expenditure on the French Navy during the past seven years has been nearly £39,000,000, while that of England has been above £53,000,000, and it seems doubtful whether the French Navy is not really in the more effective condition.

AUSTRIAN ITALY.

Letters from Milan announce the arrival at that town of two battalions of Croats. Orders had been issued to the railway directors to hold their lines in readiness for the transport of a fresh corps d'armee of 25,000 men. The roads were encumbered with material for war and army stores.

ROME.

In Rome, the priestly party look upon the proposed Congress on the affairs of Italy with great dislike and jealousy, as an unjustifiable interference with the internal arrangements of the State. The people too, or at any rate the Liberal party—have very little faith in the Congress, and at the most expect that it will botch up the Italian question so as to avert war for the present.

LATER.

Per steamship city of Washington. Liverpool 12th.

The correspondent of the Herald says, not withstanding the pacific assurances, warlike preparations continue in France on a tremendous scale. Troops are pouring into Lyons from all points.

A letter from Munich states that the cavalry and infantry of the Bavarian army are to be placed on a war footing, and before the end of the month all Germany will be in arms.

A dispatch from Berlin says that it is asserted in competent military circles, that by the 1st of June Napoleon will have six hundred thousand men ready to march, of which 150,000 are to be used in Italy.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald says that it was expected that within a fortnight, at the latest, hostilities would commence.

The London Times' correspondent says that every item of intelligence points to immediate war. The war panic in France had paralyzed commercial activity.

The excitement in Piedmont had reached a high pitch and arming was carried forward on a formidable scale.

Letters from Vienna say that as Sardinia persists in the refusal to disarm, France and England have proposed to the Turin government to withdraw their forces three leagues from the frontier. Sardinia accepts the proposition, but Austria hesitates.

The same writer, a few days later says, it was anticipated that Austria would, in a few days, declare war against Sardinia. Austrian troops continued to advance upon the frontier of Piedmont. Reinforcements were arriving every day at Milan and Pavia.

Spring.

How grateful to humanity this breath
Of the returning sun, who left us drear
In the pale melancholy of the year
Which tottered downward to December death!
The blue-bird is its herald, at whose voice
The violets peep out from the new-fledged grass,
And all the field's first marvels come to pass,
And in one common anthem sing, "rejoice!"
Mortality! press near, in spite of care,
To worship without either fane or shrine;
The air, the earth, the brook are now divine;
The heart goes up, though lips neglect the prayer.
The Resurrection whispers in the breeze—
The voice of God is heard among the budding trees.

For the Crisis.

Thou wilt come again.

AIR.—Gentle Annie.

Thou wilt come again, blessed Savior,
I hope will come to my desolate heart,
In thine absence I pine for thy favor,
O, when shall my sorrow all depart?
Ah! I surely shall behold thee,
I shall hear thy loving voice again:
Thou shalt come in my heart, blessed Savior,
And my soul shall be happy once again.

Thou wilt come again, blessed Savior,
To thy sighing and sorrowing bride;
Thou shalt shed on her spirit thy favor,
And shalt take her to dwell by thy side.
She shall dwell in realms of glory,
Where sorrow shall no more appear,
She shall tell them in triumph the story
Of her stay in earth's wilderness drear.

Thou wilt come again, blessed Savior,
To thy groaning and sin-smitten world;
Thou wilt come and destroy the usurper,
Who down to the pit shall be hurled;
And then shall earth's sad lamentation,
Its wars and convulsions all cease,
And the groanings of a groaning creation
Shall be hushed in the anthems of peace.

For the Crisis.

Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy. No. 2.

Moses not only predicted the removal of the Jews into all lands, but he also predicted their condition while among strange nations.—"And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind." How strikingly has all this been accomplished! They have been unceasingly persecuted and despised. In some portions of the world they now enjoy peace, but not in all. Not only have the followers of Him whom the Jews rejected and crucified opposed them, but strangers even to the religion of the Nazarene. Mohammedans and Pagans have been their persecutors. They have been a by-word, and a hissing, and a reproach, among all people. They are a standing monument of God's truth, and of his justice.

It had been foretold that the Israelites should suffer so strangely and conspicuously that the attention of other nations would be arrested, and inquiries be made respecting the origin of their sufferings, and they should be for a sign, and a wonder upon their seed forever. That this is true, no man can deny. Whatever the religious tenets of any historian, or traveler, who has been acquainted with their condition, he has acknowledged that it is wonderful, and cannot be accounted for upon natural principles. "Good God!" exclaimed the infidel Volney, when surveying Palestine—"from whence proceed such melancholy revolutions? For what cause is the fortune of these countries so strikingly changed? Why are so many cities destroyed? Why is not that ancient population reproduced and perpetuated? I wandered over the country, traversed the provinces,—I enumerated the kingdoms of Damascus and Idumea, of Jerusalem and Samaria. 'This Syria,' said I to myself, 'now almost depopulated, then contained a hundred flourishing cities, and with towns, villages, and hamlets.' What has become of so many productions of the hands of man? What has become of those ages of abundance and life?"

Not only have the Jewish nation become a by-word and a proverb, but their land also is a sign and a wonder to all nations, as spake their prophet Moses.—"The stranger that shall come from a far land shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon it—even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land?" An infidel, Volney, lifts up his hands in astonishment, as he contrasts its former fertility and greatness with its present barrenness and desolation, and asks—"For what cause is this fortune of these countries so strikingly changed?" but believes not the reason assigned by revelation.

Palestine was once remarkable for its fertility. It consisted of an area of about eleven thousand square miles, not quite one fourth as large as the state of New York, [illegible] it sustained a population of five millions at one time. See Sam. 24: 8. Josephus describes Galilee as "full of plantations of trees of all sorts, insomuch that it invites the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation; by its fruitfulness accordingly, it is all cultivated by its inhabitants, and no part of it lies idle. Moreover, the cities lie here very thick, and the very many villages that are here, are everywhere so full of people by the richness of their land, that the very least of them contain above fifteen thousand." Tacitus, the Roman historian, says,—"The soil was so fertile, and the fruits such as are common with us, besides balsam and dates." But, alas, how changed! "Those mountains, which once were [illegible] covered with vines, and olive [illegible] and fig-trees, are now, with a few [illegible], bleak, uncultivated and barren. [illegible] waste, its vallies are desolate. [illegible] places the land is cultivated, [illegible] yields sufficient to sustain its few [illegible] inhabitants.

Not only did Moses predict the dispersion of the Jews among all nations [illegible]

tion among them, and the remarkable change in their [illegible] accurately describes the nation which was to come against them, emptied, and scatter them.

Read now the prophet's description of this nation centuries before Romulus and Remus existed with their banditti band at Rome, that great city which afterward became the mistress of the world.—"The Lord shall bring against thee a nation from far, from the end of the earth." Rome was far removed from Palestine; it was a place never visited by them, and of which they perhaps had never heard. "As swift as the eagle flieth." The Romans moved with unparalleled celerity when they went to war, and always surprised their enemies. "I came—I saw—I conquered!" was the significant language of their greatest general, after his greatest triumph. We see also the aptness of the prophet's similitude, when we consider that the eagle was the standard of the Romans.

It shall be "a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand." Probably many of them could speak the Egyptian, Persian, and Arabian language, also that of Babylon; but the nation who was to subdue them was a strange, a far-distant nation, of whose speech they were wholly ignorant. A nation, too, "of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favor to the young." "Fierceness of countenance," is said to have been a well-known characteristic of the Roman soldiers; and their merciless severity, their impartial cruelty in time of action, the unhesitating ferocity with which they slaughtered indiscriminately all who opposed them," to have been proverbial, and especially was this exhibited in the destruction of the Jewish nation.

How could Moses thus foresee, and thus accurately describe a nation before it had any existence—before the founder of Rome had been born, or, very possibly, before the site of the city had been redeemed from the primitive forest, unless he was inspired by the Spirit of God? W.

For the Crisis.

That Trial.

It did me good. It was only a few hours ago that I bowed beneath it, and now all is calm, and I bless God for its coming. It showed me how weak I was. It sent me to Jesus with tears and supplications. It crushed my poor heart until penitence came forth from it like perfume from a flower. It revealed my idols, and bade me cast them down. It taught me to pray God to save me from things in which my wayward heart before delighted.

O God, I bless thee for every sorrow with which thou hast humbled my foolish heart.

"O to be brought to Jesus' feet,
Though trials bring me there!"

Let the trials come, while needful. "Now for a season, if needs be," let me be "in heaviness through manifold temptations." Let me bear the cross and the rod,—surely they are the badges of my Savior's passion, and the tokens of my Father's love. Shall I murmur? Shall I despise the chastening, or faint beneath the correction of my Father? Save me from it, gracious Lord! Make me humble, patient and right. Purge away my dross—make me pure and holy. O, do thou be my strength in these dark, weary hours. Let me know thy faithfulness, even in the fiery furnace. Let me share thy grace amid the scenes of bondage and of tears. Father in heaven, I trust thy promises—I cling to thine everlasting arm. Forsake me not, O Lord. Give me not up to walk in my own ways. Save me from my own rebellious heart. Spare not for my crying, and yet, oh, my Father, deal gently and kindly with me. Let not my courage fail. Let not my strength be consumed beneath the fierceness of my woes. O let me grow strong in affliction and joyful in sorrow! Let thy strength be made perfect in my weakness, and in the midst of all my infirmities let the power of Christ rest upon me. O make me to bear thine own blessed likeness in all things. Help me to show to others the life and purity that was in Christ.

Father in heaven, I bless thee for every trial. I bear thee witness that thou hast been faithful to thy word, while my promises have often been broken. Thou hast been always good, while I have been evil and unthankful. Thou hast given me favor, and honor, and prosperity, while, alas! I have often wandered like a lost sheep. O God, I return to thee with weeping and with sighs of heart. O keep me in the fold, since thou hast brought me thither. I yield myself to thee. I crave thy blessing. I fly for shelter to thine arms. I grieve for my wanderings. I repent of all my waywardness. I bless thee for thy love. I glorify thee in afflictions. I kiss the rod. I bless thee for that trial. Still continue to be my friend evermore. Amen and amen. H. L. H.

☞ The barking of dogs is an acquired hereditary instinct, supposed to have originated in an attempt to imitate the human voice. Wild dogs and domestic breeds that become wild, never bark but howl. The French Empire.

BY GEO. STORRS.

The re-establishment of the Napoleon Dynasty in France, has opened a new chapter in prophecy, as clearly marking the time in which we live, as any event in modern history. The prophecy relating to this scene is found chiefly in Revelation, 17th chapter.

Prophecy was given for a light to the Church of God; designed to show it, at the period of fulfillment, the exact position and time occupied by it, that it might never be without a "day-star," or "day-dawn," to guide its steps. It is not necessary to suppose that the church living before the events predicted take place should be able to fix them with exactness; nor for it, when living centuries after the events take place, to fix with certainty all the events which were the subject of prophecy: this would require more knowledge of profane history than most saints have the means of acquiring. But passing events are more within the knowledge of all; and the prophecies relating to them are what immediately concern the church in whatever period it may be called to labor or suffer.

In the prophecies of Scripture a beast is the symbol of a Dynasty, or Body of Rulers. It does not include the ruled, or subjects. To suppose this, is to destroy the harmony of prophecy. The same dynasty may be, and sometimes is, symbolized by different beasts. The seventh and eighth chapters of Daniel are presented in proof of this. It is not our object now to enter further into that argument, but to show that the Napoleon Dynasty is symbolized in Revelations 17, and then briefly suggest its mission in this present development.

At the opening of that chapter, one of the angels having the seven last plagues called John to view the position the great harlot occupied when she was going to judgment; and he beheld her seated on a scarlet-colored beast, having seven heads and ten horns. That this harlot represents the Papal Dynasty, we shall not now stop to argue, as we consider that point long since settled. The corrupt body of rulers of that corrupt church appear supporting their power by taking refuge on the civil dynasty that is described by a scarlet colored beast. The description of that beast shows it to be a dynasty differing from any previous one. The Dragon, Rev. 12, has seven heads and ten horns, but has crowns on his heads. The first beast, Rev. 13, has the same number of heads and horns, but has the crowns on his horns. The beast in the 17th chapter appears with the same number of heads and horns, but no mention is made of any crowns; and yet it is shown to have a family relation by the seven heads.

The peculiarities of this beast are, that it is "the eighth, and is of the seven"—that "it was, is not, and YET IS;"—and that it is, by ascending out of the abussou—the abyss. It had been in power—that power for a time is not; then, suddenly, it ascends from its non-existence and appears to the wonder of all except the followers of Christ, for whose special benefit the prophecy was given; and who, by a careful attention to the words of Christ, are enabled to see the approaching consummation in the accuracy of the events fulfilling the prophecy. . . .

We find Napoleon proclaimed Emperor of France and King of Italy; and assuming to be the successor of the Cæsars. Thus the seventh is developed. "It was"—but soon "it is not;" and the world supposed it had disappeared for ever. But, before forty years pass away, an "eighth" appears from the abyss, to the wonder of the world; but this eighth is not another dynasty—it "is of the seven;" it is the same that "was"—then "is not"—and "yet is."

Nothing could be more accurate in its fulfillment than the prophecy in the Napoleon Dynasty; and when Louis Napoleon entered Paris on his return from his tour through France, to prepare the way for the proclamations of the Empire, some of the sentiments inscribed on the banners that graced his entry into the city, were such as this—"The uncle that was—the nephew that is." Thus employing the very words of the prophecy, though unknowingly, to themselves.

For a time this dynasty "is not." When Napoleon I. abdicated, he did so in favor of his son, Napoleon II. But that son never came to power—he "is not" a reigning portion of the dynasty: and the dynasty itself, for near forty years, "is not." It then "ascended from the abyss," and now "it is!" Thus far all seems plain.

We next remark—That in ascending from the abyss, one of the first acts of the beast is to receive the great harlot to sit upon him. She takes her seat there just as the "judgment" is about to be executed upon her. Here again history and prophecy harmonize. The Papal power was driven from Rome, and was not likely to recover its seat. But the ascending beast sent his republican [!] armies to Italy, and the harlot takes her seat on, or by means of, that scarlet-colored beast, where she now sits; because, as yet, Louis Napoleon knows it is for his interest to let her sit upon—not guide—his dynasty. So long as he can use her for his own aggrandizement, so long will he consent to let her sit as she does.

Thus far the fulfillment seems perfect; but we now approach the future. Here all we can do is to trace the outlines. There seems clearly to be "ten kings"—or small dynasties—yet to be developed, who are to be united to the beast by a voluntary giving of "their power and strength to the beast," verse 13; after which, by some means, or from some cause not yet developed, "the beast with the horns," [so the Syriac reads,] will come in collision with the harlot, and "eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." Let the papal or harlot power attempt to put bits in the mouth of this beast, or to restrain his ambition, and she will soon find she has been riding to judgment, and her destruction is certain and final.

Another event in the history of this dynasty and its horns is, they will "make war on the Lamb": consequently this "short space" dynasty will continue in power till the Lamb shall return to claim the kingdoms of this world. That war is briefly spoken of in the conclusion of the 17th chapter, with the emphatic declaration—"The Lamb shall overcome them." The 19th chapter speaks of this war more in detail, and after describing "the armies in heaven," that followed the Lamb, John proceeds to say—"I saw the beast [the Napoleon Dynasty,] and the kings [the ten kings] of the earth, [who had given their power to the beast] and their armies gathered together to make war against him that sat upon the horse, [viz: the Lamb,] and against his army."

Thus the battle is set in array—the war commences—tremendous scenes open—a conflict that is to decide the government of this world. Is this not a matter of interest to all? What is to be the result? The prophecy does not leave us in doubt—"The Lamb shall overcome them"; chapter 17: 14;—"the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him. * * * These both were cast alive into a lake of fire and brimstone"; chapter 19: 20. The 17th chapter had said, verse 11, he "goeth into perdition"—is destroyed. The 20th chapter tells us this is done when he makes war on the "King of kings and Lord of lords." Then he—that is—this dynasty—goeth into perdition, or is destroyed, and that destruction is final.

Now, whether all these things will take place under Napoleon III.—the present reigning Emperor of France—we will not pretend to say—the events yet undeveloped must determine that. But this we must say, If we have given the right application of the prophecy—and of this we see no reason to doubt—then the Napoleon Dynasty will not pass away till all these things be fulfilled; and as it is to be a "short space" dynasty, it does not seem likely that many years more can be allotted to it. If, however, the present Emperor of France is to be succeeded by others of the same family, it will not alter the general features of the prophecy; we are manifestly fast approaching the world's crisis; and the most astonishing events will, most likely, soon burst upon the world, which will cause the hearts of many to fail them with fear and consternation.

Much more might be said upon this subject; and we have by no means exhausted it. All we have aimed to do is, to throw out hints to call attention to prophecy as connected with passing events: this we feel bound to do as a watchman. As to fixing upon particular days or years for the accomplishment of all these things, we have no hand in it; and we are fully settled that all such calculations are injurious in their tendency, and calculated to throw the mind from that calm and sober waiting for the Lord, which ought ever to control and govern us, if we would be preserved from wild fanaticism.

Let us remember, the night is far spent—the day is at hand. Let us watch and keep ourselves unspotted from the world, walking in the footsteps of our blessed Lord and Life-Giver, Jesus the Messiah; that when He who is our life shall appear, we also may appear with him in glory.

Beloved reader, let us not forget that this present life is of infinite value to us; because, if improved as God has enjoined and commanded, we may gain an unending life. May none of the cares, anxieties, pursuits, or perplexities of this present time lead us to neglect the great and glorious prize of Immortality, Incorruptibility, Eternal Life; which can only be secured by a living union with Christ, the heavenly-appointed Life-Giver. May the Spirit of God be shed on us through Him, that we may be aided to walk in the truth, and be made partakers of Everlasting Life thereby.

[The foregoing was written several years since, but seems to be in harmony with passing and prospective events.—Ed.

☞ A Catholic priest opened the United States Senate with prayer, on Thursday. He was Father Boyle, of St Patrick's Church, Washington. The priest was in full dress of surplice and cassock. It is the first occasion since the foundation of the government that the entire vestments of the Romish clergy have been seen in either chamber. The Rev. Father read from the breviary Bishop Carroll's prayer for those in authority. The chamber happened to be crowded, and much interest and curiosity were manifested, with every appearance of devotion in the senators and spectators.

Preachings upon Popular Proverbs.

BY TIMOTHY TITCOMB.

"You stout and I stout,
Who shall carry the dirt out?"

"Every man cannot be vicar of Bowden."
"He that cannot paint must grind the colors."

Who shall be vicar of Bowden and who shall carry the dirt out—who shall paint and who shall grind the colors—are questions which, in various forms, have agitated the world since human society existed.—Dissatisfaction with position and condition is well nigh universal. Every man walks with his eyes and wishes upwards—some moved by aspiration for a nobler good, others by ambition for a higher place; some by emulation of a worthy example, others by discontent with the allotments of Providence. The infant does not forget to climb when he learns to walk, nor is the man less a climber than the boy. Everything is towering, or climbing, or reaching, or looking upward. The elm stretches its feathery arms and waves its hands toward the clouds that hang over it; the vine pulls itself up the elm by its delicate fingers; and the violet sits at the foot of the vine and looks up, and breathes its fragrant wishes heavenward. Even the sleeping lakelet in the meadow dreams of stars, and will not be satisfied without a private firmament of water-lilies. It is as if God had whispered into the ear of all existence the moment it was emerging from nihility the words—"Look up!" and, hardly knowing why, it had been looking up ever since. Well, this is right; for, far above everything shines the great White Throne—sits the Father Soul—abide the treasuries of all good—burns the uncreated fire at which the torches of life were lighted. It is a natural, instinctive thing to look upward.

Discontent may be a very good thing, or a very bad thing. There is a discontent which is divine,—which has its birth in the highest and purest inspirations that visit and stir the soul. All that discontent that grows from dissatisfaction with present attainment, or springs from a desire for higher usefulness, or has its birth in motives that impel to the worthy achievement of an honorable name and an honorable place, is a thing to be visited by blessings and benisons. Discontent which comes from below—which comes from a soul disgusted with its lot, faithless in God, and out of harmony with the arrangements and the operations of Providence, is an evil thing—only evil—and that continually. One holds the principle of love; the other of malice. One is attracted from above; the other is instigated from below. One tends to the development of a symmetrical, strong and harmonious character; the other to disorganization and depreciation. One is from heaven, the other is from hell.

I look out of my window, and see a carriage rolling by, with its freight of richly-dressed ladies. On the coach-box sits a man who drives the horses when they go, and opens the door of the carriage and lets down the steps when they stop. Further up the street there is a building going up. The architect stands by with his hand in his breast, giving directions. The hod-carrier, smeared with mortar, passes him, climbs the giddy ladder, and drops the bricks upon the scaffolding, and these, one after another, are driven to their places by the ringing trowel of the brick-layer. I rise from my seat, and walk through the rooms adjoining my own. Here sits an editor, hastily putting together the thoughts that will form to-morrow's leader. At another table sits another editor, calling from a pile of exchanges bits of intelligence that come in on a thousand paper wings from other communities. At their cases stand the compositors, setting up, type by type, the matter which the editors prepare for them. The pressman and the engineer have their respective parts to perform. I find the great aggregate of life to be a network of duties—an organised system of duties. In order to secure the comfort of the whole, there is a certain amount of work to be done, infinitely various in kind. There must be an architect to plan, there must be a hod-carrier to bear mortar, and a brick-layer to lay the bricks, or we shall have no buildings. There must be an editor, and a compositor, and a pressman, or there will be no newspaper. Who shall do the thinking, and who shall perform the manual labor? Who shall paint, and who shall grind the colors? Every man cannot be vicar of Bowden.

It does not suffice to tell discontented people that every man has his place, and will find his highest account in seeking to fill it, and to fill it well. What particularly troubles them, is, that they were made for so low a place. They really call God's wisdom and benevolence in question for assigning to them subordinate offices in operating the machinery of society. A man finds himself distinguished by clumsy hands and broad shoulders, with a hod on his back, and complains that he was not made for a brick-layer; and the brick-layer wishes he had the ease and honor of the architect, and wonders why his power of achievement is so closely circumscribed. The coachman rubs down his horses, and marvels that he was not born to their ownership, and that the owner was not born to drive for him. So people quarrel with their position, the world over. Everything in the world is unequal to these people. They do not see the impartial justice of conferring upon one man great mental faculties, pleasant address, and commanding presence, while another is condemned to be a dwarf, both in mind and body, and to serve his more highly-favored neighbor that he may win bread and raiment. . . . . .

But there is a better and a broader basis for the settlement of this matter than this; and did we possess even a modicum of the faith in God that we ought to possess, we should feel certain there would be such a basis, though we might fail to find it. The instinctive, persistent search of the soul is for happiness. We seek for office, or place, or wealth; we [illegible] the fact that our mental endowments and acquisitions are comparatively indifferent or positively mean; and why? Because, while we lie dreaming upon our pillow of stone, the places and positions of life shape themselves into a ladder on which angels ascend and descend, the last round leaning on a heavenly landing; because that which is above us, in allotment, gift and acquisition, forms so many steps of the gradatory that leads from the cells where we do penance, to the temple where we expect peace and heavenly communion. In other words, we are discontented because we believe there is more happiness on the upper steps of society than on ours; and here is where the great mistake is made.

If there be anything which human history teaches more thoroughly than any other thing—if there be any fact revealed to observation more clearly than any other fact—it is, that happiness does not depend upon condition and position—that it has its birth in possessions and relations superior to, and in most respects unaffected by, those facts of individual and social life which divide men into classes. Here is where the Good Father equalizes human lot. High position, considered by itself, is not a positive good—is not, in and for itself, a source of happiness to the souls planted upon it. There is no good reason to be found in the whole universe of God why the coachman should not be as happy as the dainty ladies whom he serves. There is no reason why the hod-carrier should not be as happy as the brick-layer, and the brick-layer as happy as the architect. Wants keep pace with wealth, always. Responsibility walks hand in hand with capacity and power. Of him to whom much is given much will be required. Posts of honor are evermore posts of danger and of care. Each office of society has its burden, proportioned to its importance; so that men shall find no apology for murmuring at the better lot of their neighbors, while all are made dependent for happiness upon common sources—open alike to him who wears fine linen and fares sumptuously every day, and the beggar who waits at his gate.

I am inclined to think that if our minds were capable of apprehending the essential facts of the life we see, we should be convinced that happiness is one of the most evenly distributed of all human possessions. The laborer loves his wife and children as well as the lord, and takes into his soul all the tender influences that flow to him through their love as well as he. Food tastes as sweetly to the ploughman as the placeman. If the latter have the daintier dish, the former has the keener appetite. Into all ears the brook pours the same stream of music, and the birds never vary their programme with reference to their audiences. The spring scatters violets broadcast, and grass grows by the roadside as well as in the park. The breeze that tosses the curls of your little ones and mine is not softer in its caresses of those who bound over velvet to greet it. The sun shines, the rains fall, the trees dress themselves in green, the thunder rolls and the stars flash for all alike. Health knows nothing of human distinctions, and abides with him who treats it best. Sleep, the gentle angel, does not come at the call of power, and never proffers its ministry for gold. The senses take no bribes of luxury; but deal as honestly and generously by the poor as by the rich: and the president of the United States would whistle himself blind before he could call our dog from us.

If we examine this matter critically, we shall find that the sweetest satisfactions that come to us are those which spring from sources common to the race. If you and I are worthy men, that which is most precious to us, as the material of our daily happiness, is precisely that which is not dependent upon the positions we respectfully occupy in the world. Now, if we look above this range of common Providence into that realm of fact in which abides our common relationship to a common Father, the distinctions of society and the variety and contrariety of human lot fade away and become contemptible. If God smile on me and fill my heart with peace; if he forgive my sin, and give me promise and assurance of a higher life beyond the grave; if he call me his child, and draw out from my cold and selfish heart a filial love for him; if he inspire me with a brotherly charity that embraces in its arms all who bear his image; if he give me a hope more precious to me than all gold, and transform the narrow path in which I walk into the vestibule of heaven, it will very naturally be a matter of indifference to me whether I paint, or grind the colors—whether I carry dirt, or officiate as the vicar of Bowden. If we were all made in His image; if we are all held amenable to the same law; if we all have offer of the same salvation; if we are all to be judged according to our deeds; if we have the promise of the same heaven on the same terms, it shows, at least, what God thinks of human distinctions.

The ministry of nature, and love, and sympathy are common to all men. On the broad platform of morals, the king stands uncovered by the side of the peasant, and wealth and place flaunt no titles and claim no privileges. In religion, all men kneel and worship a common Lord. Men are placed in different positions in this world simply because there is a great variety of work to do, and no one man can do all kinds. If you and I have found our places—if we find ourselves engaged in doing that thing which, on the whole, we can do better than any thing else, then low discontent with our lot is not only sinful but mean. God gives to you and to me just as many sources of innocent happiness as he has given to anybody, and opens to us just as fair a heaven as he has opened to anybody. It becomes us, therefore, to fill our places, and do our particular duties well, hold up our heads in front of every man with self-respectful complacency, do honor to the office which God has selected for us by a faithful performance of its functions, and take and pocket contentedly the penny a day which we get in common with others. The Creator doubtless knew what weak, unreasonable, and inconsistent creatures we should be when he made us; but if you and I had made a world full of people, and set them at work with pledge of equal pay and equal privilege in all essential good, and they had set themselves to erecting artificial distinctions among themselves, and gone to whining over the parts we had assigned to them, we should be exceedingly disappointed, not to say disgusted.

Still, we may all look up. There are steps to be climbed in life, but we can only climb them worthily by becoming fit for the ascent. It is only after becoming prepared for important places, through the education involved in the intelligent and faithful discharge of the duties of the place in which we find ourselves, that it is best, or even proper, that we be advanced. It is not those who pine and whine, and quarrel with their lot, who are apt to change it for one which the world calls better. Aspiration, worthy ambition, desire for higher good, for higher ends—all these indicate a soul that recognizes the beckoning hand of the Good Father who would call us heavenward toward himself—all these are the ground and justification of a christian discontent; but a murmuring, questioning, fault-finding spirit, has direct and sympathetic alliance with nothing but the infernal. So while God gives you and me the privilege of being as happy as any other man, and makes us responsible for nothing more than he gives us, let us be contented, and,

"Still enduring, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

The Wasp and the Bee.

DEAR CHILDREN:—I promised to tell you another story this week, and it is of the same import as the other.

Little Robert was standing one day near his father's bee-hive, intently watching the busybees at their labor. Presently he noticed that a wasp, after flying several times around the hive, alighted upon the branch of a small bush, which grew close by the bench upon which the hive stood, and this branch projected out nearly opposite to the door of the hive, so that the wasp could observe every thing that entered or left the hive.

Robert's curiosity was awakened by this, and he resolved to watch the movements of the wasp. Pretty soon a bee returned from the fields, laden with the rich spoil it had gathered from the flowers. As soon as he lighted upon the little shelf in front of the door of the hive, the wasp suddenly darted upon it, and drew it towards the end of the shelf, from which they both fell to the ground. Here a struggle took place between them, in which the wasp, being the strongest, came off victor. He tore off the wings and head of the bee, and flew off with the body.

Now there are several things to be considered in this little story, and I want you, my dear children, to think it over well, and then tell me why that wasp seized upon a bee returning to the hive, instead of one going out, and why it took away the body of the bee only? Do you think that the wasp exercised any reasoning in the case?

Christ.

Christ is merciful and mild;
He was once a little child;
He whom heavenly hosts adore,
Lived on earth among the poor.

Then he laid his glory by,
When for us he came to die;
How I wonder when I see,
His tender love and care for me!

The One Leaf.

There was once a caravan crossing, I think, to the north of India, and numbering in its company a godly and devout missionary. As it passed along, a poor old man was overcome by the heat and labors of the journey, and, sinking down, was left to perish on the road. The missionary saw him, and, kneeling down at his side when the rest had passed along, whispered in his ear, "Brother, what is your hope?"

The dying man raised himself a little to reply, and with a great effort succeeded in answering, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin!" and immediately expired with the effort.

The missionary was greatly astonished at the answer, and the calm and peaceful appearance of the man. He felt assured he had died in Christ. "How or where," he thought, "could this man, seemingly a heathen, have got this hope?"

And as he thought of it, he observed a piece of paper grasped tightly in the hand of the corpse, which he succeeded in getting out. What do you think was his surprise and delight when he found it was a single leaf of the Bible, containing the first chapter of the first epistle of John, in which these words occur! On that page the man had found the gospel.—S. S. Banner.

Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy. No. 3.

Not only did Moses definitely predict the nation that was to destroy the Jewish polity, but he also describes most accurately the manner in which their cities should be besieged and overthrown, which took place in the year of our Lord 70,—fifteen hundred and twenty-one years after the prediction was uttered.

He says that their "high and fenced walls" wherein they trust, shall "come down," and that such should be the straitness of the siege, that they would be forced to eat the flesh of their own children to satisfy their hunger. He also says that the nation which should come against them, would "not regard the person of the old, nor show favor to the young."

Titus, the Roman general, was considered a mild and humane man; but such was the conduct of the Jews, so blind and obstinate in their opposition, that it exasperated the Roman soldiers, and, with a cruelty that Titus could not restrain, they butchered the aged and the youth, crucifying the tender maiden, and torturing with "demoniac barbarity" the mother with her offspring. More than eleven thousand Jews were slain within a few months, and thousands more perished within a few years!

We will notice one more prediction of Moses, and then close our examination of this class of prophecies. "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again, with ships by the way, whereof I spake unto thee. Thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen, and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you."—Deut. 28: 68. Not only was it predicted that a strange nation from afar, speaking a strange language, fierce in countenance, swift as the eagle, and cruel in disposition, would besiege them and bring down their strong walls, but also that this nation would have commerce with Egypt, and that they would be sold to that nation for slaves, until the market would be so glutted that no man would buy them. And the mode by which they would be conveyed there, by ships, is also noticed. When Moses uttered this prediction, they could not be thus conveyed.

At the time of this siege, the Romans had a fleet on the Mediterranean, by which probably the Jews were transported, that being the most expeditious way. Josephus says: "Titus grew negligent, and his soldiers grew weary of killing them, and sold the rest of the multitude at a very low price, because such as were sold were very many, and the buyers were few.—As for the rest of the multitude he (Fronto, a general under Titus,) put them into bonds and sent them to the Egyptian mines."

"Seek ye out of the book of the Lord and read," not one of these predictions have failed; the high walls have been thrown down; the fruitful land has become waste, barren and desolate; the inhabitants thereof have been scattered among all nations, and become an astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word, and found no rest for the sole of their foot, but sorrow of mind, trembling of heart, and failing of eyes, has been their portion.

But while we thus see most literally fulfilled the curses pronounced against the Jewish nation, are they not still "beloved for the fathers' sake?" Are there not blessings yet in store for the outcast—the scattered people? Are there not prophecies expressly saying that they shall be "taken from among the heathen, whither they be gone," and gathered in on every side, and brought into their own land? Does not God say—"And I will make of them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will save them out of all their dwelling places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall they be my people, and I will be their God. And David my servant shall be king over them; and they all shall have one shepherd; they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statues, and do them. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, and their children, and their children's children forever; and my servant David shall be their prince forever. My tabernacle also shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people."—Ezek. 37; Rev. 21: 3.

Have they been thus gathered in on every side, into one fold, having David (Christ) for their king, and the tabernacle of God established among them? Has the "covenant of peace," the "new" and "everlasting covenant," yet been made "with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah," (not with the Gentiles)—a covenant differing from that made with their fathers, when led forth from Egypt, even a law written upon their hearts, when their sins and their iniquities are remembered no more, and thus they will all know the Lord, from the least of them unto the greatest of them?

Has not God said that if the ordinances of heaven depart from before him, then the seed of Israel shall cease from being a nation before him forever? Has not he said that if heaven can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out, then he will cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done? Has not he said that if his covenant be not with day and night, and if he hath not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth, then he will cast away the seed of Jacob, and David his servant? Do not these expressions most emphatically teach a fulfillment of "that good thing promised unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah?" Shall we heap upon them the curses, and withold from them the blessings? Shall we say that the former are literal, and pronounced against a literal nation, but the latter are spiritual, and refer to a spiritual people? W.

A Little Child.

"Of such are the kingdom of heaven."

Such are greatest in God's sight. Such are those with whom the Lord is well pleased. Such are those to whom Christ directed the attention of his apostles as their patterns for imitation. Such little ones that believe in Him must not be stumbled in their course; woe to him who does it; it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the depths of the sea, than that be should incur a guilt so terrible. Of such little ones we are told that they have heavenly guardians, and that not from the outer courts, but from among those who do always behold the face of the heavenly Father. A cup of water given to such an one for Christ's sake, becomes a personal favor, and so the last day will reveal that many an act done to one of Christ's "little brethren" (Syr.) is done unto him.—Matt. 25.

Are we little children? Are we born by a new and heavenly birth? Are we childlike—like the holy child Jesus? Not puffed up with pride, not abandoned to lust, not inflated with arrogance, not bewildered with ambition, not heated with rage, not filled up with worldliness, not possessed with covetous desires,—but meek, kind, gentle, patient, simple-hearted, holy, Christ-like, generous, sympathetic, free from worldly guile, from vain ambition, from over-mastering desire, full of faith, submissive, obedient, hopeful, cheerful, and free from malice, wrath and strife.

O, to be little children! The world, the flesh and the devil spoil us ere we are aware of it. Let us return to the Lord. Let our prayers be, "Create within me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." O God, make me like Jesus—like a little child. Let not the possession of plenty exalt, nor the endurance of poverty depress me. Let not the flatteries of friends elate, nor the frowns of foes discourage me. Let not the love of the world corrupt my heart, nor the influence of the world pollute my simple and earnest faith in Jesus Christ. O God, keep me little, humble and patient to the end. Save me from pride, from hypocrisy, and prejudice; from sin, from envy, and malice; from hardness of heart and blindness of mind; from forgetfulness of Jesus' love; from choosing my own ways; from rejecting the truth of God; from seeking the praise of men and the honor of the world; from all stubbornness of will and rebelliousness of spirit. O Lord, deliver me. O God, make me like thy blessed Son—a little child—so that I can enter in the kingdom of heaven. Amen.

The Nature of Death.—No. 1.

BRO. GRANT:—By your permission, I wish to say a few things through the Crisis on this subject. Not, however, to discuss the question, but to call the attention of some who do discuss the subject to a few items which appear to me of some importance.

It is now nearly fifteen years since I first heard the doctrine of the "unconscious state of the dead, and the destruction of the wicked" advocated. My attention was at once arrested to examine and show its fallacy; but, to my utter astonishment, the evidences I sought could not be found. A few, however, did testify to certain things, whose language I clung to with tenacity as proof that the dead were conscious, and the wicked would be eternally conscious. Still, I found that the only direct witness which spoke to the point, ... spoke clearly and openly to the contrary. I therefore took pencil and paper, Bible and Concordance, and separated the Bible testimony on these points—Life, Death, Soul, Body, Spirit—from all others. By this process I found there was not a conflict in the Bible testimony. I studied and thought. I tried to overcome my convictions by reasoning that if these things were so, the intelligent and pious students of the Bible would have found it. I continued to weigh and examine the testimony, to sift it, to view it on all sides. My convictions grew deeper, and, after using all my ability, (which I own to be small,) and all the means I had, I was obliged to decide against all my former views, all the popular theology of the learned world, and confess that the term Death, in its primary use, reduces man to an unconscious state; consequently, "the second death" will reduce the wicked to a state of eternal unconsciousness. This conclusion was not hastily formed. Every point was examined and tested; every objection I then had, or have since heard, was also considered, and disposed of as in the sight of Him by whom I am shortly to be judged.

I did not choose this doctrine because it pleased me—because it looked more consistent with God's character and attributes; nor because it was more in harmony with my sympathies for man; but because I found, on a thorough investigation of God's word, I could sustain no other view by it; I could not make it consistent with itself otherwise; I could get no proper key to its language by any other view. I therefore cautiously, moderately, prayerfully, studiously and firmly settled upon this as the eternal principle of God's revelation to man, of the nature of "the wages of sin."

I had not then examined the writings of others who advocated it, nor the writings of "the fathers" on this point. I have since done so, and, by reading all, or nearly all, the works I have yet heard of in this country, on both sides of this subject, I am only becoming more strongly fortified by their deductions and conclusions. When I find that the fathers have sometimes been belied, their writings perverted by dishonest quotations, it does not shake my faith in the conclusions I arrived at, but in the soundness of the writer and of "the father" quoted by him erroneously.

I have not been on the fence so long as Bro. Taylor has, it is true, nor can I commend him for so long a ride; yet I will venture the assertion that it were better to "ride the fence ten years" than to be over the fence in the field as a teacher and not know the foundation on which they stand, nor the nature of the language which they use to teach others. I believe it right to teach what we know, what we have, and can produce sound evidence for. I would by no means seek to deter any one from teaching what he can, with the strength of the Bible testimony, prove. But it does seem to me that many run uncertainly, and beat the air, not giving heed to this direction, "Hold fast the form of sound words." 2 Tim. 1: 13. "Holding fast the faithful word, as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and convince the gainsayers."—Titus 1: 9.

I have seen some books and some tracts on the subject of "Life and Death," which, though well intended, and containing much truth, were crude, the arguments undigested, the words often unscriptural, and sometimes plainly contradicting scripture language; showing that the writers had not become sufficiently acquainted with the subject to be public exponents of it; and some breathe a spirit very obnoxious to the thoughtful, pious mind of opponents, or of any one. The Storm.

When o'er the unruffled tide of life
We calmly and serenely sail,
Forgetful of the tempest's strife,
We heed no calm, and fear no gale;
But when at last the storm descends,
When to our God for help we cry,
And while before the blast we bend,
We pray for mercy from on high.

Then we our lots essay to know,
What brings the tempest's fury down,
Till some accursed thing below
We learn has caused our Maker's frown.
Toiling we strive the shore to gain,
Grieving we to our idol cling;
But still the tempest rules the main,
And naught we do can comfort bring.

But when at last, by fear compelled,
We cast the offender in the deep,
Ah! then the winds and storms seem held,
And all the billows sink to sleep.
O, God! then let the storm descend,
But make us well its cause to know,
Help us each sinful tie to rend,
And love thee more than all below.

From Fables of Infidelity.

Daylight before Sunrise.

A favorite field for the display of their knowledge of science, and ignorance of the art of reading, by our modern infidels, is the Bible account of creation, in the first chapter of Genesis, which is alleged to be utterly irreconcilable with the known facts of Astronomy and Geology. Leaving the latter out of view, for the present, the astronomical objections may all be arranged under four heads. First, that the Bible account of the creation of man, only some six or seven thousand years ago, must be false—because the records of astronomical observations, taken more than seventeen hundred years ago, by the Hindoos and Egyptians, are still in existence, and have been verified. Second, that the light of some of the stars, now shining upon us, and especially of some of the distant nebulæ, must have left them millions of years ago, to have traveled over the vast space which separates them from us, and be visible on our globe now; whereas, the Bible teaches that the universe was created only some six or seven thousand years ago. Third, that the Bible represents God as creating the sky a solid crystal or metallic sphere, or hemisphere (they are not agreed which), to which the stars are fastened, and with which they revolve round the earth; which, every schoolboy knows to be absurd. Fourth, that the Bible represents God as creating the Sun and Moon only two days before Adam, and as creating light before the Sun; which is also held to be absurd.

1. The first of these objections—that the Hindoos and Egyptians made astronomical observations thousands of years before Adam, and that the accuracy of these observations has been verified by modern calculations—is simply untrue. No such observations were ever made. The pretended records of such have been proved, in the case of the Hindoo astronomy, to be forgeries, and in the case of the Egyptian records, blunders of the discoverers. There is not an authentic uninspired astronomical observation extant for three thousand years after Adam.

The objection, however, is worth noticing, and its history worth remembering, as a specimen of the way in which ignorant men swallow impudent falsehoods, if they only seem to contradict the Word of Truth. When the labors of Oriental Scholars had made the Vedas and Shasters—the sacred books of the Hindoos—accessible to European philosophers, a wonderful shout was raised among infidels. "Here," it was said, "is the true chronology. We always knew that man was not a degenerate creature, fallen from a higher estate, some few thousand years ago, but that he has existed from eternity, in a constant progress toward his lofty position; and now we have the authentic records of the most ancient and civilized people in the world—the people of India—reaching back for millions of years before the Mosaic cosmogony, and allowing ample time for the development of the noble savage into the cultivated philosopher. These records have every mark of truth, giving minute details of events, and histories of successive lines of princes; and, moreover, record the principal astronomical facts of the successive periods—eclipses, comets, positions of stars, &c.—which attest their veracity. Henceforth, the Hebrew records must hide their heads. Neither as poetry nor history can they pretend to compare with the Vedas."

The Hindoo Shasters were accordingly, for a time, in high repute, among people who knew very little about them. Even Dr. Adam Clarke was so far led away with the spirit of the age, as to pollute his valuable commentary by the insertion of the Gitagovinda, after the Chaldee Targum on the Song of Solomon; where the curious reader can satisfy himself as to the scientific value of such Pantheistic dotings. By the infidels of Britain and America they were appealed to as standard works, of undoubted authority; and hundreds, who declared that it was irrational credulity to believe in the Bible, risked their souls on the faith of the Vedas, of which they had never read a single sentence!

Now, when we remember that these veracious chronicles reach back through maha yugs of 4,320,000 years of mortals, a thousand of which, or 4,320,000,000, make a kalpa, or one day of the life of Brahma, while his night is of the same duration, and his life consists of a hundred years of such days and nights, about the middle of which period the little span of our existence is placed;—that among the facts of the history, are the records of the seven great continents of the world, separated by seven rivers, and seven chains of mountains, four hundred thousand miles high (reaching only to the moon); of the families of their kings, one of whom had a hundred sons, another ten thousand, another sixty thousand, who were born in a pumpkin, nourished in pans of milk, reduced to ashes by the curse of a sage, and restored to life by the waters of the Ganges;—and that among the astronomical observations by which the accuracy of these extraordinary facts is confirmed, are accounts of deluges, in which the waters not only rose above the tops of earth's mountains, but above the seven inferior and three superior worlds, reaching even to the Pole Star—we may well wonder at the faith which could receive all this as so true, that on the strength of it they rejected the miracles of the Bible as false. Even Voltaire ridiculed these stories.

But a visionary man, named Baillie, calculated the alleged observations backwards, and found them sufficiently correct to satisfy him that all the rest of the story was equally true. It never seems to have occurred to him, that if he could calculate eclipses backwards, so could the Hindoos. It is just as easy to calculate an eclipse, or the position of a planet, backwards, or forwards. If I watch the motion of the hands of a clock accurately, and find that the little hand moves over the twelfth of a circle every hour, and the large hand around the circle in the same time, and that the large hand, now at noon, covers the little one, I can calculate that at sixteen minutes and a quarter past three it will nearly cover it again; but then, it is just as easy to count that the two hands were covered at sixteen minutes and a quarter before nine that morning, or that they were exactly in a line at 6 A. M. If my clock would keep going at the same rate for a thousand years, I could predict the position of the hands at any hour of the 29th of March, of the year 2857; but it is evident that the very same calculation applied the other way would show the position that the hands would have had a thousand years ago, or five thousand years ago, just as well. And if I were to allege that my clock was made by Tubal Cain, before the flood, and for proof of the fact declare, that on the first of January, 3857, B. C., at 6 o'clock, P. M., I had seen the two hands directly in line, and some wiseacre were to calculate the time, and find that at that hour the hands ought to have been just in that position, and conclude thence that I was undoubtedly one of the antediluvians, and the clock no less certainly a specimen of the craft of the first artificer in brass and iron, the argument would be precisely parallel to the infidel's argument from the Tirvalore Tables, and the astronomy of the Vedas.

But suppose my clock ran a little slow: say half a minute in the month, or so; or that it was made to keep siderial time, which differs by a little from solar time, and that I did not know exactly what the difference was; it is evident that on a long stretch of some hundreds or thousands of years, I would get out of my reckoning, and the hands would not have been in the positions I had calculated. Now, this was just what happened with the Brahmins and their calculations. The clock of the heavens keeps a uniform rate of going, but they made a slight mistake in the counting of it; and so did their infidel friends. But our modern astronomers have got the true time, set their clocks, and made their table by it; and on applying these tables to the pretended Hindoo observations, find that they are all wrong, and that no such eclipses as they allege ever did, or possibly could have happened in our solar system.* So the Hindoo astronomy is now consigned to the same tomb with the Hindoo chronology and cosmogony, except when a missionary, on the banks of the Ganges exhibits it to the pupils of his English school, as a specimen of the falsehoods which have ever formed the swaddling bands of Pantheism; or when some Louisiana planter astonishes a Yankee schoolmaster in search of employment, with an exhibition of the profound philosophy sheltered among the cane-brakes.

Failing in the attempt to substitute Brahminism for Christianity, infidels beat a retreat from India, and went down into Egypt for help. Here they made prodigious discoveries of the scientific and religious truths believed by the worshipers of dogs and dung-beetles, recorded upon the coffins of holy bulls, and the temples sacred to crows and crocodiles. The age was favorable for French discoveries.

Napoleon and his savans cut out of the ceiling of a temple, at Dendera, in Egypt, a stone covered with uncouth astronomical, astrological, and hieroglyphic figures, which they insisted was a representation of the sky at the time the temple was built; and finding a division made between the signs of the Crab and the Lion, and marks for the Sun and Moon there, they took it into their heads that the Sun must have entered the Zodiac at that spot, on the year this Zodiac was made; and calculating back, found that must be at least seventeen thousand years ago. Hundreds of thousands visited the wonderful antediluvian monument, in the National Library, in Paris, where it had been brought; and where infidel commentators were never wanting to inform them that this remarkable stone proved the whole Bible to be a series of lies. A professor of the University of Breslau published a pamphlet, entitled Invincible Proof that the Earth is at least ten times older than is taught by the Bible. Scores of such publications followed, and for forty years infidel newspapers, magazines, and reviews, kept trumpeting this great refutation of the Bible. From these it descended to the vulgar, with additions and improvements; and it is now frequently alleged as proving that "ten thousand years before Adam was born, the priests of Egypt were carving astronomy on the pyramids." There is scarcely one of my French or German readers who has not heard of it.

It did not shake the skeptic's credulity in the least that no two of the savans were agreed, by some thousand of years, how old it was—that they could not tell what the Egyptian system of astronomy was—and that none of them could read the hieroglyphics which explained it. Whatever might be doubtful, of one thing they were all perfectly sure: that it was far older than the creation. But in 1832 the curious Egyptian astronomy was studied, and it appeared that the Sun and Moon were so placed on the Zodiac to mark the beginning of the year there; and the dividing line fenced off one-half of the sky under the care of the Sun, while the other was placed under the Moon's patronage. Then it was discovered that the positions of the stars were represented by the pictures of the gods whose names they bore—Jupiter, Saturn, &c.—and by calculating the places of these pictures back, it was found that this Zodiac represented their places in the year of our Lord 37: the year of the birth of Nero, a great temple-builder and repairer. Finally, Champollion learned to read the hieroglyphics, and the names, surnames, and titles of the emperors Tiberius, Claudius, Nero, and Domitian, were found on the temple of Esneh, which had been declared to be a few thousand years older than that of Denderah, the names of Claudius and Antoninus Pius; while the whole workmanship and style of building have satisfied all antiquarians that these buildings were erected during the declining days of art in the Roman Empire. The Roman title, autocrat, engraved on the Zodiac itself, attests its antiquity to be not quite two thousand, instead of seventeen or twenty-seven thousand years.

But, not satisfied with demolishing the batteries of infidelity, astronomy has been employed to ascertain the dates of numbers of events recorded on Egyptian monuments to have happened to one or other of the Pharaohs, "beloved of Ammon, and brother of the Sun," when such a star was in such a position. Mr. Poole has spent years in gathering such inscriptions, and in calculating the dates thus furnished. The astronomer royal at Greenwich, Mr. Airy, has reviewed the calculations, and finds them correct. [illegible]nson, the great Egyptologist, agrees with their conclusions. And the result is, that *the astronomical chronology of the Egyptian monuments sustains the Bible Chronology. Geology comes forward to confirm the testimony of her elder sister, and assures us that the alleged vast antiquity of the Egyptian monuments is impossible, as it is not more than 5,000 years since the soil of Egypt first appeared above water, as a muddy morass.† The learned Adrian Balbo thus sums up the whole question: "No monument, either astronomical or historical, has yet been able to prove the books of Moses false; but with them, on the contrary, agree, in the most remarkable manner, the results obtained by the most learned philologists, and the profoundest geometricians."

Reply to Bro. Taylor.

Bro. D. T. Taylor has asked, are saints in hades dead, or alive? My reply must be brief,—expressive of my [illegible] to the inquirer and his subject of inquiry.

Our brother's questions and [illegible] imply the answer—dead, not alive. This negative answer seems [illegible] by Ps. 16: 8-11; Acts 2: 26-28. [illegible]

1. THE SOUL here is the subject of [illegible] mark.

2. THIS SOUL is the self-hood—the personality; or, "the Holy One."

3. "Thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."

4. "My flesh shall rest in hope."—This flesh includes the organized body that was exposed to corruption.

5. This "Holy One" is expressed by the personal pronouns "I—me—my"—the one who "shall not be moved;" because of this blessed hope—the non-corruption and the Resurrection."

6. To crown the whole, "Thou wilt show ME the path of life." The way to fulfil this hope, is by a resurrection to life. Here each point seems too well guarded for our brother to doubt.

Again. "Thou wilt lighten my candle."—Ps. 18: 28. Thou wilt restore the breath or spirit of life. "The spirit of man is the candle," etc.—Rev. 20: 27. Here the light to the candle is as the spirit to man? The light of the candle extinguished, is not a candle, any how; but the candle itself may again be lighted. Thus God gave to Jesus—his Holy One—"who died for us" a resurrection to life.

As the "word is truth," we get from God the answer double; both negative and positive. The state or condition in sheol is "dead." The hope accomplished is "life;" therefore the soul in hades is dead, and in absolute want of life! The light is gone, needing his candle re-lighted.

Note. The difficulties that surround us may result from our peculiar education (or condition, 1 John 5: 19,) and possibly were not presented at all, to the minds of God's prophets and apostles. Death was the loss or absence of life; and life alone met the want. This life animates only the body. "THE INNER MAN" is only affirmed of those where "Christ is formed within the hope of glory;" and hence Bro. L. makes all the ground (in imagination) that he stands on at this point. The points he makes in paragraphs 8 and 9 are striking, as to Solomon's testimony.—Eccl. 9: 5. "Mark, "the jewel man—the casket man," etc., originate in more modern progress; and quite away from "the words which the Holy Ghost useth." These and other philosophic and poetic phrases require another class of ideas than those which God's prophets express by "soul, death, hades, and resurrection to life!"

There is no light on this point aside from "the word." No light to illumine the sun can exist short of God. [illegible] is no hope that we can see but by simply believing THE TRUTH already given. The word says that God made man, Adam, a living soul! Sin occasioned death—"dead souls!" Now the remedy meets the want by a resurrection of the manhood—the Adam—the soul, or self-hood. As instruction and pardon pertain to the personality, (like hunger and thirst, weakness and strength,) without one thought of physiological anatomy, so does death and resurrection.

The primary and prevailing use of the word soul embraces the person—"three thousand souls"—three thousand persons. Hence, when God says that "The soul that sinneth it (she or the same) shall die," he does embrace the sinner! The sinner who is instructed and justified, is he who shall be resurrected, transformed and glorified.

"God knoweth the thoughts of the [illegible], that they are vain." All their [illegible] lore applied here ignores the [illegible] God. But God says their thoughts are "vain." Let us all say, Amen. No [illegible] philosopher, from Plato to Prof. Bush, has been able to use Bible language, except as they remodel it.

I was recently urged to tell "what it is that dreams?" My reply was, It is that which goes to bed,—[illegible]. "What, it is I who go to bed." Yes, and that's the very fellow who sleeps, dreams and gets up again.

The language of Scripture is the language of fact—[illegible] observation and experience. [illegible]

"Thou wilt come again."

Air.—Gentle Annie.

Thou wilt come again, blessed Savior,
Thou wilt come to my desolate heart,
In thine absence I pine for thy favor,
O, when shall my sorrow all depart?
[illegible] surely shall behold thee,
I shall hear thy loving voice again:
[illegible] come to my heart, blessed Savior,
And my soul shall be happy once again.

Thou wilt come again, blessed Savior,
To thy sighing and sorrowing bride;
Thou shalt shed on her spirit thy favor,
And shalt take her to dwell by thy side.
She shall dwell in realms of glory,
Where sorrow shall no more appear,
She shall tell them in triumph the story
Of her stay in earth's wilderness drear.

Thou wilt come again, blessed Savior,
To thy groaning and sin-smitten world;
Thou wilt come and destroy the usurper,
Who down to the pit shall be hurled;
And then shall earth's sad lamentation,
Its wants and convulsions all cease,
And the groanings of a groaning creation
Shall be hushed in the anthems of peace.

Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy. No. 2.

Moses not only predicted the removal of the Jews into all lands, but he also predicted their condition while among strange nations.—"And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind." How strikingly has all this been accomplished! They have been unceasingly persecuted and despised. In some portions of the world they now enjoy peace, but not in all. Not only have the followers of Him whom the Jews rejected and crucified opposed them, but strangers even to the religion of the Nazarene. Mohammedans and Pagans have been their persecutors. They have been a by-word, and a hissing, and a reproach, among all people. They are a standing monument of God's truth, and of his justice.

It had been foretold that the Israelites should suffer so strangely and conspicuously that the attention of other nations would be arrested, and inquiries be made respecting the origin of their sufferings, and they should be for a sign, and a wonder upon their seed forever. That this is true, no man can deny. Whatever the religious tenets of any historian, or traveler, who has been acquainted with their condition, he has acknowledged that it is wonderful, and cannot be accounted for upon natural principles. "Good God!" exclaimed the infidel Volney, when surveying Palestine—"whence proceed such melancholy revolutions? For what cause is the fortune of these countries so strikingly changed? Why are so many cities destroyed? Why is not that ancient population reproduced and perpetuated? I wandered over the country, traversed the provinces,—I enumerated the kingdoms of Damascus and Idumea, of Jerusalem and Samaria. This Syria,' said I to myself, 'now almost depopulated, then contained a hundred flourishing cities, and with towns, villages, and hamlets.' What has become of so many productions of the hands of man? What has become of those ages of abundance and life?"

Not only have the Jewish nation become a by-word and a proverb, but their land also is a sign and a wonder to all nations, as spake their prophet Moses.—"The stranger that shall come from a far land shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon it—even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land?" An infidel, Volney, lifts up his hands in astonishment, as he contrasts its former fertility and greatness with its present barrenness and desolation, and asks—"For what cause is this fortune of these countries so strikingly changed?" but believes not the reason assigned by revelation.

Palestine was once remarkable for its fertility. It consisted of an area of about eleven thousand square miles, not quite one fourth as large as the state of New York, and yet it sustained a population of five millions at one time. See Sam. 24: 3. Josephus describes Galilee as "full of plantations of trees of all sorts, insomuch that it invites the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation; by its fruitfulness accordingly, it is all cultivated by its inhabitants, and no part of it lies idle. Moreover, the cities lie here very thick, and the very many villages that are here, are everywhere so full of people by the richness of their land, that the very least of them contain above fifteen hundred." Tacitus, the Roman historian, says,—"The soil was so fertile, and the fruits such as are common with us, besides balsam and dates." But, alas, how changed! "Those mountains, which once were [illegible] and covered with vines, and olive [illegible] and fig-trees, are now, with a few [illegible], bleak, uncultivated and barren. [illegible] are bleak, its valleys are desolate. [illegible] the land is cultivated, [illegible] sufficient to sustain its few [illegible] inhabitants."

[illegible] did Moses predict the dispersion [illegible] all nations—[illegible] that illustrious [illegible] their [illegible]

Their return among them, and the remarkable change in their land; but he also most accurately describes the nation which was to come against them, overthrow, and scatter them.

Read now the prophet's description of this nation centuries before Romulus and Remus existed with their banditti band at Rome, that great city which afterward became the mistress of the world.—"The Lord shall bring against thee a nation from far, from the end of the earth." Rome was far removed from Palestine; it was a place never visited by them, and of which they perhaps had never heard. "As swift as the eagle flieth." The Romans moved with unparalleled celerity when they went to war, and always surprised their enemies. "I came—I saw—I conquered!" was the significant language of their greatest general, after his greatest triumph. We see also the aptness of the prophet's similitude, when we consider that the eagle was the standard of the Romans.

It shall be "a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand." Probably many of them could speak the Egyptian, Persian, and Arabian language, also that of Babylon; but the nation who was to subdue them was a strange, a far-distant nation, of whose speech they were wholly ignorant. A nation, too, "of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favor to the young." "Fierceness of countenance," is said to have been a well-known characteristic of the Roman soldiers; and their merciless severity, their impartial cruelty in time of action, the unhesitating ferocity with which they slaughtered indiscriminately all who opposed them," to have been proverbial, and especially was this exhibited in the destruction of the Jewish nation.

How could Moses thus foresee, and thus accurately describe a nation before it had any existence—before the founder of Rome had been born, or, very possibly, before the site of the city had been redeemed from the primitive forest, unless he was inspired by the Spirit of God?

For the Crisis.

That Trial.

It did me good. It was only a few hours ago that I bowed beneath it, and now all is calm, and I bless God for its coming. It showed me how weak I was. It sent me to Jesus with tears and supplications. It crushed my poor heart until penitence came forth from it like perfume from a flower. It revealed my idols, and bade me cast them down. It taught me to pray God to save me from things in which my wayward heart before delighted.

O God, I bless thee for every sorrow with which thou hast humbled my foolish heart.

"O to be brought to Jesus' feet,
Though trials bring me there!"

Let the trials come, while needful. "Now for a season, if needs be," let me be "in heaviness through manifold temptations." Let me bear the cross and the rod,—surely they are the badges of my Savior's passion, and the tokens of my Father's love. Shall I murmur? Shall I despise the chastening, or faint beneath the correction of my Father? Save me from it, gracious Lord! Make me humble, patient and right. Purge away my dross—make me pure and holy. O, do thou be my strength in these dark, weary hours. Let me know thy faithfulness, even in the fiery furnace. Let me share thy grace amid the scenes of bondage and of tears. Father in heaven, I trust thy promises—I cling to thine everlasting arm. Forsake me not, O Lord. Give me not up to walk in my own ways. Save me from my own rebellious heart. Spare not for my crying, and yet, oh, my Father, deal gently and kindly with me. Let not my courage fail. Let not my strength be consumed beneath the fierceness of my woes. O let me grow strong in affliction and joyful in sorrow! Let thy strength be made perfect in my weakness, and in the midst of all my infirmities let the power of Christ rest upon me. O make me to bear thine own blessed likeness in all things. Help me to show to others the life and purity that was in Christ.

Father in heaven, I bless thee for every trial. I bear thee witness that thou hast been faithful to thy word, while my promises have often been broken. Thou hast been always good, while I have been evil and unthankful. Thou hast given me favor, and honor, and prosperity, while, alas! I have often wandered like a lost sheep. O God, I return to thee with weeping and with sighs of heart. O keep me in the fold, since thou hast brought me thither. I yield myself to thee. I crave thy blessing. I fly for shelter to thine arms. I grieve for my wanderings. I repent of all my waywardness. I bless thee for thy love. I glorify thee in afflictions. I kiss the rod. I bless thee for that trial. Still continue to be my friend evermore. Amen and amen.

☞ The barking of dogs is an acquired hereditary instinct, supposed to have originated in an attempt to imitate the human voice. Wild dogs and domestic breeds that become wild, never bark but howl. Selections.

The French Empire.

BY GEO. STORRS.

The re-establishment of the Napoleon Dynasty in France, has opened a new chapter in prophecy, as clearly marking the time in which we live, as any event in modern history. The prophecy relating to this scene is found chiefly in Revelation, 17th chapter.

Prophecy was given for a light to the Church of God; designed to show it, at the period of fulfillment, the exact position and time occupied by it, that it might never be without a "day-star," or "day-dawn," to guide its steps. It is not necessary to suppose that the church living before the events predicted take place should be able to fix them with exactness; nor for it, when living centuries after the events take place, to fix with certainty all the events which were the subject of prophecy: this would require more knowledge of profane history than most saints have the means of acquiring. But passing events are more within the knowledge of all; and the prophecies relating to them are what immediately concern the church in whatever period it may be called to labor or suffer.

In the prophecies of Scripture a beast is the symbol of a Dynasty, or Body of Rulers. It does not include the ruled, or subjects. To suppose this, is to destroy the harmony of prophecy. The same dynasty may be, and sometimes is, symbolized by different beasts. The seventh and eighth chapters of Daniel are presented in proof of this. It is not our object now to enter further into that argument, but to show that the Napoleon Dynasty is symbolized in Revelations 17, and then briefly suggest its mission in this present development.

At the opening of that chapter, one of the angels having the seven last plagues called John to view the position the great harlot occupied when she was going to judgment; and he beheld her seated on a scarlet-colored beast, having seven heads and ten horns. That this harlot represents the Papal Dynasty, we shall not now stop to argue, as we consider that point long since settled. The corrupt body of rulers of that corrupt church appear supporting their power by taking refuge on the civil dynasty that is described by a scarlet colored beast. The description of that beast shows it to be a dynasty differing from any previous one. The Dragon, Rev. 12, has seven heads and ten horns, but has crowns on his heads. The first beast, Rev. 13, has the same number of heads and horns, but has the crowns on his horns. The beast in the 17th chapter appears with the same number of heads and horns, but no mention is made of any crowns; and yet it is shown to have a family relation by the seven heads.

The peculiarities of this beast are, that it is "the eighth, and is of the seven"—that "it was, is not, and YET IS;"—and that it is, by ascending out of the abussou—the abyss. It had been in power—that power for a time is not; then, suddenly, it ascends from its non-existence and appears to the wonder of all except the followers of Christ, for whose special benefit the prophecy was given; and who, by a careful attention to the words of Christ, are enabled to see the approaching consummation in the accuracy of the events fulfilling the prophecy. . . .

We find Napoleon proclaimed Emperor of France and King of Italy; and assuming to be the successor of the Cæsars. Thus the seventh is developed. "It was"—but soon "it is not;" and the world supposed it had disappeared for ever. But, before forty years pass away, an "eighth" appears from the abyss, to the wonder of the world; but this eighth is not another dynasty—it "is of the seven;" it is the same that "was"—then "is not"—and "yet is."

Nothing could be more accurate in its fulfillment than the prophecy in the Napoleon Dynasty; and when Louis Napoleon entered Paris on his return from his tour through France, to prepare the way for the proclamations of the Empire, some of the sentiments inscribed on the banners that graced his entry into the city, were such as this—"The uncle that was—the nephew that is." Thus employing the very words of the prophecy, though unknowingly, to themselves.

For a time this dynasty "is not." When Napoleon I. abdicated, he did so in favor of his son, Napoleon II. But that son never came to power—he "is not" a reigning portion of the dynasty: and the dynasty itself, for near forty years, "is not." It then "ascended from the abyss," and now "it is!" Thus far all seems plain.

We next remark—That in ascending from the abyss, one of the first acts of the beast is to receive the great harlot to sit upon him. She takes her seat there just as the "judgment" is about to be executed upon her. Here again history and prophecy harmonize. The Papal power was driven from Rome, and was not likely to recover its seat. But the ascending beast sent his republican [!] armies to Italy, and the harlot takes her seat on, or by means of, that scarlet-colored beast, where she now sits; because, as yet, Louis Napoleon knows it is for his interest to let her sit upon—not guide—his dynasty. So long as he can use her for his own aggrandizement, so long will he consent to let her sit as she does.

Thus far the fulfillment seems perfect; but we now approach the future. Here all we can do is to trace the outlines. There seems clearly to be "ten kings"—or small dynasties—yet to be developed, who are to be united to the beast by a voluntary giving of "their power and strength to the beast," verse 13; after which, by some means, or from some cause not yet developed, "the beast with the horns," [so the Syriac reads,] will come in collision with the harlot, and "eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." Let the papal or harlot power attempt to put bits in the mouth of this beast, or to restrain his ambition, and she will soon find she has been riding to judgment, and her destruction is certain and final.

Another event in the history of this dynasty and its horns is, they will "make war on the Lamb": consequently this "short space" dynasty will continue in power till the Lamb shall return to claim the kingdoms of this world. That war is briefly spoken of in the conclusion of the 17th chapter, with the emphatic declaration—"The Lamb shall overcome them." The 19th chapter speaks of this war more in detail, and after describing "the armies in heaven," that followed the Lamb, John proceeds to say—"I saw the beast [the Napoleon Dynasty,] and the kings [the ten kings] of the earth, [who had given their power to the beast] and their armies gathered together to make war against him that sat upon the horse, [viz: the Lamb,] and against his army."

Thus the battle is set in array—the war commences—tremendous scenes open—a conflict that is to decide the government of this world. Is this not a matter of interest to all? What is to be the result? The prophecy does not leave us in doubt—"The Lamb shall overcome them"; chapter 17: 14;—"the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him. * * * These both were cast alive into a lake of fire and brimstone"; chapter 19: 20. The 17th chapter had said, verse 11, he "goeth into perdition"—is destroyed. The 20th chapter tells us this is done when he makes war on the "King of kings and Lord of lords." Then he—that is—this dynasty—goeth into perdition, or is destroyed, and that destruction is final.

Now, whether all these things will take place under Napoleon III.—the present reigning Emperor of France—we will not pretend to say—the events yet undeveloped must determine that. But this we must say, If we have given the right application of the prophecy—and of this we see no reason to doubt—then the Napoleon Dynasty will not pass away till all these things be fulfilled; and as it is to be a "short space" dynasty, it does not seem likely that many years more can be allotted to it. If, however, the present Emperor of France is to be succeeded by others of the same family, it will not alter the general features of the prophecy; we are manifestly fast approaching the world's crisis; and the most astonishing events will, most likely, soon burst upon the world, which will cause the hearts of many to fail them with fear and consternation.

Much more might be said upon this subject; and we have by no means exhausted it. All we have aimed to do is, to throw out hints to call attention to prophecy as connected with passing events: this we feel bound to do as a watchman. As to fixing upon particular days or years for the accomplishment of all these things, we have no hand in it; and we are fully settled that all such calculations are injurious in their tendency, and calculated to throw the mind from that calm and sober waiting for the Lord, which ought ever to control and govern us, if we would be preserved from wild fanaticism.

Let us remember, the night is far spent—the day is at hand. Let us watch and keep ourselves unspotted from the world, walking in the footsteps of our blessed Lord and Life-Giver, Jesus the Messiah; that when He who is our life shall appear, we also may appear with him in glory.

Beloved reader, let us not forget that this present life is of infinite value to us; because, if improved as God has enjoined and commanded, we may gain an unending life. May none of the cares, anxieties, pursuits, or perplexities of this present time lead us to neglect the great and glorious prize of Immortality, Incorruptibility, Eternal Life; which can only be secured by a living union with Christ, the heavenly-appointed Life-Giver. May the Spirit of God be shed on us through Him, that we may be aided to walk in the truth, and be made partakers of Everlasting Life thereby.

[The foregoing was written several years since, but seems to be in harmony with passing and prospective events.—Ed.

The chamber happened to be crowded, and much interest and curiosity were manifested, with every appearance of devotion in the senators and spectators.

Preachings upon Popular Proverbs.

BY TIMOTHY TITCOMB.

"You stout and I stout,
Who shall carry the dirt out?"
"Every man cannot be vicar of Bowden."
"He that cannot paint must grind the colors."

Who shall be vicar of Bowden and who shall carry the dirt out—who shall paint and who shall grind the colors—are questions which, in various forms, have agitated the world since human society existed.—Dissatisfaction with position and condition is well nigh universal. Every man walks with his eyes and wishes upwards—some moved by aspiration for a nobler good, others by ambition for a higher place; some by emulation of a worthy example, others by discontent with the allotments of Providence. The infant does not forget to climb when he learns to walk, nor is the man less a climber than the boy. Everything is towering, or climbing, or reaching, or looking upward. The elm stretches its feathery arms and waves its hands toward the clouds that hang over it; the vine pulls itself up the elm by its delicate fingers; and the violet sits at the foot of the vine and looks up, and breathes its fragrant wishes heavenward. Even the sleeping lakelet in the meadow dreams of stars, and will not be satisfied without a private firmament of water-lilies. It is as if God had whispered into the ear of all existence the moment it was emerging from nihility the words—"Look up!" and, hardly knowing why, it had been looking up ever since. Well, this is right; for, far above everything shines the great White Throne—sits the Father Soul—abide the treasuries of all good—burns the uncreated fire at which the torches of life were lighted. It is a natural, instinctive thing to look upward.

Discontent may be a very good thing, or a very bad thing. There is a discontent which is divine,—which has its birth in the highest and purest inspirations that visit and stir the soul. All that discontent that grows from dissatisfaction with present attainment, or springs from a desire for higher usefulness, or has its birth in motives that impel to the worthy achievement of an honorable name and an honorable place, is a thing to be visited by blessings and benisons. Discontent which comes from below—which comes from a soul disgusted with its lot, faithless in God, and out of harmony with the arrangements and the operations of Providence, is an evil thing—only evil—and that continually. One holds the principle of love; the other of malice. One is attracted from above; the other is instigated from below. One tends to the development of a symmetrical, strong and harmonious character; the other to disorganization and depreciation. One is from heaven, the other is from hell.

I look out of my window, and see a carriage rolling by, with its freight of richly-dressed ladies. On the coach-box sits a man who drives the horses when they go, and opens the door of the carriage and lets down the steps when they stop. Further up the street there is a building going up. The architect stands by with his hand in his breast, giving directions. The hod-carrier, smeared with mortar, passes him, climbs the giddy ladder, and drops the bricks upon the scaffolding, and these, one after another, are driven to their places by the ringing trowel of the brick-layer. I rise from my seat, and walk through the rooms adjoining my own. Here sits an editor, hastily putting together the thoughts that will form to-morrow's leader. At another table sits another editor, culling from a pile of exchanges bits of intelligence that come in on a thousand paper wings from other communities. At their cases stand the compositors, setting up, type by type, the matter which the editors prepare for them. The pressman and the engineer have their respective parts to perform. I find the great aggregate of life to be a network of duties—an organized system of duties. In order to secure the comfort of the whole, there is a certain amount of work to be done, infinitely various in kind. There must be an architect to plan, there must be a hod-carrier to bear mortar, and a brick-layer to lay the bricks, or we shall have no buildings. There must be an editor, and a compositor, and a pressman, or there will be no newspaper. Who shall do the thinking, and who shall perform the manual labor? Who shall paint, and who shall grind the colors? Every man cannot be vicar of Bowden.

It does not suffice to tell discontented people that every man has his place, and will find his highest account in seeking to fill it, and to fill it well. What particularly troubles them, is, that they were made for so low a place. They really call God's wisdom and benevolence in question for assigning to them subordinate offices in operating the machinery of society. A man finds himself distinguished by clumsy hands and broad shoulders, with a hod on his back, and complains that he was not made for a brick-layer; and the brick-layer wishes he had the ease and honor of the architect, and wonders why his power of achievement is so closely circumscribed. The coachman rubs down his horses, and marvels that he was not born to their ownership, and that the owner was not born to drive for him. So people quarrel with their position, the world over. Everything in the world is unequal to these people. They do not see the impartial justice of conferring upon one man great mental faculties, pleasant address, and commanding presence, while another is condemned to be a dwarf, both in mind and body, and to serve his more highly-favored neighbor that he may win bread and raiment.

But there is a better and a broader basis for the settlement of this matter than this; and did we possess even a modicum of the faith in God that we ought to possess, we should feel certain there would be such a basis, though we might fail to find it. The instinctive, persistent search of the soul is for happiness. We seek for office, or place, or wealth; we pine over the fact that our mental endowments and acquisitions are comparatively indifferent or positively mean; and why? Because, while we lie dreaming upon our pillow of stone, the places and positions of life shape themselves into a ladder on which angels ascend and descend, the last round leaning on a heavenly landing; because that which is above us, in allotment, gift and acquisition, forms so many steps of the gradatory that leads from the cells where we do penance, to the temple where we expect peace and heavenly communion. In other words, we are discontented because we believe there is more happiness on the upper steps of society than on ours; and here is where the great mistake is made.

If there be anything which human history teaches more thoroughly than any other thing—if there be any fact revealed to observation more clearly than any other fact—it is, that happiness does not depend upon condition and position—that it has its birth in possessions and relations superior to, and in most respects unaffected by, those facts of individual and social life which divide men into classes. Here is where the Good Father equalizes human lot. High position, considered by itself, is not a positive good—is not, in and for itself, a source of happiness to the souls planted upon it. There is no good reason to be found in the whole universe of God why the coachman should not be as happy as the dainty ladies whom he serves. There is no reason why the hod-carrier should not be as happy as the brick-layer, and the brick-layer as happy as the architect. Wants keep pace with wealth, always. Responsibility walks hand in hand with capacity and power. Of him to whom much is given much will be required. Posts of honor are evermore posts of danger and of care. Each office of society has its burden, proportioned to its importance; so that men shall find no apology for murmuring at the better lot of their neighbors, while all are made dependent for happiness upon common sources—open alike to him who wears fine linen and fares sumptuously every day, and the beggar who waits at his gate.

I am inclined to think that if our minds were capable of apprehending the essential facts of the life we see, we should be convinced that happiness is one of the most evenly distributed of all human possessions. The laborer loves his wife and children as well as the lord, and takes into his soul all the tender influences that flow to him through their love as well as he. Food tastes as sweetly to the ploughman as the placeman. If the latter have the daintier dish, the former has the keener appetite. Into all ears the brook pours the same stream of music, and the birds never vary their programme with reference to their audiences. The spring scatters violets broadcast, and grass grows by the roadside as well as in the park. The breeze that tosses the curls of your little ones and mine is not softer in its caresses of those who bound over velvet to greet it. The sun shines, the rains fall, the trees dress themselves in green, the thunder rolls and the stars flash for all alike. Health knows nothing of human distinctions, and abides with him who treats it best. Sleep, the gentle angel, does not come at the call of power, and never proffers its ministry for gold. The senses take no bribes of luxury; but deal as honestly and generously by the poor as by the rich; and the president of the United States would whistle himself blind before he could call our dog from us.

If we examine this matter critically, we shall find that the sweetest satisfactions that come to us are those which spring from sources common to the race. If you and I are worthy men, that which is most precious to us, as the material of our daily happiness, is precisely that which is not dependent upon the positions we respectfully occupy in the world. Now, if we look above this range of common Providence into that realm of fact in which abides our common relationship to a common Father, the distinctions of society and the variety and contrariety of human lot fade away and become contemptible. If God smile on me and fill my heart with peace; if he forgive my sin, and give me promise and assurance of a higher life beyond the grave; if he call me his child, and draw out from my cold and selfish heart a filial love for him; if he inspire me with a brotherly charity that embraces in its arms all who bear his image; if he give me a hope more precious to me than all gold, and transform the narrow path in which I walk into the vestibule of heaven, it will very naturally be a matter of indifference to me whether I paint, or grind the colors—whether I carry dirt, or officiate as the vicar of Bowden. If we were all made in His image; if we are all held amenable to the same law; if we all have offer of the same salvation; if we are all to be judged according to our deeds; if we have the promise of the same heaven on the same terms, it shows, at least, what God thinks of human distinctions.

The ministry of nature, and love, and sympathy are common to all men. On the broad platform of morals, the king stands uncovered by the side of the peasant, and wealth and place flaunting titles and claim no privileges. In religion, all men kneel and worship a common Lord. Men are placed in different positions in this world simply because there is a great variety of work to do, and no one man can do all kinds. If you and I have found our places—if we find ourselves engaged in doing that thing which, on the whole, we can do better than any thing else, then low discontent with our lot is not only sinful but mean. God gives to you and to me just as many sources of innocent happiness as he has given to anybody, and opens to us just as fair a heaven as he has opened to anybody. It becomes us, therefore, to fill our places, and do our particular duties well, hold up our heads in front of every man with self-respectful complacency, do honor to the office which God has selected for us by a faithful performance of its functions, and take and pocket contentedly the penny a day which we get in common with others. The Creator doubtless knew what weak, unreasonable, and inconsistent creatures we should be when he made us; but if you and I had made a world full of people, and set them at work with pledge of equal pay and equal privilege in all essential good, and they had set themselves to erecting artificial distinctions among themselves, and gone to whining over the parts we had assigned to them, we should be exceedingly disappointed, not to say disgusted.

Still, we may all look up. There are steps to be climbed in life, but we can only climb them worthily by becoming fit for the ascent. It is only after becoming prepared for important places, through the education involved in the intelligent and faithful discharge of the duties of the place in which we find ourselves, that it is best, or even proper, that we be advanced. It is not those who pine and whine, and quarrel with their lot, who are apt to change it for one which the world calls better. Aspiration, worthy ambition, desire for higher good, for higher ends—all these indicate a soul that recognizes the beckoning hand of the Good Father who would call us homeward toward himself—all these are the ground and justification of a christian discontent; but a murmuring, questioning, fault-finding spirit, has direct and sympathetic alliance with nothing but the infernal. So while God gives you and me the privilege of being as happy as any other man, and makes us responsible for nothing more than he gives us, let us be contented, and,

"Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

The Wasp and the Bee.

Dear Children:—I promised to tell you another story this week, and it is of the same import as the other.

Little Robert was standing one day near his father's bee-hive, intently watching the busybees at their labor. Presently he noticed that a wasp, after flying several times around the hive, alighted upon the branch of a small bush, which grew close by the bench upon which the hive stood, and this branch projected out nearly opposite to the door of the hive, so that the wasp could observe every thing that entered or left the hive.

Robert's curiosity was awakened by this, and he resolved to watch the movements of the wasp. Pretty soon a bee returned from the fields, laden with the rich spoil it had gathered from the flowers. As soon as he lighted upon the little shelf in front of the door of the hive, the wasp suddenly darted upon it, and drew it towards the end of the shelf, from which they both fell to the ground. Here a struggle took place between them, in which the wasp, being the strongest, came off victor. He tore off the wings and head of the bee, and flew off with the body.

Now there are several things to be considered in this little story, and I want you, my dear children, to think it over well, and then tell me why that wasp seized upon a bee returning to the hive, instead of one going out, and why it took away the body of the bee only? Do you think that the wasp exercised any reasoning in the case?

Christ.

Christ is merciful and mild;
He was once a little child;
He whom heavenly hosts adore,
Lived on earth among the poor.

Then he laid his glory by,
When for us he came to die;
How I wonder when I see,
His tender love and care for me!

The One Leaf.

There was once a caravan crossing, I think, to the north of India, and numbering in its company a godly and devout missionary. As it passed along, a poor old man was overcome by the heat and labors of the journey, and, sinking down, was left to perish on the road. The missionary saw him, and, kneeling down at his side when the rest had passed along, whispered in his ear, "Brother, what is your hope?"

The dying man raised himself a little to reply, and with a great effort succeeded in answering, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin!" and immediately expired with the effort.

The missionary was greatly astonished at the answer, and the calm and peaceful appearance of the man. He felt assured he had died in Christ. "How or where," he thought, "could this man, seemingly a heathen, have got this hope?"

And as he thought of it, he observed a piece of paper grasped tightly in the hand of the corpse, which he succeeded in getting out. What do you think was his surprise and delight when he found it was a single leaf of the Bible, containing the first chapter of the first epistle of John, in which these words occur! On that page the man had found the gospel.—S. S. Banner.

Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy. No. 3.

Not only did Moses definitely predict the nation that was to destroy the Jewish polity, but he also describes most accurately the manner in which their cities should be besieged and overthrown, which took place in the year of our Lord 70,—fifteen hundred and twenty-one years after the prediction was uttered.

He says that their "high and fenced walls" wherein they trust, shall "come down," and that such should be the straitness of the siege, that they would be forced to eat the flesh of their own children to satisfy their hunger. He also says that the nation which should come against them, would "not regard the person of the old, nor show favor to the young."

Titus, the Roman general, was considered a mild and humane man; but such was the conduct of the Jews, so blind and obstinate in their opposition, that it exasperated the Roman soldiers, and, with a cruelty that Titus could not restrain, they butchered the aged and the youth, crucifying the tender maiden, and torturing with "demoniac barbarity" the mother with her offspring. More than eleven thousand Jews were slain within a few months, and thousands more perished within a few years!

We will notice one more prediction of Moses, and then close our examination of this class of prophecies. "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again, with ships by the way, whereof I spake unto thee. Thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen, and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you."—Deut. 28: 68. Not only was it predicted that a strange nation from afar, speaking a strange language, fierce in countenance, swift as the eagle, and cruel in disposition, would besiege them and bring down their strong walls, but also that this nation would have commerce with Egypt, and that they would be sold to that nation for slaves, until the market would be so glutted that no man would buy them. And the mode by which they would be conveyed there, by ships, is also noticed. When Moses uttered this prediction, they could not be thus conveyed.

At the time of this siege, the Romans had a fleet on the Mediterranean, by which probably the Jews were transported, that being the most expeditious way. Josephus says: "Titus grew negligent, and his soldiers grew weary of killing them, and sold the rest of the multitude at a very low price, because such as were sold were very many, and the buyers were few.—As for the rest of the multitude he (Fronto, a general under Titus,) put them into bonds and sent them to the Egyptian mines."

"Seek ye out of the book of the Lord and read," not one of these predictions have failed; the high walls have been thrown down; the fruitful land has become waste, barren and desolate; the inhabitants thereof have been scattered among all nations, and become an astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word, and found no rest for the sole of their foot, but sorrow of mind, trembling of heart, and failing of eyes, has been their portion.

But while we thus see most literally fulfilled the curses pronounced against the Jewish nation, are they not still "beloved for the fathers' sake?" Are there not blessings yet in store for the outcast—the scattered people? Are there not prophecies expressly saying that they shall be "taken from among the heathen, whither they be gone," and gathered in on every side, and brought into their own land? Does not God say—"And I will make of them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will save them out of all their dwelling places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall they be my people, and I will be their God. And David my servant shall be king over them; and they all shall have one shepherd; they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, and their children, and their children's children forever; and my servant David shall be their prince forever. My tabernacle also shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people."—Ezek. 37; Rev. 21: 3.

Have they been thus gathered in on every side, into one fold, having David (Christ) for their king, and the tabernacle of God established among them? Has the "covenant of peace," the "new" and "everlasting covenant," yet been made "with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah," (not with the Gentiles)—a covenant differing from that made with their fathers, when led forth from Egypt, even a law written upon their hearts, when their sins and their iniquities are remembered no more, and thus they will all know the Lord, from the least of them unto the greatest of them?

Has not God said that if the ordinances of heaven depart from before him, then the seed of Israel shall cease from being a nation before him forever? Has not he said that if heaven can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out, then he will cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done? Has not he said that if his covenant be not with day and night, and if he hath not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth, then he will cast away the seed of Jacob, and David his servant? Do not these expressions most emphatically teach a fulfillment of "that good thing promised unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah?" Shall we heap upon them the curses, and withold from them the blessings? Shall we say that the former are literal, and pronounced against a literal nation, but the latter are spiritual, and refer to a spiritual people? A Little Child.

Such are greatest in God's sight. Such are those with whom the Lord is well pleased. Such are those to whom Christ directed the attention of his apostles as their patterns for imitation. Such little ones that believe in Him must not be stumbled in their course; woe to him who does it; it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the depths of the sea, than that he should incur a guilt so terrible. Of such little ones we are told that they have heavenly guardians, and that not from the outer courts, but from among those who do always behold the face of the heavenly Father. A cup of water given to such an one for Christ's sake, becomes a personal favor, and so the last day will reveal that many an act done to one of Christ's "little brethren" (Syr.) is done unto him.—Matt. 25.

Are we little children? Are we born by a new and heavenly birth? Are we childlike—like the holy child Jesus? Not puffed up with pride, not abandoned to lust, not inflated with arrogance, not bewildered with ambition, not heated with rage, not filled up with worldliness, not possessed with covetous desires,—but meek, kind, gentle, patient, simple-hearted, holy, Christ-like, generous, sympathetic, free from worldly guile, from vain ambition, from over-mastering desire, full of faith, submissive, obedient, hopeful, cheerful, and free from malice, wrath and strife.

O, to be little children! The world, the flesh and the devil spoil us ere we are aware of it. Let us return to the Lord. Let our prayers be, "Create within me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." O God, make me like Jesus—like a little child. Let not the possession of plenty exalt, nor the endurance of poverty depress me. Let not the flatteries of friends elate, nor the frowns of foes discourage me. Let not the love of the world corrupt my heart, nor the influence of the world pollute my simple and earnest faith in Jesus Christ. O God, keep me little, humble and patient to the end. Save me from pride, from hypocrisy, and prejudice; from sin, from envy, and malice; from hardness of heart and blindness of mind; from forgetfulness of Jesus' love; from choosing my own ways; from rejecting the truth of God; from seeking the praise of men and the honor of the world; from all stubbornness of will and rebelliousness of spirit. O Lord, deliver me. O God, make me like thy blessed Son—a little child—so that I can enter into the kingdom of heaven. Amen.

The Nature of Death.—No. 1.

Bro. Grant:—By your permission, I wish to say a few things through the Crisis on this subject. Not, however, to discuss the question, but to call the attention of some who do discuss the subject to a few items which appear to me of some importance.

It is now nearly fifteen years since I first heard the doctrine of the "unconscious state of the dead, and the destruction of the wicked" advocated. My attention was at once arrested to examine and show its fallacy; but, to my utter astonishment, the evidences I sought could not be found. A few, however, did testify to certain things, whose language I clung to with tenacity as proof that the dead were conscious, and the wicked would be eternally conscious. Still, I found that the only direct witness which spoke to the point, ... spoke clearly and openly to the contrary. I therefore took pencil and paper, Bible and Concordance, and separated the Bible testimony on these points—Life, Death, Soul, Body, Spirit—from all others. By this process I found there was not a conflict in the Bible testimony. I studied and thought. I tried to overcome my convictions by reasoning that if these things were so, the intelligent and pious students of the Bible would have found it. I continued to weigh and examine the testimony, to sift it, to view it on all sides. My convictions grew deeper, and, after using all my ability, (which I own to be small,) and all the means I had, I was obliged to decide against all my former views, all the popular theology of the learned world, and confess that the term Death, in its primary use, reduces man to an unconscious state; consequently, "the second death" will reduce the wicked to a state of eternal unconsciousness. This conclusion was not hastily formed. Every point was examined and tested; every objection I then had, or have since heard, was also considered, and disposed of as in the sight of Him by whom I am shortly to be judged.

I did not choose this doctrine because it pleased me—because it looked more consistent with God's character and attributes; nor because it was more in harmony with my sympathies for man; but because I found, on a thorough investigation of God's word, I could sustain no other view by it; I could not make it consistent with itself otherwise; I could get no proper key to its language by any other view. I therefore cautiously, moderately, prayerfully, studiously and firmly settled upon this as the eternal principle of God's revelation to man, of the nature of "the wages of sin."

I had not then examined the writings of others who advocated it, nor the writings of "the fathers" on this point. I have since done so, and, by reading all, or nearly all, the works I have yet heard of in this country, on both sides of this subject, I am only becoming more strongly fortified by their deductions and conclusions. When I find that the fathers have sometimes been belied, their writings perverted by dishonest quotations, it does not shake my faith in the conclusions I arrived at, but in the soundness of the writer and of "the father" quoted by him erroneously.

I have not been on the fence so long as Bro. Taylor has, it is true, nor can I commend him for so long a ride; yet I will venture the assertion that it were better to "ride the fence ten years" than to be over the fence in the field as a teacher and not know the foundation on which they stand, nor the nature of the language which they use to teach others. I believe it right to teach what we know, what we have, and can produce sound evidence for. I would by no means seek to deter any one from teaching what he can, with the strength of the Bible testimony, prove. But it does seem to me that many run uncertainly, and beat the air, not giving heed to this direction, "Hold fast the form of sound words." 2 Tim. 1: 13. "Holding fast the faithful word, as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and convince the gainsayers."—Titus 1: 9.

I have seen some books and some tracts on the subject of "Life and Death," which, though well intended, and containing much truth, were crude, the arguments undigested, the words often unscriptural, and sometimes plainly contradicting scripture language; showing that the writers had not become sufficiently acquainted with the subject to be public exponents of it; and some breathe a spirit very obnoxious to the thoughtful, pious mind of opponents, or of any one. The Storm.

When o'er the unruffled tide of life
We calmly and serenely sail,
Forgetful of the tempest's strife,
We heed no calm, and fear no gale;
But when at last the storm descends,
When to our God for help we cry,
And while before the blast we bend,
We pray for mercy from on high.

Then we our lots essay to know,
What brings the tempest's fury down,
Till some accursed thing below
We learn has caused our Maker's frown.
Toiling we strive the shore to gain,
Grieving we to our idol cling;
But still the tempest rules the main,
And naught we do can comfort bring.

But when at last, by fear compelled,
We cast the offender in the deep,
Ah! then the winds and storms seem held,
And all the billows sink in sleep.
O, God! then let the storm descend,
But make us well its cause to know,
Help us each sinful tie to rend,
And love thee more than all below.

From Fables of Infidelity.

Daylight before Sunrise.

A favorite field for the display of their knowledge of science, and ignorance of the art of reading, by our modern infidels, is the Bible account of creation, in the first chapter of Genesis, which is alleged to be utterly irreconcilable with the known facts of Astronomy and Geology. Leaving the latter out of view, for the present, the astronomical objections may all be arranged under four heads. First, that the Bible account of the creation of man, only some six or seven thousand years ago, must be false—because the records of astronomical observations, taken more than seventeen hundred years ago, by the Hindoos and Egyptians, are still in existence, and have been verified. Second, that the light of some of the stars, now shining upon us, and especially of some of the distant nebulæ, must have left them millions of years ago, to have traveled over the vast space which separates them from us, and be visible on our globe now; whereas, the Bible teaches that the universe was created only some six or seven thousand years ago. Third, that the Bible represents God as creating the sky a solid crystal or metallic sphere, or hemisphere (they are not agreed which), to which the stars are fastened, and with which they revolve round the earth; which, every schoolboy knows to be absurd. Fourth, that the Bible represents God as creating the Sun and Moon only two days before Adam, and as creating light before the Sun; which is also held to be absurd.

1. The first of these objections—that the Hindoos and Egyptians made astronomical observations thousands of years before Adam, and that the accuracy of these observations has been verified by modern calculations—is simply untrue. No such observations were ever made. The pretended records of such have been proved, in the case of the Hindoo astronomy, to be forgeries, and in the case of the Egyptian records, blunders of the discoverers. There is not an authentic uninspired astronomical observation extant for three thousand years after Adam.

The objection, however, is worth noticing, and its history worth remembering, as a specimen of the way in which ignorant men swallow impudent falsehoods, if they only seem to contradict the Word of Truth. When the labors of Oriental Scholars had made the Vedas and Shasters—the sacred books of the Hindoos—accessible to European philosophers, a wonderful shout was raised among infidels. "Here," it was said, "is the true chronology. We always knew that man was not a degenerate creature, fallen from a higher estate, some few thousand years ago, but that he has existed from eternity, in a constant progress toward his lofty position; and now we have the authentic records of the most ancient and civilized people in the world—the people of India—reaching back for millions of years before the Mosaic cosmogony, and allowing ample time for the development of the noble savage into the cultivated philosopher. These records have every mark of truth, giving minute details of events, and histories of successive lines of princes; and, moreover, record the principal astronomical facts of the successive periods—eclipses, comets, positions of stars, &c.—which attest their veracity. Henceforth, the Hebrew records must hide their heads. Neither as poetry nor history can they pretend to compare with the Vedas."

The Hindoo Shasters were accordingly, for a time, in high repute, among people who knew very little about them. Even Dr. Adam Clarke was so far led away with the spirit of the age, as to pollute his valuable commentary by the insertion of the Gitagovinda, after the Chaldee Targum on the Song of Solomon;—where the curious reader can satisfy himself as to the scientific value of such Pantheistic dotings. By the infidels of Britain and America they were appealed to as standard works, of undoubted authority; and hundreds, who declared that it was irrational credulity to believe in the Bible, risked their souls on the faith of the Vedas, of which they had never read a single sentence!

Now, when we remember that these veracious chronicles reach back through maha yugs of 4,320,000 years of mortals, a thousand of which, or 4,320,000,000, make a kalpa, or one day of the life of Brahma, while his night is of the same duration, and his life consists of a hundred years of such days and nights, about the middle of which period the little span of our existence is placed;—that among the facts of the history, are the records of the seven great continents of the world, separated by seven rivers, and seven chains of mountains, four hundred thousand miles high (reaching only to the moon); of the families of their kings, one of whom had a hundred sons, another ten thousand, another sixty thousand, who were born in a pumpkin, nourished in pans of milk, reduced to ashes by the curse of a sage, and restored to life by the waters of the Ganges;—and that among the astronomical observations by which the accuracy of these extraordinary facts is confirmed, are accounts of deluges, in which the waters not only rose above the tops of earth's mountains, but above the seven inferior and three superior worlds, reaching even to the Pole Star—we may well wonder at the faith which could receive all this as so true, that on the strength of it they rejected the miracles of the Bible as false. Even Voltaire ridiculed these stories.

But a visionary man, named Baillie, calculated the alleged observations backwards, and found them sufficiently correct to satisfy him that all the rest of the story was equally true. It never seems to have occurred to him, that if he could calculate eclipses backwards, so could the Hindoos. It is just as easy to calculate an eclipse, or the position of a planet, backwards, or forwards. If I watch the motion of the hands of a clock accurately, and find that the little hand moves over the twelfth of a circle every hour, and the large hand around the circle in the same time, and that the large hand, now at noon, covers the little one, I can calculate that at sixteen minutes and a quarter past three it will nearly cover it again; but then, it is just as easy to count that the two hands were covered at sixteen minutes and a quarter before nine that morning, or that they were exactly in a line at 6 A. M. If my clock would keep going at the same rate for a thousand years, I could predict the position of the hands at any hour of the 29th of March, of the year 2857; but it is evident that the very same calculation applied the other way would show the position that the hands would have had a thousand years ago, or five thousand years ago, just as well. And if I were to allege that my clock was made by Tubal Cain, before the flood, and for proof of the fact declare, that on the first of January, 3857, B. C., at 6 o'clock, P. M., I had seen the two hands directly in line, and some wiseacre were to calculate the time, and find that at that hour the hands ought to have been just in that position, and conclude thence that I was undoubtedly one of the antediluvians, and the clock no less certainly a specimen of the craft of the first artificer in brass and iron, the argument would be precisely parallel to the infidel's argument from the Tirvalore Tables, and the astronomy of the Vedas.

But suppose my clock ran a little slow: say half a minute in the month, or so; or that it was made to keep siderial time, which differs by a little from solar time, and that I did not know exactly what the difference was; it is evident that on a long stretch of some hundreds or thousands of years, I would get out of my reckoning, and the hands would not have been in the positions I had calculated. Now, this was just what happened with the Brahmins and their calculations. The clock of the heavens keeps a uniform rate of going, but they made a slight mistake in the counting of it; and so did their infidel friends. But our modern astronomers have got the true time, set their clocks, and made their table by it; and on applying these tables to the pretended Hindoo observations, find that they are all wrong, and that no such eclipses as they allege ever did, or possibly could have happened in our solar system.* So the Hindoo astronomy is now consigned to the same tomb with the Hindoo chronology and cosmogony, except when a missionary, on the banks of the Ganges exhibits it to the pupils of his English school, as a specimen of the falsehoods which have ever formed the swaddling bands of Pantheism; or when some Louisiana planter entertains a Yankee schoolmaster in search of employment, with an exhibition of the [illegible] philosophy [illegible] among the [illegible].

Failing in the attempt [illegible] infidels [illegible] Brahminism for Christianity, infidels beat a retreat from India, and went down into Egypt for help. Here they made prodigious discoveries of the scientific and religious truths believed by the worshipers of dogs and dung-beetles, recorded upon the coffins of holy bulls, and the temples sacred to crows and crocodiles. The age was favorable for French discoveries.

Napoleon and his savans cut out of the ceiling of a temple, at Dendera, in Egypt, a stone covered with uncouth astronomical, astrological, and hieroglyphic figures, which they insisted was a representation of the sky at the time the temple was built; and finding a division made between the signs of the Crab and the Lion, and marks for the Sun and Moon there, they took it into their heads that the Sun must have entered the Zodiac at that spot, on the year this Zodiac was made; and calculating back, found that must be at least seventeen thousand years ago. Hundreds of thousands visited the wonderful antediluvian monument, in the National Library, in Paris, where it had been brought; and where infidel commentators were never wanting to inform them that this remarkable stone proved the whole Bible to be a series of lies. A professor of the University of Breslau published a pamphlet, entitled Invincible Proof that the Earth is at least ten times older than is taught by the Bible. Scores of such publications followed, and for forty years infidel newspapers, magazines, and reviews, kept trumpeting this great refutation of the Bible. From these it descended to the vulgar, with additions and improvements; and it is now frequently alleged as proving that "ten thousand years before Adam was born, the priests of Egypt were carving astronomy on the pyramids." There is scarcely one of my French or German readers who has not heard of it.

It did not shake the skeptic's credulity in the least that no two of the savans were agreed, by some thousand of years, how old it was—that they could not tell what the Egyptian system of astronomy was—and that none of them could read the hieroglyphics which explained it. Whatever might be doubtful, of one thing they were all perfectly sure: that it was far older than the creation. But in 1832 the curious Egyptian astronomy was studied, and it appeared that the Sun and Moon were so placed on the Zodiac to mark the beginning of the year there; and the dividing line fenced off one-half of the sky under the care of the Sun, while the other was placed under the Moon's patronage. Then it was discovered that the positions of the stars were represented by the pictures of the gods whose names they bore—Jupiter, Saturn, &c.—and by calculating the places of these pictures back, it was found that this Zodiac represented their places in the year of our Lord 37: the year of the birth of Nero, a great temple-builder and repairer. Finally, Champollion learned to read the hieroglyphics, and the names, surnames, and titles of the emperors Tiberius, Claudius, Nero, and Domitian, were found on the temple of Esneh, which had been declared to be a few thousand years older than that of Denderah, the names of Claudius and Antoninus Pius; while the whole workmanship and style of building have satisfied all antiquarians that these buildings were erected during the declining days of art in the Roman Empire. The Roman title, autocrat, engraved on the Zodiac itself, attests its antiquity to be not quite two thousand, instead of seventeen or twenty-seven thousand years.

But, not satisfied with demolishing the batteries of infidelity, astronomy has been employed to ascertain the dates of numbers of events recorded on Egyptian monuments to have happened to one or other of the Pharaohs, "beloved of Ammon, and brother of the Sun," when such a star was in such a position. Mr. Poole has spent years in gathering such inscriptions, and in calculating the dates thus furnished. The astronomer royal, at Greenwich, Mr. Airy, has reviewed the calculations, and finds them correct. Wilkinson, the great Egyptologist, agrees with their conclusions. And the result is, that *the astronomical chronology of the Egyptian monuments sustains the Bible Chronology. Geology comes forward to confirm the testimony of her elder sister, and assures us that the alleged vast antiquity of the Egyptian monuments is impossible, as it is not more than 5,600 years since the soil of Egypt first appeared above water, as a "muddy morass."† The learned Adrian Balbo thus sums up the whole question: "No monument, either astronomical or historical, has yet been able to prove the books of Moses false; but with them, on the contrary, agree, in the most remarkable manner, the results obtained by the most learned philologists, and the [illegible] [illegible]."

Reply to Bro. Taylor.

Bro. D. T. Taylor has asked, are the souls in hades dead, or alive?" My reply must be brief,—expressive of my interest in the inquirer and his subject of inquiry.

Our brother's quotations and definitions imply the answer—dead; or, not alive. This negative answer seems expressly by Ps. 16: 8–11; Acts 2: 25–28.

1. The soul here is the subject of remark.

2. This soul is the self-hood—the personality; or, "the Holy One."

3. "Thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."

4. "My flesh shall rest in hope."—This flesh includes the organized body that was exposed to corruption.

5. This "Holy One" is expressed by the personal pronouns "I—me—my"—the one who "shall not be moved;" because of this blessed hope—the non-corruption and—the Resurrection."

6. To crown the whole, "Thou wilt show ME the path of life." The way to fulfill this hope, is by a resurrection to life. Here each point seems too well guarded for our brother to doubt.

Again. "Thou wilt lighten my candle."—Ps. 18: 28. Thou wilt restore the breath or spirit of life. "The spirit of man is the candle," etc.—Prov. 20: 27. Here the light to the candle is as the spirit to man! The light of the candle extinguished, is not a candle, any how; but the candle itself may again be lighted. Thus God gave to Jesus—his Holy One—"who died for us," a resurrection to life.

As the "word is truth," we get from God the answer double; both negative and positive. The state or condition in sheol is "dead." The hope accomplished is "life;" therefore the soul in hades is dead, and in absolute want of life! The light is gone, needing his candle re-lighted.

Note. The difficulties that surround us may result from our peculiar education (or condition, 1 John 5: 19,) and possibly were not presented at all, to the minds of God's prophets and apostles. Death was the loss or absence of life; and life alone met the want. This life animates only the body. "The inner man" is only affirmed of those where "Christ is formed within the hope of glory;" and hence Bro. L. makes all the ground (in imagination) that he stands on at this point. The points he makes in paragraphs 8 and 9 are striking, as to Solomon's testimony.—Eccl. 9: 5. "Mark, "the jewel man—the casket man," etc., originate in more modern progress; and quite away from "the words which the Holy Ghost useth." These and other philosophic and poetic phrases require another class of ideas than those which God's prophets express by "soul, death, hades, and resurrection to life!"

There is no light on this point aside from "the word." No light to illumine the dim can exist short of God. Henceforth is no hope that we can see but by simply believing the truth already given. The word says that God made man, Adam, a living soul! Sin occasioned death—"dead souls!" Now the remedy meets the want by a resurrection of the manhood—the Adam—the soul, or self-hood. As instruction and pardon pertain to the personality, (this hunger and thirst, weakness and strength,) without one thought of physiological anatomy, so does death and resurrection.

The primary and prevailing use of the word soul embraces the person—"three thousand souls"—three thousand persons. Hence, when God says that "The soul that sinneth it (she or the same) shall die," he does embrace the sinner! The sinner who is instructed and justified, is he who shall be resurrected, transformed and glorified.

"God knoweth the thoughts of the [illegible] that they are vain." All [illegible] lore applied here ignores the [illegible] God. But God says their thoughts are "vain." Let us all say, Amen. No pure philosopher, from Plato to Prof. [illegible], has been able to use Bible language, except as they remodel it.

I was recently urged to tell "what is it that dreams?" My reply was, It is that which goes to bed! [illegible] "Well, it is I who go to bed." [illegible] the very fellow who sleeps, dreams and gets up again.

The language of Scripture is the language of fact—the expression of actual observation and experience. [illegible]

THE WORLD'S CRISIS. WHOLE NO. 191.

For the Crisis.

Brief Expositions.

NO. VII.—JUSTIFICATION AND PEACE.

"Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."—Rom. 5: 1.

[illegible] is justified, [illegible] pardoned, and treated by God as if he were personally innocent or righteous. The opposite of being justified is to be condemned; and when a man is justified, he ceases to be under condemnation, and is adopted into the family of heaven. He receives the blessing of justification not for what he is, or does, or suffers; but simply because Jesus bore his sins in his own body on the tree. He who admits that Jesus is the end of the law for righteousness to him,—that Jesus in his life and death is the propitiation for his sins, is "justified from all things, from which he could not be justified by the law of Moses." He who rejects this gospel message continues under condemnation—awfully aggravated by that very deed—and shall finally be consigned to the darkness of non-being. Thus justification is by faith that it might be by grace, or freely,—entirely on the ground of what Jesus underwent in the room of the guilty. Put forth whatever efforts you please, you can lay no basis for justification; you can produce no qualification for obtaining it; you may, however, have the grand mercy itself without money and without price, but in no other way. "Hearken unto me," says Jehovah, "ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness; I bring near my righteousness," (Isa. 46: 12,) that is, the righteousness which he had graciously provided for them. Mark the word—STOUT-HEARTED. You may complain of your cold, hard, unyielding heart, —O see that you are the very person to whom the Lord is so merciful,—he brings near to you his righteousness. He knows you are "far from righteousness"; and, in pity, he comes to your help. In the gospel you are presented with a "wedding garment"—the righteousness of Immanuel; we beseech you put it on, and be prepared for judgment. Jesus is your righteousness. Instead of contemplating your "filthy rags," look up to the Mediator, your righteousness, seated at God's right hand. Behold him and rejoice!

Many are seeking justification from a broken cistern that can hold no water. How many are "doing all they can"—trusting to their honesty—their virtue—their goodness of heart—their harmlessness—their prayers—their sorrowings—and their repentance! These refuges of lies, and the peace they furnish, are alarmingly deceptive and fatal. Lately a Colonel in the British army was dying in India, and when near his end, some of the subordinate officers came into the room where he lay, inquiring after his state. One of them spoke to him some soothing words, among which the expression, "be not afraid, Colonel," occurred. The dying man lifted his head with an effort from his pillow and addressed him thus: "Young man, don't speak to me [illegible] not afraid of death—I have never, since I was born, wronged one of my fellow-men, and I am not afraid to meet my God when he shall be pleased to call me into his presence." He died soon after in peace, and you see whence he drew it. Contrast his state of mind with Paul's, and you can readily determine the danger of his position. "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." "I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but refuse that I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith."—Phil. 3: 8, 9. At the tribunal of God, if you appear clothed in the blood-dyed garments of Jesus' righteousness, you shall be accepted at once, and admitted into the eternal glory.

What is peace with God?—the first blessing that attends the justification of a believer. It is the absence of all fear in respect of judgment. As already shown, a sinner may lose, in an improper and delusive way, his sense of alarm in view of appearing at the bar of heaven; such a [illegible] as certainly to vanish as the [illegible] the Ugly sun. It is peace [illegible] rather than peace with God. The "peace with God" spoken of in the passage under consideration, originates with God, and will be enduring as its author. It is the peace "of God," as well as "peace with God," and it passeth all understanding. How happy you would be if you owned this [illegible]—if you had lost the terror of vengeance—if you could see clearly that it would not be dangerous for you to meet him at the great white throne. Now, this [illegible] is as free to you as it was to Paul and the Roman christians; and if you follow their example, you shall find it where [illegible] ever sought for the blessing in vain. We request you to consider that the [illegible] does not read, "being sanctified by faith," but "being justified by faith, we have peace with God." God justifies "the [illegible] and therefore those who are accepted [illegible] at the moment of their [illegible] an atom of excellence in [illegible]. They are ungodly. Rom. 4: 5. [illegible]

[illegible] the natural and necessary consequence of the latter. Were peace with God the result of being made holy, it would spring from the holiness in us, even though God-produced; and not from the finished work of our Lord Jesus Christ, now in heaven our advocate with the Father; or perhaps more correctly, it would not originate solely in the consciousness of pardon and acceptance through Jesus, or from the contemplation of Jehovah's gracious character, as displayed in pardoning and accepting us through his Son.

You cannot believe that Jesus is "the Lord your righteousness" without receiving pardon and assistance; and as soon as you are pardoned and accepted, you are promised the illuminated consciousness that you have been so treated by a merciful God. By believing in Jesus you are pardoned; being pardoned—inferring, to the glory of God's truthfulness, that as a believer in his Son, manifested to be your righteousness, you are acquitted—you must attain forthwith unto peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. It is sin only that makes you afraid of judgment; when you know in the hour of justification that it is cancelled, the slavish terror must of necessity vanish away.

Peace with God begins the christian life, and is not a christian attainment. "Being justified we have"—not we expect—"peace." See how soon "peace" was inherited by the jailor, and by the Pentecostal converts; and since it immediately succeeds justification, and not sanctification, this invariably must be the case. When there is no heaven-descended peace, can there be any justification? There may be peace without divine justification, as in the case of the dying Colonel already detailed; but a sinner cannot be justified by God without at the same time receiving peace. If you have peace, but not emanating from Jesus, be admonished to cast it away, and to embrace the everlasting gospel—the good news about a crucified, exalted and returning Savior—and then assuredly peace—solid, thrilling, ennobling, enduring peace—shall be imparted to your soul. Heaven's joy fills your heart in that hour.

Gospel peace—peace with God—breaks up a man's peace with himself, so long at any rate as he is in this mortal and frail condition. He grows more and more satisfied with Jesus, his all and all; and less and less satisfied with his own attainments and exercises. Jesus is enough for him—Jesus meets all his necessities—Jesus answers for all his defects; and while enjoying this Christ-originated, unspeakable tranquillity, he seeks with earnestness to attain unto the measure of the stature of a renewed man, and a spiritual self-conquest befitting one who is an heir of immortality and glory.

For the Crisis

Debt and Grace.

The Princeton Review, which represents the Old School Presbyterian Church, says of the book:

"The doctrine elaborately maintained in this work is, that the eternal punishment of the wicked consists in their annihilation at death, [rather, in the "second death."] Whatever support can be contributed to this doctrine by affluent learning, scholarly culture, brilliancy and force of style, and dialectic acuteness, is subsidized for the purpose in this massive and compact volume. The number of editions it has reached, notwithstanding the immense burden of quotations from ancient and modern sources, which the author's exhaustive reading has enabled him to pack into it, evinces its power. Little can be said in defence of his position, which he has left unsaid. As the alleged annihilation continues forever, he wastes no time in reducing the significance of the terms "eternal," "everlasting," as applied to the future punishment of the wicked. He labors to show that the terms "destruction," "perdition," "lost," etc., as used in reference to unbelievers* in the Bible, import their annihilation, while such terms as fire, etc., denote the instruments thereof. Of course, we have no room to undertake a refutation of this subtle and dangerous book, which is likely to promote what we believe to be one of the most threatening and pestilent heresies just now crowding upon us. We will only say in the most general way:" etc.

The Review names three tests of a doctrine, viz., the general tenor and obvious sense of the Scriptures; the common consent of the church, apparent in her creeds; and the fruits of the doctrine itself. It concludes:

"The doctrine of the future and endless punishment of the wicked, however it may startle delicate sensibilities, may safely abide this ordeal, as compared with any and all creeds which deny or impugn it—especially annihilation. A doctrine which has these three marks will still hold its place. All efforts to overthrow it, however they may subvert the faith of some, will prove abortive. They might, if it were possible, deceive the very elect. But, happily, this is not possible."

And these are what christians? [illegible]

* The Review doubtless intends a comma after this word. To believe on Christ is the fundamental condition of salvation. Belief "in the Bible" may be a different thing.

The World's Crisis.
BOSTON, MAY 4, 1859.

The Spirit.—No 5.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

We have now looked at examples of the four uses of ruakh, or spirit, but do not yet find any thing in the Bible about an immortal spirit in man. Why this entire silence on this point if it is true?

We will notice one or two passages which, at first sight, might appear to some to favor the popular theology. "When he had drunk, his (ruakh) spirit came again, and he revived." Jud. 15: 19. This is recorded of Sampson when "he was sore athirst" and feared death for want of water. This took place while he was alive, but when very much exhausted. The spirit can not mean the immortal one of which we hear so much, for if that had left, then Sampson was dead; besides we doubt whether such a spirit would leave for want of water, and then come back to live in the man again because he obtained some drink. The obvious idea is, that by drinking the water, he was refreshed;—spirit being used in this example to represent a state of feeling. His nervous and mental energies were prostrated, but were aroused and revived when his "sore" thirst was quenched.

A similar example is recorded in 1 Sam. 30: 12. The Amalekites had smitten Ziklag, burned it with fire, and taken the women captives. While David was engaged in their pursuit, his men found an Egyptian, who had been a servant to an Amalekite. This servant had been left by the way, on account of sickness. He was in a very exhausted condition when brought to David. They "gave him bread, and he did eat; and they made him drink water. And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins; and when he had eaten, his (ruakh) spirit came again to him, for he had eaten no bread, nor drunk any water, three days and three nights." In this example, it is evident that (ruakh) does not represent a conscious entity that had left the man, which came back when they gave him food and drink, for the man was not dead. When a man is exhausted and depressed in his feelings, we say, he is "low-spirited;" and of another, who is very energetic, "he is high spirited," or "full of spirit," meaning life—animation. When ruakh is used as in the foregoing examples, it may be properly rendered by the word courage, or animation, as in Joshua 2: 11. Rahab says to the spies, whom she protected, "as soon as we heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more (ruakh) courage in any man, because of you." This can not mean that their immortal spirits were so frightened that they all left their habitations in the bodies of the men and women, who lived in Jericho, and flew away for safety. Those men lived on, but their (ruakh) courage failed through fear of the children of the Lord.

As the atmosphere—"the (ruakh) breath of lives"—is employed to convey the odor of flowers and other objects to the olfactory nerve, thereby producing the sensation of smell, we have the word ruakh used several times to express this feeling. In speaking of the holy perfumery, prepared by the Lord's direction for the use of the tabernacle, he says;—"Whosoever shall make like unto that, (ruakh) to smell thereto, shall even be cut off from his people." Ex. 30: 38. In this example the word is used in the infinitive and active form. As "the breath of lives," or atmosphere, is ever in motion, the Lord has seen fit to use the word ruakh, when representing the air, to express one result of its action; to wit, the sensation of smell. When speaking of the gods of the heathen, Moses says;—"which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor (ruakh) smell." Deut. 4: 28. They have no nerves of sensation to be affected by the action of the atmosphere, hence, cannot smell the odor which it may bear from surrounding objects. In these examples, the word denoting the cause is used to represent the effect. Ruakh is used in this sense eleven times.

When speaking of the scales of the Leviathan, Job says:—"One is so near to another that no (ruakh) air can come between them." Job 41: 16. In this example, we have ruakh used to represent that which is called "the (ruakh) breath of life," which is essential to sustain the lives of all creatures upon the earth. When taken away, we die, and return to dust, to await the resurrection at the last day, when the literal man will live again.

The following passage is thought, by some, to stand opposed to our position. "And they fell upon their faces, and said, O God, the God of the (ruakh) spirits of all flesh." Num. 16: 22. It will be observed that "all flesh" has a portion of this spirit or breath of life. All the animal creation have received the breath or spirit of life from their Creator; hence he is "the God of the spirits" or breath "of all flesh." Job says:—"The (ruakh) spirit of God is in my nostrils." Job 27: 3. We do not think Job's mind was in his nostrils; neither his immortal soul, if he had one. But the breath of life was there. It is absurd to suppose that the real, accountable being, called Job, was in his own nostrils! In chap. [illegible] Job says: "But there is a (ruakh) spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." Observe, he does not say this spirit is man, but is in man; and without this, we have no life, no understanding. This inspiration sets the human machinery in motion, and thought is evolved by the action of the brain; till "his (ruakh) breath goeth forth . . . in that very day his thoughts perish." Ps. 146: 4.

There is one more passage which is sometimes produced by those who believe that (ruakh) spirit is the immortal, conscious part of man. It is in Zech. 12: 1. "The burden of the word of the Lord for Israel, which stretcheth forth the heavens, and layeth the foundation of the earth, and formeth the (ruakh) spirit of man within him." In this scripture the Lord makes himself known as the Creator of "the heavens," "the earth," and "the spirit," or "breath of life" to sustain man's existence, and which he has within him, and when it is taken from him, he dies, and "his thoughts perish."

We have a similar passage in Amos 4: 13. "For, lo, he that formeth the mountains, and createth the (ruakh) wind . . . the Lord, the God of hosts is his name." Here we have the true idea plainly expressed. The ruakh, spirit or breath in man, is not a part of God, as many claim, but a substance formed by our Creator, to be received within ourselves, through the nostrils, for the purpose of purifying the blood while passing through the lungs and then returning through our nostrils, laden with impurities, to be exchanged for another portion of pure ruakh, or air. The Lord formed this before he made man, but man lives no longer than this "breath of life" is "within him." Let it be remembered that ruakh is the only word rendered wind in the Old Testament.

We have yet to learn from the Bible, philosophy, facts or physiology, that any thing but "the breath of life" was added to man after his creation, or taken from him at death.

Poultney.

The church in this place is growing up into Christ, their living head. Their christianity is active, looking after the poor and afflicted, and receiving in return joy and peace from the Lord. Their social meetings are excellent, really refreshing to weary pilgrims. They seem to be understandingly converted, and to realize that christianity consists in doing, as well as believing. Their faith does not rest on the opinions of men and theological fables of these last days, but on the sure word of the Lord. It can be truly said of them, "See how they love one another." Five more were baptized, Lord's day, April 24th.

The opposition still continues unabated. Some who came and took a part in the meetings at first, and were blessed in so doing, finding it would make them unpopular with a certain class, left, and are now among the most bitter opposers. It is a lamentable fact, that the most decided resistance against this work of the Lord is from ministers and professors of religion. We should judge that no effort had been spared to keep the people from attending these meetings, which have been so signally blessed by the great head of the church. We are called the very "worst of infidels," and held up to the people as objects worthy of public abhorrence. Children are kept from our meetings as from a horse race or circus, and still it is said, by those who are competent to judge, that the meetings have resulted in the greatest reformation ever known in the place. Truly, these are "strange times." The last day perils described by Paul, seem to have fully come. When speaking of nominal christendom, he says:—"This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves . . . . . high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such turn away." Did Paul live now, we think he could not give a description of these times more accurate, than the one in 2 Tim. 3: 1–5.

We were invited, by some who love the Lord, to preach Wednesday evening, April 27th, in a house occupied by the M. E. Church in Hampton, N. Y., which, when built, was understood to be a free house. Supposing all good people were in favor of such a meeting, and knowing that many unconverted were anxious to hear, we complied with the request. On Wednesday, the day of the appointed meeting, we received a note signed by all the official members of the church, (eight) in which they say:—

"Rev. Miles Grant,—Sir,—We have been informed . . . that you have made an appointment to preach at the Methodist Episcopal Church of Hampton, on Wednesday evening, April 27th. . . . . Therefore, we, the undersigned, official members and trustees of Hampton charge . . . . request you to withdraw your appointment."

At the same time, they directed their clerk to send a note to their sexton, as follows:—

"Bro. Cook,—Dear Sir,—The trustees of this charge have directed me to inform you, that the Methodist Episcopal Church [illegible] Wednesday evening, April 27th. [illegible], CLERK."

Of course the house was not opened, and so Bro. Cook opened his house, where we had a blessed season, worshiping the God of our fathers, receiving rich comfort from his heavenly grace. Only the Saturday evening previous, they had some kind of an exhibition, which caused such joyful acclamations as were heard by those who were seated in a house some little distance. —"Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God."—Luther said, the preaching of the coming of the Lord, would be "shut out of all the churches and confined to private houses." How true! There is scarcely a church in the land now open for the preaching of the great truths of the Bible, that so immediately concern the present generation. Over almost every door might be truly written,—"Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof."

"War Inevitable."

The above is the heading of foreign news received by the last arrival. It is evident that all the talk about a "peace conference" is merely to gain a little time for more complete preparations for the bloody onset. France especially is sparing no effort to be ready for the active scenes of war as soon as possible. All indications show that there is to be war on a grand scale. The wonderful Emperor of France is evidently about to make a move that will astonish the world, and help fill up the prophetic chart, now so nearly completed. Truly,

"We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time;
In an age on ages telling,
To be living is sublime."

For the Crisis.

Coming Events.

"O, Lord, we have met to pray for the conversion of the world!" so prayed a good deacon of the Baptist church, at a recent missionary meeting. It seems strange that sensible men are so deeply deluded. I should as soon think of seeing water run up hill, as to believe the world would be converted. How can men believe that event hastening? Everything is just the reverse of that. The nations of earth are muttering their threats at each other, and preparing for WAR; there is no sign of peace visible. The wise men are perplexed at questions that rush upon them. The following is extracted from one of our public journals:

"THE CURRENT QUESTIONS.—The number of topics that to-day press, and are yet to press, upon public attention, is so great as to excite wonder. It seems as if we had all come, or were just about to come upon a crisis; and what it will bring, and how we shall all be employed while it is passing, what parts we shall all play, &c., are as blank to the perception as possible. Never, we venture to say, in the history of the world was there a point of time upon which hinged such great results. A general European war, from which each nation instinctively feels there is no escape, even though they may not be able to definitely state its cause; * * * * the re-openings of the African slave trade which looks likely to shake this country to its centre; * * * the purchase, or conquest of Cuba; * * * and schemes of less note, but of no less importance. * * * Here are topics enough to call for the best minds, and largest souls into the field of public labor."

Call out the "best minds" to be found. Belshazzer called out his wise men, when the hand-writing on the wall foretold his doom. Earth's doom is written on transpiring events, and the pealing blast of the clarion will quickly summon her children to the conflict. Men pray that "the nations may learn war no more;" what's the good of praying for that? So long as mortality inhabits earth, wars will continue. Men improve wonderfully in the art of war and perfecting warlike instruments. Here are a few descriptions of their handicraft:

"The best English cannon will carry a 32 lb. shot about five miles. One of the Dalghren guns, at Norfolk, Va. carried a shot of the same size over six miles. The fire is so precise from some of them, that a man, a mile distant, can be hit nineteen times out of twenty." "The Secretary of War has discovered a new principle in ordnance, which is to be tested. If the experiment is successful, it will be one of the most terrific engines of destruction ever invented, presenting a combination of the principles of those noted 'Dahlgrene' and 'Columbiad' guns; its muzzle twenty-eight inches in diameter, and capable of throwing 450 lbs. of metal at a single shot." A rotary cannon has been invented, which can be fired sixty times per minute. It is of brass—of the usual shape—mounted on wheels—a rotary cylinder constitutes the breech, which contains four charges, replenished by means of a hopper, and fired as fast as a man can work a lever backward and forward. It is discharged by electricity—which is believed to be an important discovery. By means of the battery and wires connecting with the cylinder—by which ignition is caused, the cylinder becomes perfectly electrised, keeping it as cool as if bathed with ice. On firing two hundred rounds in rapid succession, (about thirty-five per minute,) it was found at the end of that time, and without using the swab-stick, the breech was colder than when the firing commenced."

"DESTRUCTIVE WEAPON.—The great French cannon, which the Emperor has so sedulously kept from the public inspection, the famous Armstrong gun about which the English boast so much, and our own famous Columbiads, are entirely thrown into the shade by a new gun invented by a New Yorker. The following is a description of it:—

The gun is half the size, half the length, and less than one-third the weight, of those in present use, will perform more efficient service. It does not heat so quick—and when heated will cool quicker. It has been found almost an impossibility to explode it. It will enable the artillery service to be more effectual at half the present cost—reducing the number of men and horses fifty per cent—with, of course a proportionate reduction in expense. The inventor, for certain reasons, has not yet made public either his invention or his name in connection with it. We have seen the guns—several of them—and beautiful articles they are—rifled and smooth bore, made of an entirely new combination of materials, unequalled for durability and strength.

The public, however, will soon have a chance to view the cannon, and witness public tests of its efficiency and power."

All these big guns are improvements on the old style. Then think of the great number of fire-arms—your "Minnie" and "Sharpe's" rifles, "Colts" Carbines and Revolvers; "celebrated volcanic Repeating pistols," &c., &c., all mingling together, with chain, shot, cannister, and grape, bomb shells and fire balls—the ships of war and impregnable fortifications—the "chief captains" and "mighty men," all talking of, and preparing for WAR; marshalling their hosts for the work.

"In relation to the preparations for war, now going on in Europe, the London Post, Lord Palmerston's organ—says:—'The clash and din of moving armies are heard louder and louder above the faint voice of diplomacy. Tangible war difficulties stare us in the face; whilst peace only glides before our vision as an impalpable shadow.'"

To hear men talk of peace—the millennium—and to imagine the world is soon to be converted—why it is enough to make a man of common sense think they have the night-mare. They laugh at "mistakes of the Millerites," as they term us—the laugh is out of place—what a TREMENDOUS mistake they have made in calculating the world's conversion to peace—to Religion, when any one may see it is fast being converted to a bloody field of Death—such as never was, and as awful, yes, more so, than every scene of carnage combined—from the murder of "Righteous Abel" down the gory river of war's desolation, to the blood-chilling tales of horror from distant India's shore!

Will nothing awake Zion's sleeping watchmen? Probe them with the spear of truth; they order you off. Peal the trumpet notes of coming events in their ears; they put their hands thereon, turn over and sleep on. Show them the coming shadows of the approaching day; they rub their eyes, then sink to slumber again. It seems as if nothing could awake them, and it may be—it will be with many that nothing will, but the Archangel's trump, and echo answers "the Arcangel's trump."

Friends, may you and I be ready to join the hosts of Heaven, and unite in the song of victory from the Redeemed of every age, kindred, and tongue, in the bright morning of the Resurrection which ere long will dawn in beauteous splendor.

"The gloomy night of sadness
Begins to wear away,
The glowing tinge of morning
Proclaims the coming day."

From B. Spaulding.

BRO. GRANT:—May grace, mercy and peace be multiplied to you, and to the brethren generally, everywhere, who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

I am at present on Swan's Island, otherwise called Burnt Coat. It lies between Mount Desert on the east, and Isle au Haute on the west. It contains about eighty families, and six school districts; no meeting house, or minister, so I have abundant room for labor. I have been here two Sabbaths and expect to stop another. I give frequent lectures in the week time; often have family meetings; two or three families come together, and I give them a talk without much formality. Such meetings I find very useful.

I think good will be done in this Island. There is but very little sectarianism. There are two churches, to be sure, a baptist and a methodist, but they are almost invisible, and they receive me everywhere with great kindness and hospitality. I visit every family as they come along, showing no partiality. I exhort in every family, and pray frequently with them; and they treat me respectfully, and listen candidly. Thus I enjoy my labors among this people. They are mostly fishermen, generally industrious, sober, virtuous. I circulate many tracts, both of the American tract society, and of the Advent tracts. I have had a large amount given to me, for this purpose; some at Concord, others at Lowell and West Chelmsford, New London and Boston. Thanks be to the donors; may the Lord bless them; and while they have watered others, may their own souls be watered. Let me say to them, I enjoy circulating these tracts and papers very much; they are thankfully received, and I doubt not will be read well; and may we not expect they will do much good? You will understand they have very few such papers and tracts here.

I endeavor to hold forth the simple teachings of the Bible, in relation to the kingdom of heaven, its King, subjects and location; the literal resurrection of the dead, the restitution of all things, the state of the dead, and the destruction of the wicked. These subjects contain the leading ideas of the Gospel system. I have to begin and feed with milk first, for they are not able to bear strong meat. I need heavenly wisdom, holy boldness, humbleness of mind, meekness, the spirit of discernment, that I may know whom to reprove, whom to exhort, whom to comfort, whom to instruct. The Lord does give me access to minds. O! I am a wonder to myself, when I see how the Lord goes with me, and stands by me, and how he opens hearts and ears, so that I feel that my labor is not in vain in the Lord.

In reference to laboring, I think more may be done by visiting families than by preaching. True, we want both, but when we go into a family, we see them as they are, we see what kind of exhortation, instruction, reproof, or comfort, they need; and then we know how to treat their particular cases. Long experience has taught me this. Here is room for several preachers; they may preach to good, candid congregations, as often as they please, with little or no opposition, and find great hospitality. Yes, and they will get the approbation of God, of their own conscience, and of good men; and is not that salary enough? Paul did not complain of his, though it consisted of bonds and imprisonments, being beaten thrice with forty lashes, save one, being stoned, reviled, rejected, in shipwrecks oft, in perils by sea, and perils by land, in perils by robbers, and in perils by false brethren.

I will not promise brethren much money, if they come; but the reward awaits the faithful servant of his Master at the end of the race, and it is a glorious reward; the hope is full of immortality, it maketh not ashamed, it is like an anchor to the soul; it is a "Blessed Hope."

Come, brethren, come and try it; here are fields white, ready for the harvest; come in the name and strength of your Master, and win for him a bride.

Let me just say to brethren, if they have any tracts or child's papers to spare, and they will lay them aside, and bundle them up, when I come home the first of June, I would gladly receive them, and will place them in hands, where they will be read with interest.

Brethren, pray for me, and write to me; direct letters to South West Harbor, Me.

BRO. GRANT:—On Saturday, the 16th inst. I took leave of my family, entered "Nahum's last day chariots," and was soon on my way to Berlin Falls, where, in the woods, and surrounded by high mountains, a few pilgrims to Mount Zion had pitched their tents for the present. With lightning speed I was borne on my way, through scenery of the greatest interest to those who love to gaze upon the beautiful picture that Nature presents to our vision. Lovely streams, sparkling like ten thousand diamonds, dashed along in their course toward the ocean, while here and there rich vale and smiling hills seemed to rejoice at the return of spring. Snow-clad mountains, whose lofty summits seemed almost to reach the skies, presented before me a scene of the greatest sublimity and grandeur. Not only did these towering mountains charm my own heart, but they seemed to attract the notice of every passing cloud, for often could I see the clouds stoop so low as to pillow their golden ringlets upon the bosom of the mountains, kiss their time-worn cheeks, or hide them from my vision by curtains of the richest drapery. O, what scenes of beauty and grandeur! I thought, if flowery streams and silvery lakes, smiling hills, towering mountains, and variegated clouds, presented such attractions where the curse prevails, what must have been the appearance of this world of ours, when "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy!" And what, oh! what must be the scenes that open up before our vision, when the curse shall be removed, and the glory of God fill the earth? With a heart full of interest I could sing—

"How bright the vision, oh! how long
Shall that glad hour delay?
Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day!"

As the sun was shining behind the western hills, our "fiery steed" halted, and I soon found myself among the pilgrim "mountaineers" of Berlin Falls. The warm greeting received from those whom I had never seen before, told, in language that could not be misunderstood, that I was with Father's children, who were "not forgetful to entertain strangers."

Here I remained over the Sabbath—had the privilege of trying to preach to them who appeared interested to hear—baptized one happy convert, and, with the despised few who love and look for the coming of Jesus, sat down to commemorate his dying love. [illegible] we looked back to the cross as the place [illegible] where his blood was shed for the remission of our sins, we also looked forward, with glad anticipations, to that day when the same Jesus will appear to drink anew of the fruit of the vine, with us, in our Father's kingdom.

"O, hail, happy day!"

While here I found by happy experience that "far, far away" among the mountains, and in the humblest dwelling, God's love can be enjoyed, and every christian grace abound.

With a sad heart I bade farewell to the saints of this place: and as I gave them the parting hand, I could not help praying, Lord, hasten the time when all thy children shall meet to part no more.

Yarmouth, Me., April 21, 1859.

From S. B. Mabey.

Bro. Grant:—It may be interesting to the scattered pilgrims to hear from this part of the far West, in regard to the state of religion. There is, as in other places thro' our land, a great deal of formality—but little heart work and vital godliness. There are a few, however, who, through the labors of Brn. Morgan, Calkins and Chandler, attended with the blessed Spirit of God, are "contending for the faith once delivered to the saints;" who believe in the Bible doctrine of eternal life only through faith in Christ, obtained by a faithful continuance in well doing, through the first resurrection, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, "under the whole heaven." After fifteen years of dilligent and prayerful searching of the Scriptures, and comparing the popular theology of the present day with it, I am astonished to see how little harmony there is between them; it appears to be perfectly antipodal, on most of the great, leading principles of God's plan, to redeem man and the world from sin and evil. Instead of receiving the word by a liberal interpretation, they must spiritualize it into something entirely foreign from God's will and truth.

Through the mercy of God, I was converted to the truth of the Gospel of the soon coming kingdom of Jesus, under the labors of Bro. George Burnham, in Albany, N. Y., in '42. Since that time, the appearing of Jesus, to give the reward of immortality, has been most dear to me. In it are concentrated the hopes and expectations of patriarchs, prophets and "holy men of old," who embraced the promises, by faith, as great and precious realities, to be fulfilled most literally in the restitution of all things.

We hold prayer and conference meetings, once a week, and have talked some of organizing a church on the simple Bible plan of the brethren in other places, taking the Scriptures as our only creed, and christian character our only test of fellowship. Some live scattered around some number of miles; others are intending to go further west. I have no doubt if we had a suitable hall, and regular preaching, there might be a strong church raised up in Amboy; but we have not the means in our hands now; the way may open ere long for doing more.

This place is a thriving city of about 2500 inhabitants, many of them from the New England States. It is eleven miles south of Dixon, on the Central Railroad. It is quite a strong-hold of sectarianism, for a newly settled village; but the scales of prejudices are being removed from the eyes of some, and there is a good prospect for the establishment of the truth by a suitable effort. We have expected some of our preaching brethren, but have been looking in vain thus far.

Amboy, Ill., April.

From M. S. Brown.

Bro. Grant:—We have been blessed with preaching during the past year, regularly, once in two weeks, by Eld. E. C. Cowles, when health would admit, who is a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. Much good has been the result; many have embraced the glorious truths of the bible; and often have our own hearts been cheered by hearing the gospel of the kingdom preached in its purity. Many have become firm believers in the unconsciousness of man in death—future life by a resurrection—the final destruction of the wicked, and glorious restitution of all things, which is soon to take place, as foretold by the holy prophets.

Because of the many glorious promises, by which we believe that Eden shall again bloom on earth, we are looking forward to that glorious day, when the earth shall be renewed, and

"Fair Beulah's fields before us rise,
And ope the gates of Paradise."

Glorious day! thou wilt soon on us dawn, for the Lord is our lawgiver; the Lord is our king; he will save us.

Summer Hill, N. Y.

From J. A. Kennaday.

Bro. Grant:—I feel it my duty to make acknowledgements for your brotherly kindness in sending me the "Crisis." I consider it the only true witness, in the form of a paper, to the truth. Its weekly visits are always refreshing, and have been a great help in establishing me in the true principles of the gospel.

I thank the Lord that, after being a preacher for many years, I found that the wages of sin was death, but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord; and, the soul that sinneth, it shall die; and not live eternally in misery. That the wicked will be punished with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power; and not be preserved in eternal misery.

I am a poor, sickly old man; cannot labor much in the vineyard of the Lord, but all I can preach is, I trust, in harmony with truth. Not being able to travel much among the brethren, I want them to know that I am still looking for, and hastening unto, the coming of the Lord.

May the Lord bless you, and your paper, and the church. May the time soon come, when the wickedness of the wicked shall come to an end, and this earth be fitted up for the eternal abode of the saints, and Jesus Christ sway his mild sceptre over the earth.

Somerville, Me.

From L. L. Leach.

Bro. Grant:—During the past year and a half, in which I have been identified with Second Advent believers in Newfield, I have passed through many checkered scenes. I have made many crooked paths, and many times have my feet well nigh slipped. I know that the way to the kingdom is a narrow one, so narrow that he who walks in it must be every whit clean, in order to have a free pass through the strait gate. I feel like struggling on, although I am in a world where sickness and sorrow, pain and death still reign triumphant; where trials and temptations continually mar the peace of the way-worn pilgrim. I sigh for home. And how often is my heart saddened, when I read in the countenances of those I love, that they too are weary and worn, and sigh for a better land than this.

Toil on, brethren, do not be disheartened; you shall, ere long, walk and talk with Jesus; soon you will wear that dazzling crown, which is promised the faithful.

Newfield, Ct.

From C. Goodrich.

Bro. Grant:—As some of the brethren scattered abroad may wish to know where I am, and what I am doing, I would answer—

First, I am stopping near Pleasant Valley, Ct.

Second, I am preaching the word part of the time, and part of the time I labor with my hands, in order that I may "provide things honest in the sight of all men."

If any wish my labors among them, they can address me at New Hartford, Ct., and I will visit them as the way may open and the Lord direct.

For the Crisis.

Idolatry.

The exceeding deceitfulness of sin is continually manifested in the ignorance of what constitutes idolatry in the sight of God, the object of the supreme love and worship of all intelligent beings.

It is indeed well understood, that to worship a golden calf, or to bow the knee to Juggernaut, is idolatry. How little, alas! is it understood and considered that every object whatsoever, which comes between God and the soul, taking that place in the heart which our Father in heaven rightfully claims, is an idol.

Men and women who express their astonishment at the stupidity of the heathen, who worship an image that has eyes which see not, and ears which hear not, trusting in the same to save them from evil, are themselves placing their supreme affections upon, and thus worshiping, various objects which are no more worthy of their highest regard, and can no more save them from real evil, than an idol of wood or stone. They are robbing God of the worship due unto his great and holy name, as much as the worshipers of Juggernaut or Jupiter-Ammon; while their sin of idolatry is greatly aggravated by their superior knowledge of the only true God.

The idolatrous Israelites, worshiping the golden calf, exclaimed, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." Professing christians practically, and in their hearts, say to their fine houses and their contents; to their stocks and to their lands, these be our gods in which we trust to preserve us from evil; for in these they do in fact trust more than in the living God. If the latter idolatry is more refined in the view of men, it is no less heinous in the sight of God. In both cases the only true God is rejected, and the creature preferred to the Creator.

Covetousness is idolatry. O that dying and accountable men and women "understood this, and would consider their latter end," when all the carnal objects on which they have set their affections, will fail them forever, and a righteous God, who now freely offers himself to be their eternal inheritance, will cast them off forever!

Dear reader, is the blessed and infinite Jehovah the object of your supreme love, and trust, and joy? Can you, by the renewing grace of the Holy Spirit, say in verity, "Thou art my portion, O Lord?" If so, cleave closer to him and serve him better. If you cannot in truth say this to the heart-searching God, who will not be mocked, O seek him now. "If thou wilt seek him with all thine heart, he will be found of thee, but if thou dost forsake him, he will cast thee off forever."

Henry Grew.

God is Love.

God is love! What a sentence is this! How wonderfully comprehensive! No uninspired man ever gave utterance to such a grand conception of the Deity. It is beyond the range of human thought, and bears in its very face the impress of Divinity. It is a volume in a word, a revelation of God in a sentence. Yes, in this simple sentence of only three words, there is more of God revealed, than in all the ponderous volumes of human philosophy that were ever written. The literary searcher might rummage the archives of Grecian lore and bring to light its choicest jewels; he might plough up the whole classic field, and disclose its richest treasures; he might dive into the very depths of the profoundest philosophy and bring up the rarest specimen of human thought; he might soar on the poet's wing to the utmost verge of fancy's domain, and cull there the fairest flower of imagination,—yet all these would bear no comparison to this precious gem of revelation. No indeed, if all the literature of Greece and Rome were condensed into a single sentence, idea, thought, or conception, it would sink into utter insignificance when compared to the lofty, sublime thought that "God is love."

It stands alone in all its grandeur, and the glimmering stars of human philosophy are eclipsed in its presence like stars in the presence of the King of Day. The deepest and most profound conception of the greatest philosopher never reached it—the highest imagination of the most gifted poet never soared to its sublime height. O, what joy it conveys to our ruined race—God is love! His works declare he is love. The same words are woven in strange bright colors all over this wide earth, and it is teeming with life and beauty; when we behold her rich and varied scenery, the surpassing beauty that everywhere meets the admiring eye,

"There's not a note in nature's choir,
Breathed from her waving grove,
Or swelling from her deep toned lyre,
But utters—God is love."

Her rich green carpet woven in God's own peerless loom, enameled by the fairest floral gems, and washed by the priceless waters of Heaven—her lovely diversity of hills and vales, of waving fields and majestic forests, towering mountains, and thundering cataracts, her smooth and majestic rivers, rolling on in silent grandeur to the mighty deep, her sparkling fountains, cool and clear,—when we behold all these, and a thousand other things, they inspire us with such a deep and profound sense of His goodness that we are constrained to say, "God is love." When we raise our eyes to Heaven's high dome, where the stars nightly hold their festival around the midnight throne, and fairly quiver in their royal beauty, the same glorious truth flashes upon us from every star-lit lamp that lights the great vault of Heaven. Those blessed stars, those radiant characters of light have been beautifully termed "the poetry of Heaven," and they are indeed poetry written by the finger of Jehovah upon the eternal sky, and he who cons them well may learn full many a high and holy lesson; and when the moon, nature's great globe lamp is hung on high—

"We read it by her silver light,
Upon the cloudy scroll of night."

But it is not in the visible creation that we behold the greatest evidence that "God is love." This earth in all its beauty is but a faint ray of his boundless goodness. The myriads of stars that deck the ebon brow of night are but atoms of light scattered from his beneficent hand. The sparkling galaxy that spans the vast arch of Heaven is but dust thrown from his chariot wheels. The moon is but a dim reflector of a single ray of his light, and the great sun that seems of such immense magnitude is but a globule of his glory.

It was love created man and stamped upon him the image of his God. Love called up this earth from chaos and fitted it up for his residence. Love planted the garden of delights and fed him with the fruits of Paradise. Love, infinite love came down to visit him in the delightful bowers of Eden. And oh! when he had sinned and fallen, it was infinite love redeemed him. Stupendous love! Who can comprehend it? A sea where all our thoughts are drowned. The nearest we can approach to love so divine is when, with overflowing hearts and streaming eyes, we contemplate the sufferings of the Son of God, when we feel the full force of the words which fell from his sacred lips—"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life."

We read it in the story of the cross; we see it in the man of sorrows, as he hangs upon the accursed tree, bleeding and dying for lost and ruined man; we read it in the whole of that fearful drama, enacted on Mount Calvary! every thorn in that bloody wreath repeats the tale in a whisper of anguish; we hear it in that dying groan, that severed the adamantine rocks, rent the vail of the temple, and summoned the dread earthquake which made those three crosses reel like "reeds in a tempest."

And oh! as we shall see it with glorified eyes in the [illegible] of the New Jerusalem. It will be written in letters of gold on the jeweled walls of the city, and we shall hear it in melodious accents in the matchless song of the redeemed, when in one eternal concert they unite to sing—

"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." Lizzie Armstrong.

Bible Order.

Bro. Grant:—I wish to ask Bro. E. Burnham some questions, to be answered through the Crisis, for my own and others' information.

1. What constitutes a church?
2. Are there to be Elders in every church, and what is their office, or duty?
3. Are there to be Deacons, and what is their office, or duty?
4. Is there to be a clerk?
5. Is there to be a treasurer?
6. Are their names to be recorded?
7. Is each church to be under pastoral care?

Obituary Notices.

Died, at the residence of her brother, in East Otis, Feb. 9th, 1859, Eunice, widow of the late Ezra Jackson, in the fifty-seventh year of her age.

The subject of this brief notice embraced the religion of the Bible in her eighteenth year, when she united with the M E. Church; and her life has been a living epistle, known and read of all men. She has, by precept and example, through her long life, exemplified the religion of the blessed Savior, denying self, and bearing the cross, doing the will of her Heavenly Father, knowing that only those that endure to the end shall be saved.

About four years since, at a series of meetings held in Otis Centre by Elder Grant, while the soul-stirring truths of the speedy coming of the world's Redeemer were proclaimed, her heart became deeply interested, and she was led to examine and embrace this glorious truth, and went forward with others in the ordinance of baptism, and took a bold stand for the truth, rejoicing in the "blessed hope"

Her health has been failing for some time, but her confidence in God sustained her till the last. Her work is done. A Mother in Israel is fallen. She is numbered with the dead, to rest till the last loud trump shall sound, and the mighty hosts of God's people shall come forth to Immortality. The Lord hasten it in his time, and may we be ready.

The occasion was improved by a deeply interesting sermon from Eld. S. G Mathewson, on the christian's only hope, the literal resurrection from the dead, before a large and attentive audience. David Bates.

Blandford, April 1st, 1859.

Fell asleep in Jesus, at Mt. Pleasant, Browne Co., Ill., April 6th, 1859, Sister Martha A. Raymond, wife of Bro. Charles Raymond, aged twenty-six years.

Sr. R. embraced Christ when eighteen years old, and joined the M. E. Church. She subsequently embraced the faith of the Advent of Christ, and immortality only in Christ, and was baptized by Bro Edwin Burnham, and joined the Advent Church at Walker's Neck. She died in a consumption. She suffered much, but was patient. The religion she professed sustained her in the time of affliction, and in the hour of death.

A kind husband is left to mourn the departure of an affectionate and truly pious wife, as also two small children, a father and mother, and a large circle of relatives. The church mourn the loss of a bright light; but they sorrow not as those that have no hope.

Sr. R. was very happy in prospect of future life. Just before she died, she exclaimed—"I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith, and in a little while I shall get the crown!" When asked about dying, she said she was willing to sleep in Jesus a little while; "but I shall soon awake to immortality."

The funeral was attended by the writer. Subject of discourse from Heb. 9: 27-28.

Moses Chandler.

Died, at Rutland, Vt., on the 21st of April, 1859, Sister Betsey E. Cheeney, daughter of Bro. Thomas W. and Sister Jane R. Cheeney, aged twenty-two years and ten months.

She died very suddenly of heart disease, at the house of Bro. Miller, to which place she had come only a day or two before to reside with them. She said she was willing to go, and thus in her dying hour gave evidence of her acceptance. She was a member of the Methodist church, but had embraced the Advent views under the labors of Bro. Grant. I attended her funeral in the M. E. house, discoursing from 1 Cor. 15: 26. Thus, one [illegible] of youth [illegible] health, [illegible] God, [illegible] resurrection.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Per steamship Africa, from Liverpool the 16th inst.

The Dresden Journal alleges its acquaintance with the fact that according to a recent counter proposal by France, which is also said to be seconded in other quarters, the Congress will assemble April 23, at Carlshrue, and commence operations by resolving on a general disarming. The statement per Circassian that Austria positively refuses to join in the Congress unless there is a previous general and simultaneous disarmament, is not confirmed.

Paris dispatches state that the progress of the negotiations for the Congress is very slow, owing to the great difficulties to be overcome.

The London News says it is just possible the Congress may prepare and embitter instead of averting a war.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald says there were reasons for believing Austria's proposals as to the points to be submitted to the Congress are wholly unacceptable to France.

The Paris Patrie says France cannot be expected to diminish her army, nor to send back a single cannon to her arsenals.

Thirty of the Neapolitan exiles have left England.

Lady Morgan, the authoress, is dead.

FRANCE.

All the French officers on leave have been ordered to join their ships forthwith.

Warlike materials are accumulating at Marseilles to an alarming extent.

Five steam frigates had gone to Algeria, it is supposed to bring troops back to France.

The Daily News' correspondent says, Lord Cowley and Count Walewski, after a long discussion, separated with the conviction that very serious differences of opinion exist between France and England.

Nine gun boats for the Adriatic are ordered to be made ready at Cherbourg without delay.

AUSTRIA.

Austria was willing to make important concessions to Prussia on certain points in dispute, and a perfect understanding then was considered highly probable.

Warlike preparations continued to be made by some of the smaller German States. The Bavarian army had been placed on a war footing.

The Times Vienna correspondent says that during the last few days several of the leading papers had openly declared that the Germans would not shed one drop of blood either for the maintenance of the special treaties or of the Austrian government.

ITALY.

It was reported at Rome that the Pope would protest against the European Congress.

Holland and Belgium are said to have concluded a treaty for mutual defence in case of war.

RUSSIA.

Advices from St. Petersburg state that a special commission has been formed to devise the best means of providing for the purchase by the liberated serfs of the fields they cultivate. The same letters add that the ukase for the abolition of serfdom will appear on the 20th September next, the day on which the Grand Duke Nicholas, heir presumptive to the throne of Russia, will have attained his majority of sixteen.

SARDINIA.

Count Cavour had returned to Turin, where he was greeted with a popular demonstration. Nearly 10,000 volunteers for the Piedmontese service have arrived here (Turin.)

Letters from Rome, Florence, and other towns of Italy announce the opening of numerous subscriptions for affording pecuniary assistance to the Sardinian government, and also that volunteers have been dispatched to Piedmont.

EGYPT.

The advices are favorable to the Suez Canal. Public functionaries were ordered to assist M Lesseps, and the Governor of Suez had been deposed.

COCHIN CHINA.

The attack on Saigon took place Feb. 17th, and was perfectly successful. Nine forts, strongly armed, were cannonaded and stormed. The French loss was small, but the enemy's was heavy.

LATEST.

At Paris, the Daily News says, the result of the second meeting of the Conference is that England, France, Russia, Prussia and Sardinia recognize the double election of Cenza. Austria and Turkey stand aloof.

A St. Petersburg despatch of the 14th announces that in consequence of a victory by Gen Wradgel, two thousand Circassians had come into the Russian camp.

The Times' Paris correspondent describes the aspect of affairs as so sombre as to justify the renunciation of all hopes of peace.

Five thousand more troops had arrived in Marseilles from Algiers.

Trieste, April 18.—The Austrian government has hired six Austrian Lloyd steamers.

Marseilles, April 18.—Several letters from Naples announce that the King, being on the 12th in a very suffering condition, the royal princes had been summoned in haste to Caserta.

LATER.

Per Steamship North Briton. Advices of the 20th ult.

SARDINIA.

The Daily News has the following dispatch:

Turin, April 19. At a Council of Ministers, held this morning, at which the king was present, it was resolved that in order to give Europe proof of the desire of Sardinia to remove the difficulties which delay the meeting of Congress, Sardinia yields to the demand of England and France, and accepts the principle of disarmament, the details of which she leaves to be discussed in Congress.

AUSTRIA.

All the routes leading to Italy are still covered with military convoys, and are monopolised for the public service.

The entire second Austrian Corps de Armee has left to join the army of Italy, and the nomination of their new field marshals is spoken of.

☞ The advancing experience of the christian is not so much like a chain of equal links added one after the other, but more like a tree in its successive stages of growth. Lines,

[illegible]

The rose that blooms beneath the rainbow's span,
Is but a shadow of the life of man!
But the human mind is an evergreen,
That falls but to bloom with the Great Supreme.

She is sleeping now a dreamless sleep,
Where the bright wing'd angels vigils keep,
Soon to awake at the voice of love,
To plume the wing for the realms above!

She has left on earth a broken band,
To journey on to the better land;
May they murmur not, but with souls serene,
Confide this loss to the Great Supreme!

The birds may sing in the spreading vine,
Through the long bright hours of summer time,
But she to the silent tomb has gone,
Sleeping till Gabriel's trump shall sound!

Her step is not in the flowery vales,
Where the morning blooms and the evening pales,
But soon will be, where bright angels beam
In the eternal smiles of the Great Supreme!

There, oh, there, in that blissful land,
May again unite this broken band;
To part no more in those joys serene,
[illegible] to bloom with the Great Supreme!

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 21.

MY DEAR SISTER:—You will pardon me if I relate another incident, one which came under my own observation, illustrative of the same truth referred to in my last epistle. God, for some wise purpose, no doubt, sometimes hides from the true christian and faithful laborer a consciousness of his divine assistance, and this not unfrequently opens the way for painful temptations and discouraging thoughts. We saw this illustrated in the case of Dr. Olls. But that other incident.

For weeks a sister had often bowed in secret, and poured out her supplications to her Father, God. Day after day found her approaching nearer and nearer to the divine presence—an heavenly attraction was drawing her spirit increasingly heavenward, and bringing her into closer, sweeter affinity with Jesus. Sometimes, while under this holy influence, an impression would come that God was preparing her to labor in a neighboring city. To this there seemed to her, however, insurmountable difficulties! Her acquaintance was very limited, and she knew of no place where she could visit sufficiently long to be of advantage. Not many weeks after, while on her way to visit friends in a town some ten miles distant, she stopped in the city referred to over night, and attended a class meeting. Before resuming her journey the following day, she received a very urgent invitation from the family where she was visiting, to spend a Sabbath with them on her return. The invitation was accepted.

Previous to attending the social meeting in the evening, she retired alone, and besought with much earnestness the aid of the Holy Spirit in giving her testimony for God. She asked to be directed in her thoughts, so as to present what was best adapted to benefit those whom she might address, and entreated God to speak through her with power and efficacy. She was deeply conscious of her utter inability to testify effectively to the heart without the "unction from the Holy One." During the progress of the meeting she arose, with a feeling of calmness and firm reliance on Him whose help she had implored. The subject that had been bearing upon her mind was that of Faith—appropriating, justifying, sanctifying faith. She spoke of the position necessary to be occupied before this faith could be exercised—pointed out some of the difficulties existing in the minds of individuals relative to its exercise, and endeavored to remove them.

While speaking, thoughts like these obtruded upon her. I do not have my freedom—God is not helping me. I am not speaking on the right point. These suggestions, to her view, embarrassed her exceedingly, and she sat down overwhelmed with a painful consciousness of an utter failure to present anything effectively to the people. Her testimony had been apparently devoid of the Spirit's influence—it had been lifeless, and no good could possibly result therefrom. She thought of the disappointment of her friends who had expected her to give a testimony that would tell for God and truth, and she concluded that they would never wish her to spend another Sabbath there.

Mortified and tried herself, she expected that they were also. She hung her head with grief, and no sooner had she passed out of the house, than the pent up tears began to flow. Friends endeavored to soothe her feelings, but in vain. In the morning, as soon as she awoke, her grief was renewed, but in an hour or two she found relief by a committal of the entire matter to God. She decided to return home by the first train of cars, thinking, notwithstanding former impressions, that she had mistaken her duty. [illegible] for her to spend the day with her. She accepted the invitation, and was soon informed that, although she had heard of her intention to leave that day, it had been on her mind all the morning to send for her. She asked her if she could not tarry all night. Yes, there was nothing to hinder. She then asked permission to have a meeting appointed at her house that night. To this she also assented. She dared not disregard these providences. Notices were sent out, and a few invited to spend the afternoon. Among others who came was a young lady, whose heart had been touched by the despised testimony of the previous evening.

That night she obtained perfect victory. It was a precious season. A sister invited her to spend the following day with her. She did so. This lady thus addressed her: "Sister ——, I believe God sent you here, and that he has a work for you to do. You are welcome to make my house your home for three weeks." Had not the providence of God now opened the way, and removed every obstacle? Her excuse had been—"I have no place where to remain, in order to labor for God." But now there was an open door. Invitations abounded. And that despised testimony, the occasion of so many tears, was the beginning. Said one, "It showed me just where my difficulty was in regard to believing." Said another, an aged disciple—"I never heard the way of faith so clearly illustrated before." A young man remarked that the sister told his case so accurately, he thought some one must have informed her of him. Another said that a knot had been cut which had long troubled her.

Thus it not unfrequently is with the faithful laborer. God withholds from their view the assistance which he affords, and permits Satan to tempt for a trial of their faith. There should not be a yielding to discouragement, nor a cessation from labor, because of these temptations, for the testimony seemingly put forth in weakness, is often the most effectual for good.

Yours in love, M. D. W.

Submission to God.

A LEAF FROM MY EXPERIENCE.

"Submit yourselves therefore to God."—James 4 : 7.

What an amount of truth is contained in these few words! What an evidence of man's depravity and alienation, that such an admonition is applicable. The great, the good, the wise God, has creatures, the workmanship of his hands, revolting from him! How strange, how grievous, how incalculably criminal! When one becomes convinced of the strength of the carnal mind, that is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be, no wonder their case seems hopeless, their condition lost, till Jesus manifests himself, mighty to save, even to the uttermost, all who come to God by Him.

For a few weeks past I have been favored in the providence of God with an opportunity of visiting and attending meetings at the Branch Mills, Palermo, where a work of grace is in progress, backsliders reclaimed, and sinners converted. The leading minister expressed an anxious desire to have a people raised up who would worship God in spirit and in truth. My heart responded amen and amen, what can I, or any one else desire more? Such a people come to the house of worship waiting on the Lord and inquiring, What wilt thou have me to do? They turn their eyes from beholding vanity, to commune with their own hearts, and listen with reverence to the voice of truth dwelling in them; whose work is to lead into all truth, and is in perfect harmony with the wisdom that cometh from above; and its dictates are obeyed without conferring with flesh and blood, or saying, I will wait till this or that is done—or I will pray and confess to God, instead of confessing to my neighbor, or vice versa.

Submission to God is the characteristic of the people who worship him in spirit and in truth. I am the clay and thou art our potter, is their motto. The Lord is their Law-giver—the Bible the depository of his revealed will. Bless the Lord, O my soul, for the light that shines on the path that leads me to the Lamb.

The last year has been one of special favor and grace bestowed on me by our heavenly Father. As I have more studiously attended to the instructions of our Divine Redeemer, his character, as the Son of God in his humiliation, has been developed in great loveliness: and the more I learn and know of him, the more I love, and the more I desire to be like him. The more his Spirit dwells in my heart, the more deeply I feel for others' woes, especially for those that come by not submitting to God. There are evils all must endure while the curse remains, but the blessed truth makes people free. And the truth the people so much need in this day is hidden from the multitude by the traditions of men. This is a sore evil.

I attended a number of funerals in the winter. Relatives and friends were carried to the grave. Minds were thoughtful, hearts were tender. I thought how much good truth would do them. My heart [illegible] was moved with compassion. I wept [illegible] for the dead, but for the living. [illegible] anxious inquiry.

I commenced going to meeting where I once had a standing—was cordially welcomed, urged to take a part. At length the Lord gave me utterance. It was at a quarterly meeting. Some of the ministers were strangers. I felt the power of the Gospel, and the Spirit led me to speak of those things only which they profess to believe, namely, the efficacy of the Gospel in taking away not only sin, but the love of sin.

The next Thursday evening the Life and Death question was the minister's subject. I felt crushed because truth was trampled upon. But God gave me a quiet spirit. I was as careful to obey and keep still as I was before to speak.

The next morning the Lord comforted me with his Spirit and word in an unusual manner. It was none of my seeking after. The first text was from Isa. 46 : 9, 10.—"I am God and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, . . . saying, my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." God loves the truth better than I can. He will take care of it. What has he declared from the beginning?

Second text,—Gen. 3 : 15.—"I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel." I thought of the enmity between the natural seed of the woman and the snake—in killing it, the head is always aimed at; and God teaches us his truth by familiar figures. Christ, the seed of the woman, shall bruise Satan's head.

Third text,—Rom. 16 : 20.—"And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly."

Fourth text,—Heb. 2 : 14.—"Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil."

Fifth text,—1 John 3 : 8.—"For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the Devil."

Fifth text,—1 Cor. 15 : 26.—"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

Seventh text,—Rev. 20 : 10, 14, 15.—And the Devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone. . . . And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. . . . And whosoever was not found written in the book of life, was cast into the lake of fire." This lake of fire, whether literal or symbolical, is in the earth, according to Proverbs 11 : 31.—"The righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner."

Eleventh text,—Obadiah, 16th ver.—"So shall all the heathen drink continually, yea, they shall drink, and they shall swallow down, and they shall be as though they had not been."

Fourth text,—Rev. 5. When John saw in vision the Son of God, and the company who sung the new song and the number of them, he adds, 13th verse,—"And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever." These texts came in less time than I have been writing them, with such light and love and power, that I exclaimed, A clean sweep surely of the Devil and all his works and all his servants from all God's dominions.

As I have read but little on this subject, this manner of God's teaching me right from the fountain of truth, by his Spirit, settles and roots and grounds me in the truth, and also that it is the "great question" for the present time. How precious the thought that the great Jehovah, the only true and self-existent Being, purposes (and those purposes revealed) to remove all things that have or ever will mar the works of his hands. "O that men would praise the Lord for his wonderful works to the children!" E. J. MARDEN.

Home Missions.—No. 1.

To the brethren in Maine I address this series of articles particularly, yet others may be stirred up to the same subject by them, if they have any stirring elements in them. The principle of combined effort for the advancement of any desired object needs no advocates to thinking, candid, and experienced persons. To such I am writing.

It is well known to some of you that a body of Adventists in Maine held several annual conferences in their early history as a people; that we then agitated the question of Missions; an interest was awakened, a sum subscribed, partly paid into the treasury, and expended. The thing was not well managed, for want of wisdom and caution; and although the effort was not lost, many were dissatisfied, and we gave up that effort. With others, I have ever believed the object worthy of another trial and better success. Time has proved it so, by the successful experience of the churches in several other States the last few years. You and myself have read with interest and gratitude to God of the prosperity of the precious truths we are animated by, in the several reports which have been made, by means of missionary efforts in an organic capacity. I wrote a short article upon this subject last year, and then intended to write more, as the time for our next conference drew nigh, which I now do.

Though embarrassed and crippled pecuniarily, and obliged to use most of my time and energies to get my bread, yet I am not dead to the great subject that has stirred my heart and controlled my life these last fifteen years. Thank God, by mercy and grace I still cleave to the heart-searching theme, "Behold he cometh, go ye out to meet him." Trials, afflictions and conflicts only make it the more precious to me, and my heart yearns to see it more effectually proclaimed. There are means to do it, if well directed. Shall we make another missionary effort?

Yours in behalf of Christ,

I. C. WELLCOME.

The Stream of Life.

I.

Oh, silvery stream of life's bright day!
Why hasteth thou so swift away?
For thee, the rains of autumn fall;
For spring's soft showers thy murmurs call;
The summer dews for thee distil,
For thee bounds many a gushing rill
Along the woodland's flowery swell,
Through many a pleasant winding dell.

II.

Oh, silvery stream! thy summer's day
Has no returning bloom of May;
But one brief spring illumes thy flight,
No morning breaks thy autumn night;
The murmuring rills that feed thy stream,
Have shrunk amid life's transient gleam;
And where thy rippling currents sweetly flowed,
The dust of ages mars that lengthened road.

"Crisis," and its New Dress.

I concluded on the receipt of the enlarged sheet of the "Crisis" and its new dress, I would express my gratitude by increasing its circulation, and thereby send you substantial aid to defray the expenses of its improvements. I shall continue my efforts in this direction. I want the paper placed on a sure footing and above board. It is what we need. And what could we do without such an organ? One that breathes the spirit of the Gospel. One that minds its own business. One that speaks frankly, yet in kindness. One that seeks the best interests of mankind. One free from worldly policy. One that has the work of God, near its heart. One that is not ashamed of truth, if it is unpopular. One that will not abuse its best friends. In a word, a paper that God will own, and his blessing attend, as it goes forth into the dark corners of earth.

May the "Crisis" ever be a blazing light to the pilgrim—bread to the hungry—water to the thirsty—consolation to the mourner—liberator to the captive—elevating to the degraded—a trumpet to the careless and reckless—a nucleus for Christians—a harbinger of the speedy coming Kingdom—and last, yet not least, a battle-axe against the God-dishonoring, Christ-degrading and soul-destroying doctrine of an endless hell-fire for the wicked. Selections.

The Separation.

The following thrilling extract is from an address of Massillon, before an audience made up principally of members of the French court:

I confine myself to you, my brethren, who are here assembled. I speak not now of the rest of mankind; I consider you as though you were the only inhabitants of the earth; and this is a thought which occupies and alarms me. I suppose this to be your last hour, and the end of the world; that the heavens over your head are opening, Jesus Christ appearing in his glory in the midst of this Church, and that you are assembled here to meet him; and like trembling criminals, about to receive sentence, either of pardon or of eternal death; for it is to no purpose to flatter yourselves; you will all die such as you are this day; all these desires of a change which amuse you, will amuse you till you come to your death-bed; it is the experience of all ages. All the change that you will then find in yourselves will, perhaps, be a longer account to give up than you would now have; and you may almost decide from what you would be at the present moment, if called to judgment, what will be your condition when called out of life.

Now I ask you, and, struck with tears, I ask the question, not separating in this matter my lot from yours, and placing myself in the same disposition as I wish you to be in, I ask you then—if Jesus were to appear in this Church, in the midst of this assembly, the most august of any in the world, to judge us, to make the just discrimination between the sheep and the goats, do you think the greatest number of us who are here would be placed on his right hand? Do you think that there would be an equal number on each side? Do you think that the number of ten righteous only, which the Lord could not find in five cities, would be found amongst us? I ask you this question. Thou only, O God, knowest thine own! But if we know not who belong to him, we know at least that sinners do not belong to him. Now, who are believers? Titles and dignities are of no account; you will be stripped of them in the presence of Jesus Christ. Who are they? Many sinners who would not be converts; and still more wish for it, and yet defer the time of their conversion; many others who, after their supposed conversion, relapse into their former faults; and lastly, a great number who do not think they need any conversion; these are the reprobates. Retrench from this holy assembly these four sorts of sinners: for at the great day they will be cut off from it: and now ye righteous, make your appearance. Where are you? Remnant of Israel, go to the right! Ye who are the wheat, and belong to Jesus Christ, separate yourself from this chaff, which is appointed for burning. Oh, Lord, where are thy people, and what is left for thy possession?

A Worldly Element in the Church.

It ought to be a subject of serious reflection, and some anxiety, to all true christians, as to how far the spirit of the world threatens to undermine the stability, purity, and peace of the church. Certainly there is sufficient cause of alarm in the prevailing tendencies to the love of show, and conformity to what are called popular ideas among professing christians; but the danger of all error lies not so much with the people as with those whose duty it is to instruct the people. All corruptions in the doctrine and practice of the church have either had their origin in its teachers and ministers, or have been sustained and propagated by them. There is another important fact which ought not to be lost sight of—and that is, that the downward progress of the church is not usually perceptible to those who move along with the current; and hence the character of the progress awakens no alarm until the results are felt in the degradation and ruin which follow.

It may be useless just now to attempt to rouse attention to certain evils which are rife among us, without causing our special wonder. But he must be a faithless watchman who does not see that the spirit of the world is taking fast hold upon the church, and assimilating it to itself. Among the instruments it uses with great power and success is the secular press. The use of this for religious notices is of doubtful propriety under any circumstances; but when it is made the means of sensation advertisements, puffing, and various forms of display, what can be expected but that the love of show and worldly pride should become the motives of minister and people? We have not time to dwell upon this subject. We can only call attention to it. Its consequences are daily developing in their effect upon the spiritual health of the people, and upon the physical health of the minister. The noise, competition, and constant busy whirl which characterize many churches of this day, are breaking down their piety, and the physical power of their pastors. There is little time or opportunity given for the cultivation of the virtues of humility, and a meek and quiet spirit. Indeed, there are so little encouraged amidst the noise and pageantry of what we call religious movements, that he who would determine to live above the world, and in communion with God, must retire from the ministry of the church to more quiet retreats. Many of our ministers are, even now, forced to this retirement, and, unless we take the alarm, more will follow.—Intelligencer.

The Minister's Chastening.

"Ye shall indeed drink of my cup."—Matt. 20 : 23.

Lord, ask not this!
I could give up my dreams, my youth, my life,
But now there comes an agony of strife
Too fearful for my crushed and trodden soul.
This is the last,—must I give up the whole?
All that is dear!

Oh Lord, not this!
I could give up ambition's longed for prize,
Life's pride, the beauties that delight my eyes;
Without a pang I yielded hope of wealth,
And throb by throb has gone my heart's best health.
Must this go too?

Not this, I pray!
Thy minister, I need it for thy cause;
All else I give without a sigh or pause;
Lord, stay the stroke that would o'erwhelm with shame—
All else I give, but spare me my good name.
Oh, take not this!

My Savior said:
Canst thou not taste of that which I drank up,
What else could fill my follower's bitter cup
But scorn, and scoffing, and the hate of foes,
Such as pursued me to the shameful close?
Bear this for me!

Prayer.

What a world is the world of prayer!—what an invisible but all-powerful tie is that of beings mutually, known or unknown, praying together or separately for each other! It has always seemed to me that prayer, that instinct so true of our powerless nature, was the only real force, or at least the greatest force of man! Man cannot conceive its effects,—but what does he conceive? The want which drives man to breathe, proves alone to him that air is necessary to his life. The instinct of prayer proves also to the soul the efficacy of prayer; let us pray then! And thou, O God, who hast inspired this marvellous communication with thyself, with beings and with worlds invisible, thou, O God, hear us favorably! let thy benignity surpass our desires.

But prayer was not invented: it was born with the first sigh, with the first joy, the first sorrow of the human heart; or rather, man was born to pray; to glorify God, or to implore Him, was his only mission here below; all else perishes before him, or with him; but the cry of glory, of admiration or of love which he raises towards the Creator, does not perish on his passing from the earth:—it re-ascends, it resounds from age to age in the ear of the Almighty like the echo of his own voice, like the reflection of his own magnificence. It is the only thing in man which he can exhale with joy and pride, for this pride is a homage to him to whom alone homage is due—the Infinite Being.—Ex.

Hope of Deliverance.

"For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."—Rom. 8 : 18.

My feet are worn and weary with the march
O'er the rough road and up the steep hill side;
O, city of our God! I fain would see
Thy pastures green, where peaceful waters glide.

My hands are weary, ever toiling on,
Day after day, for perishable meat;
O, city of our God! I fain would rest,
I sigh to gain thy glorious mercy-seat.

My garments, travel-worn and stained with dust,
Oft rent by briars and thorns that crowd my way,
Would fain be made, oh Lord, my righteousness!
Spotless and white in heaven's unclouded day.

My eyes are weary looking at the sin,
Impiety and scorn upon the earth;
O, city of our God! within thy walls
All, all are clothed again with thy new birth.

My heart is weary of its own deep sin,—
Sinning, repenting, sinning still again;—
When shall my soul thy glorious presence feel,
And find, dear Savior, it is free from stain?

Patience, poor soul! the Savior's feet were worn;
The Savior's heart and hands were weary too;
His garments stained, and travel-worn and old,
His vision blinded with a pitying dew.

Love thou the path of sorrow that he trod;
Toil on, and wait in patience for thy rest;
O, city of our God! we soon shall see
Thy glorious walls,—home of the loved and blest!

Every Man's Autobiography.

In the Spanish Gallery of the Louvre, at Paris, there hangs a celebrated picture by Murillo, founded on an old legend, which represents that a certain monk was called to die, when engaged in writing his own biography. Grieved at the abrupt termination of his unfinished task, the fiction goes, that he sought and obtained permission to return to the earth to complete his work. Wonderful is the power with which the artist has embodied the conception. There is the monk seated in his cell, intent on his solemn toil. It is not the ghastly face and form of the dead, but the conception of a man who has been dead, and who has returned etherialized and vivified through and through with the life and motives of eternity.

That legendary fiction will have no reality with any. No one who goeth hence returns to finish the work of life. But there is intensity of motive enough in the sober truth that every man is actually engaged, day by day, in writing that autobiography which neither time nor eternity will efface. It may be written in high places or in low, in public remembrance or in the honest heart of domestic affection; but we are writing fast, we are writing sure, we are writing for eternity. Happy is he who, through the grace of God assisting him, records such lessons of kindness, truth and wisdom, that when he is gone he will be held in grateful remembrance—happier still to have one's name written in the Lamb's Book of Life, and when every memorial and monument of his earthly history has perished, he may ascend with the Son of God to honor, glory, and immortality.

"THIS IS FOR YOUR HEALTH."—Paul.

Education of the Lungs.

To educate is to develop. It is, as the Scriptures would express it, to train up. Merely to instruct is but a small part of education. The body may be educated as well as the mind and heart. The lungs may be educated as well as the rest of the bodily frame. * * * * The mother or the nurse, during the earliest days of infantile life, is educating the lungs. I have seen this infantile education so misapplied as to render the child's breast bones, in shape, more like the keel of a vessel than like a suitable cavity for the lungs. Some undertake to tell us that the breast, in these cases, will come into shape again, but this is very doubtful. In any event, it is better to train up a child physically, no less than morally, in the way in which he should go, that, when he is old, he may not depart from it. Much may be done, in the way of developing and strengthening the lungs, by beginning early and persevering through infancy and childhood. * * * * If the young were taught, from the first, to breathe freely, and to make it a part of their duty to expand their lungs; and if what we believed to be a duty, were enforced by a steadily consistent example, we should have fewer lung diseases than now. In truth, I have very little doubt that it is in this way, principally, that the horrors of pulmonary consumption are to be removed from our otherwise happy and healthy country. Children should, from the very first,—whether in speaking, singing, or reading,—be accustomed to keep their lungs inflated. * * * *

The German physicians are even wont to say, that singing will cure pulmonary consumption, without any other aid. Certain it is, whatever may be our theories, that much speaking, and loud reading and singing, requiring, as they do and must, a good deal of inflation of the lungs, will do much to preserve this part of the human house in good repair, if not to break up incipient disease.

Let me say, in passing, it is a doctrine of immense importance, that everybody can and should sing. Not every one can read well. With proper training, however, I do not know but as large a proportion of mankind could sing well as read well. An old friend of my father used to say that every one who could call his domestic animals, could sing. But, because there are some who cannot read well, after all their painstaking, do we therefore refuse to instruct them? Is not the effort so much the more necessary? Perhaps, too, the lungs of those who cannot read or sing quite so well as others, may be as much benefited by our efforts to train them in the way they should go, as their lungs would be who should rival the nightingale. Let me say, also, that reading aloud, in order to be most beneficial to the lungs, should be, as it were, set to music. An ingenious parent or teacher may comprehend my meaning fully enough to take the needful hints. Good reading is music. And a proper graduation of the voice during the exercise should carry us—does often carry us—through four, six, or eight notes of a scale that might be formed, and made of essential service.

All this, however, though of vast importance, would fall short of accomplishing the great work of educating the lungs to the highest pitch of health and power. They must have the pure air. And the reading, speaking, and singing, I have mentioned, will be doubly valuable if we are kept filled with the pure element, just as God gives it forth from his own great laboratory. Would that the Peripatetic method might be revived once more! Would that half we do, in connection with the family and the school, were done out of doors! Has geology nothing to tempt us abroad, where heaven's best social treasures are? Have botany, zoology, and anthropology no temptations? Have scientific agriculture and horticulture none? Has art no features we wish to study or explore? Is there nothing in the mechanical world, beyond the smoke of our own chimneys and the limits of our own homestead? We are apt, some of us, especially the aged and the conservative, to place the golden age in the past. But if there is to be a golden age in the future, as prophecy would seem to imply, it must be in a future where high, bounding effort, amid heaven's own sunshine and pure air, expands and swells the chest to a size quite beyond the narrow contracted, thoracic cavities of the great mass of those who now occupy our schools, our colleges, our factories; ay, and to a very great extent our parlors and sitting-rooms.

For my own part, I expect happy results to our race,—especially in the way of invigorating the lungs,—from the almost universal custom of swimming once or twice a day; from sawing and splitting wood; and, by those who are equal to the task, from spading, shoveling, trundling the wheelbarrow, etc. * * * *

To improve the condition of feeble lungs,—to educate, as it were, this department of our system, broken down as it too often is,—several ingenious instruments and plans have been devised and scattered all over society. Those most worthy of note are Ramadge's air-tube, and Stewart's exercises. Ramadge is a distinguished medical man of the old world. Stewart is a mechanic of Troy, N. Y. Ramadge's air-tube is a small pipe, so constructed that a small valve prevents the air from going through it in one direction as rapidly as in the other. You place one end of it in your mouth, and inhale the air through it; but, when you wish to throw out your breath through it, the passage is slow and difficult. Your lungs, having been once filled, are therefore kept expanded longer than they would be otherwise.

Stewart accomplishes the same thing, and much more, without any other instrument than that with which the Creator has furnished us. He requires us to inflate the lungs as much as possible, and then retain the whole mass of air in them as long as we can; and in the mean time to rise on our toes and then depress the body suddenly, with a jerk, in order, as he says, to shake or force the air in their cavities into the remotest of their cells, and fully expand them. Both these modes have their excellencies, but the last is the most natural, and can be practised by anybody, in any circumstances. The tube is never mislaid or lost. Every child whose lungs are feeble should be taught this exercise. Of course, the jerking motion should be repeated a considerable time.—Dr. Alcott.

Eye-Sight.

Milton's blindness was the result of overwork and dyspepsia.

One of the most eminent of the American clergy having, for some time, been compelled to forego the pleasure of reading, has spent thousands of dollars in vain, and lost years of time in consequence of getting up several hours before day, and studying by artificial light—His eyes never got well.

Multitudes of men and women have made their eyes weak for life by the too frequent use of the eye-sight, in reading small print, and doing fine sewing. In view of these things, it is well to observe the following rules in the use of your eyes:

Avoid all sudden changes between light and darkness.

Never begin to read, or write, or sew, for several minutes after coming from darkness to a bright light.

Never read by twilight, or moonlight, or on a very cloudy day.

Never read or sew directly in front of the light, or window, or door.

It is best to have the light fall from above, obliquely over the left shoulder.

Never sleep so that, on first waking, the eyes shall open on the light of a window.

Do not use the eye-sight by light so scant that it requires an effort to discriminate.

Too much light creates a glare, and pains and confuses the sight. The moment you are sensible of an effort to distinguish, that moment leave your reading, and take a walk or ride.

The eye-sight is worth preserving, and by the observance of these simple rules, we may retain it.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 22.

MY DEAR SISTER:—There is another temptation that too frequently finds lodgment in the heart of the christian who has not as yet attained to "perfect love," because there still remains, in the heart not wholly sanctified, a tendency, though subdued, to acquiesce in the temptation. I refer to the disposition to "resist evil"—to retaliate—to seek to injure those who have injured us, instead of "enduring grief, suffering wrongfully."

There are those who can say with David—"For my love, they are my adversaries," but his refuge should also be theirs—"but I give myself unto prayer." Does he "become a stranger unto his brethren, an alien unto" his "mother's children?" Is he the "song of the drunkards," and a "proverb unto them that sit in the gate?" He says—"But as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O Lord, in an acceptable time." Yes, when thus estranged, thus reproached, he finds it to be an "acceptable time" to pray. Are "the mouth of the wicked, and the mouth of the deceitful opened against" him—do "they speak against" him "with a lying tongue?" Do "they fight against him without a cause?" Do "they bend their bows, and shoot their arrows, even bitter words?" Do they "shoot in secret," and "lay snares privily?" Do they wrest his words, and mark his steps, while they wait for his soul? What is his language? "Truly my soul waiteth upon God: from him cometh my salvation. He only is my rock and my salvation: he is my defence. I shall not be greatly moved." "Though I walk in the midst of trouble, thou wilt revive me: thou shalt stretch forth thine hand against the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall save me."

When his greatest enemy was in his power, with true nobleness of heart he spared his life. He would accept deliverance from none but God, unto whom he had fully and trustingly committed his cause. It is an example worthy of imitation. In the person of Jesus Christ, we have a still brighter illustration of patient endurance of grief, suffering wrongfully. Never was his voice raised in self-vindication. Never did he seek to injure his enemies, but he prayed for them.

When the unjust accusation falls to our lot—when our words are wrested, and perverted to our injury—when unfair representations are made, calculated to hinder our usefulness, or cut off from us the sympathies and friendship to us so dear, there is nothing but "perfect love" reigning in the heart, can keep the tongue in silence, and lead us to "love our enemies," and to pray for those who despitefully use us, and persecute us. And when these afflictions come, not from an avowed enemy, but a professed friend, thereby adding a sharper sting to the poisoned arrow, it seems hard to bear—nature writhes in agony from the wound inflicted, and great must be the manifestation of that grace which can triumph over such assaults, by patient endurance, and acts of kindness in return. The natural impulse of the heart is to resent an injury, and repel an insult. The gospel, however, teaches a higher morality—a morality attained by the most thorough regeneration of man's spiritual nature. It enforces upon us a divine law—demanding from us "blessing for cursing," doing good to them who despitefully use us and persecute us—feeding, clothing, loving our enemy. It demands passiveness under insults and injuries. "Resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on the one cheek, turn to him the other also." "Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath." "Overcome evil with good."

These commands are obligatory. They are not to be set aside at our option; and, if [illegible] of that grace which [illegible] the evangelical spirit, and imparts this spirit [illegible]

there shall be such a triumph, such an ascendancy of the "new man"—the higher life over the "old man," and the life of self, that the individual can be "joyful" as was Paul in all his "tribulations," rejoicing that he is counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake, and that his "light afflictions" are working out for him "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Yours as ever, M. D. W.

For the Crisis.

"Come, Quickly!"

Surely, I come quickly—even so come, Lord Jesus.

Oh, hasten, Prince!
Thy marble temple is with scoffers thronged,
Thy beauteous garden by deceivers trod,
Thy orphan children are oppressed and wronged
Upon thy sod—
And we have toiled all day,
Now faint at night we pray—
"Come, quickly!"

We rose at dawn,
And beside all the waters sowed the seed,
We saw fair "lilies among thorns," we stood
To rest beneath an apple tree, and "feed
Sweet in the wood,"
Still on the leaves fall tears,
Of hope, and joy, and fears.
"Come, quickly!"

When noon was high,
We turned us to the footsteps of the flock,
And fed "the kids beside the shepherd's tent."
Toward the shadow of the holy Rock
Our feet we bent;
We felt soft breezes blow,
But yet it was not thou
"Come, quickly!"

When evening came,
We walked within thy garden, and we heard
Thy music voice, and we were not afraid,
We heard its tone in every leaf that stirred.
We knelt and prayed
That we may meet thee there,
But Patience hushed our prayer
"Come, quickly!"

The time is long
And we are watching by the crumbling wall,
Waiting a herald's warning from thy camp,
Our garments with the heavy dews that fall
Are very damp.
Oh! weary is the night—
Centre of Love and Light,
"Come, quickly!"

Within are sounds
Of revelry, and mirth, and maddened tongues,
The flowers are dying in the festal hall,
Tones inharmonious mark voluptuous songs.
Their pleasures pall,
'Mid song, and dance, and shout,
Their lamps are going out,—
"Come, quickly!"

Ah! we would sleep—
But not till we can slumber on thy breast,
And feel the hand that opened up the fountain,—
Soon let us see thy fiery charger's crest
Over the mountain:
The moon and stars grow pale,
And human strength will fail,—
"Come, quickly!"

Reminiscences.

Here, within the Green Mountain range, lies a narrow vale, walled in by steep, precipitous mountain sides, presenting crag and cliff, with often a more towering spur, and here is a village, which, with all its faults and sins, has, at least, heard, like Capernaum of old, the word of the Lord concerning the Kingdom, and seen some of the mighty works which have been done in the land, by the preaching of the "Glad Tidings."

The great iron pathway, from the seaboard cities to the vast lakes, rivers, prairies, and cities of the West, runs through, alongside of the old river, whose murmur, subdued and solemn, seems not to have changed its note since the forests were removed from its banks. The same rain-washed and river-flooded road winds along across the sandy interval and under the mountain shadow. Winds howl the same, and, as of old, the sun tinges long the distant hilltop before it reaches the vale; while shadows anticipate the real eve as when in boyhood days I angled for the speckled trout in that old mill stream, or adjacent brooks, or cared for herds or flocks on mountain pasture, and often with boyish interest, to behold the larger world from the highest neighboring peak, or plunging into the deep forests, solemn with the gloom, I sought, gathering wild flowers or fruits, as the gladsome days went by—happy, but lingering—for what boy is content that the long years that wall him out from manhood should imprison him? All, alas! long, long since past.

Parts of the forest, some of the dilapidated old houses, a few old men and matrons, and some of the old brethren are here. The old stream rolls on; the rocks hang upon the hill-brow, as they did; but time in thirty years has made havoc on the one hand, if great advancement on the other. There is still a meeting of those who love [illegible] and the appearing of Christ, [illegible] glad news; some have returned to the ways of sin; and some, oh, sad thought! are lying in the unspeaking, unthinking grave.

The old brown house—the place where I was nurtured—is there; my father is there, an old man, tottering on the staff of age; my mother is there, but their large family is now scattered over this wide country.

In the old village cemetery, the change is great. Graves and monuments increase in number. The "place of graves" is getting full to repletion. There are chiseled the names of friends of youth and riper years, and of old men, who stood like patriarchs before me for many years, and of others, brethren in Christ, who sleep in Jesus till the resurrection dawns. There are the graves of sisters. There are infantile mounds, which brought a shade of sadness—till the brightness of promise gleamed over the dark realm, and the stranger on earth is lighted to the home of the restitution.

I asked my aged sire where he would lie in that receptacle of human mould. He stood looking away, then looking up; then, pointing with the tremulous hand of years to a retired corner, said, "There!"

In former years but little of the graveyard element has been employed in our expectations, but now we must look at it, so I looked, and passed!

Many, in passing, even on the "lightning train," would recognize the plain cottage where we once lived, and possibly think of an "altar with abiding fire." The pilgrim's home" to the children, and welcome rest to the toil-worn laborer, is there no more. The altar fire burns no more! Now, where many will remember to have found cheerful welcome and refreshing seasons in prayer, desolation reigns. Never again, in all human probability, will an "Advent home" exist under that roof. But brethren and sisters are there, and altars of truth and hope. The old school-house is there, and there the antiquated pilgrims of an ancient faith assemble to stir up minds of pure expectation.

Thinking intensely of my former preaching in that plain sanctuary, in the kitchen, in the grove, I turned away, and left to the day of judgment the result! May many have been fitted for the Kingdom of God. To many whom we used to see at our home in the valley, we have said the final good bye. Farewell to the battle there! We renew it elsewhere. Farewell to the scenes of trial and labor, the graves of friends, the wild home of my youth.

A dream came over my spirit as I slumbered near the ancient hearthstone, under the stately maples which, long years ago, I brought, saplings from the hill, one by one, and planted with my own hands, whose moanings led me back to scenes of animation and hope in the day's morn, whose noon I have now passed. Revivals were remembered, preachers were remembered. Prominent among them, Father Hastings, of blessed memory!—a pioneer of truth—I imagine I see him,—an original man, in appearance, in thought, in action, a marked and decided man, a positive christian man, one who felt the force of his calling, and left the power of his presence and work wherever he went. I see myself meeting him at appointments, a mere stripling, and making my early efforts, a "boy preacher," under his counsel. I see him on his flying journeys over the hills, up and down the mountains, and still, while strength lasted to stand, even with sepulchral voice, preaching Christ, the life. Think of it as you may, lessons were learned as lasting as life. I often in vision see him, as if twenty-five years had not rolled away. I hear the thunder of his natural, untamed, irresistible, logical eloquence, for with his vast descriptive and persuasive power, he was a logical man. Men will hold his memory still more precious, as the men of his stamp pass away.

He is gone! Others are gone who were with him, the rest are going, and who will make their places good? We hear now but few impassioned appeals such as burst then on the ears of wandering sinners or weeping mourners, and christians warring for the immortal crown. His arguments and illustrations were like apostolic persuasions,—"knowing the terror of the Lord."

Rest, man of God, till glory breaks on the death-closed eye of earth, and the deaf mortal ear drinks in anew the melody of immortal song, till thy voice shall aid the swelling chorus of the redeemed!

Adieu! old river—symbolical burial-place of myself and other preachers—of my children also—of many whom we hope to meet in a land where separation shall not be known. W. S. C.

The Nature of Death.—No. 2.

In my former article it was stated that some writers on this subject seemed not to have become sufficiently acquainted with it to publicly teach, write, and discuss it. This may appear to be a severe remark. I mean nothing of a severe character, but I would have every one see that truth often suffers more by unskillful friends, than by its most skillful enemies. That any one has the right to state his belief, or his opinion on a subject, I fully believe, and if asked, he should give what evidence he can for it, with meekness and fear; but for every one to enter discussion with opponents, or to set forth his views to a world of critics, illogically defended, and to attempt also, as he must, to meet and overthrow the objections of the deep-rooted and long established theology of Christendom, requires a more thorough knowledge of Scripture language, and its usage, and of the fundamental principles of the doctrine, as well as more natural ability, than some of us have. Therefore we should be moderate in our pretensions and modest in our address to others.

Let me illustrate. One learns that the dead are unconscious—that the wicked shall be utterly consumed. He declares it. This he should do. He is opposed by others—becomes zealous, and looks at the ideas he once had, but now rejects, with dignified horror, and uses the most excessive language he can call to his aid, to make his opponents see how odious their view looks to him, and what a tyrant God must be, if he is the author of such doctrine. He attempts to show that God's character is opposed to it. Human sympathy is opposed to it, etc., etc. Now it seems to me this course is injurious to the truth.

Again, one, in his zeal to promulgate the truth, publishes these ideas to the world. An objector takes them before an intelligent audience, or portrays them in the columns of a paper, and shows that there is no argument here, it is a tirade of excessive terms of odium, on what they think sacred, followed up by a system of collateral, or assumed reasoning, then tells his hearers that this is the foundation of our views. There may be good evidence and sound argument used by such, but this is kept back by critics, and the weakness of the writer used for the weakness of the subject.

Another wishes to show that there is much evidence for the doctrine, and writes a book, quoting almost every thing from Gen. to Rev., referring to "death" and "destruction," and uses it as evidence that his doctrine is true. An opponent replies, taking up passage after passage quoted, and showing they have no reference to the question at issue, and then asserts that we prove our views by such means. This he asserts dishonestly, it is true, but let us not put the tools in the hands of others to use against the truth.

Another denounces "everlasting punishment," because he has not yet discriminated between that and everlasting torment, while the opponent can show conclusively that the Bible teaches "everlasting punishment," and he asserts gratuitously that this means everlasting, or eternal torment. Now these forms of effort only injure the truth we wish to advance. We have seen so much of scandalous epithets, bad names, and perverted statements used against us by opponents, so many erroneous statements, and perversions of our use of terms, both in the pulpit and papers, that we ought to see and shun its sinful influence, and pray God to lead us by his Spirit, and keep us from following those pernicious examples, and seek to be guided by heavenly wisdom in all our labors, that God may be honored and his truth advanced.

A few plain texts of scripture, legitimately applied, are worth more than a hundred used improperly. "Let every tub stand on its own bottom," or every scripture have its own place. Let us study to learn the proper use of scripture, and then we shall not be teaching this, to-day, that, to-morrow, and something else next day, or one exposition of the same text this week, and another next. We may find new light, and be obliged to change views, but not rashly, nor often, if we study to show ourselves approved unto God, workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.

There are various productions on this subject ably, candidly, and modestly written, worthy the example of all who write and teach. I. C. WELLCOME.

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

Introduction.

For several generations past the great controversy in the Christian Church has turned on the question of a supposed eternal misery of the wicked, and a supposed eternal evil in the universe of God. Two parties have been arrayed against each other, separated by a twice infinite difference of opinion, inasmuch as endless bliss and endless woe are each infinitely removed, and in opposite directions, from man's original nothingness. Each party has also maintained, consistently with its confidence in the safety of truth, or at least in the hurtfulness of error, that its opinion is most conducive to the present and future welfare of man. And when we look to the lives of those who have held the opposing opinions with any devoutness, it cannot be denied that they have exhibited real, though sometimes different, graces and virtues.

Paradoxical, though it may seem, their twice infinite difference has turned on one point of agreement. They have held alike and in common the actual immortality of all human souls. The paradox vanishes at a single thought, and appears an essential and explanatory fact. For only as immortal beings can sinful men be eternally blessed or endlessly wretched.

But this common opinion of a general immortality is lately, more than for several centuries past, challenged and denied. It is claimed, by respectable and growing numbers, that man's immortality is not absolute, but dependent on personal goodness and virtue of character. The language of Paul, "to those who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, honor, and immortality, eternal life," is taken by these persons in a literal sense, which precludes the endless life of those who obey not the Gospel of Christ. This third opinion, commonly known as that of the final annihilation of the wicked, is now giving a triangular character to the Eschatology of the day. In its recent history it is not old enough to have produced much character of any kind, and will be judged somewhat by the existing character of those who embrace it. I think it suffers no disparagement by their general morals. And two hundred years ago, when it had lived long enough to allow some estimate of its proper fruits, we are told it was "matter of public notoriety that in respect to morals no sect had approached more nearly to the simplicity and strictness of the early Christians" than those who held this view.

It has fallen to my lot to offer this view instead of that of eternal suffering, in my book on "The Doctrine of a Future Life." There has been a little criticism on the part of my Orthodox friends, as if I had more ably combatted their view than defended my own. And I have met a few who told me they would sooner accept the Universalist faith than mine. The former fact, I think, is due to the aggressive character of my book, the latter, to the modern novelty of my opinion. But in view of both facts I am happy in my present opportunity to treat the question anew, to show—if my pen and the truth will allow it—that the Universalist view is untenable, and to say some things that more directly concern the view I hold.

But before I proceed to the argument I should meet certain prejudices of various kinds that may beset me.

1. I shall not by the phrase "Universalist faith" imply the opinion that all men, without respect to present character, enter immediately after death into a state of unsullied happiness. This notion has been ably opposed by those called Restorationists, and it is fast declining. Yet I find the term Restorationist inconvenient, because it implies the opinion that there is a fall in the history of the human race from which man is restored, and this opinion is disowned by many who believe that condition is ever the inseparable consequence of acquired character, that salvation is never forfeited or lost, and that Restoration is strictly impossible. By the term Universalist, then, I mean simply one who holds that all men will be at last both holy and happy.

2. I shall disclaim all opinion of a special or violent interposition on the part of God, in the final perishing of the wicked. My view is that the unrepenting sinner destroys himself; and though this self-destruction may not be complete in the death of the body, but in a second, [illegible]

This view also cuts off a frequent objection that final punishment is "vindictive," and that God is wrathful in a bad sense of the word. It also allows the opinion that physical death is not a crisis in the history of one's being, and that one who has not deliberately rejected God and virtue before the dying breath, may embrace God and virtue thereafter. Thus I hold, and have long held, the salvability of the heathen. The doctrine of an intermediate state without change, and of an appointed limit of probation on either side of the interval between death and resurrection, may still be true.

3. I speak of "persistently wicked" men. I do not assume that there are such, that being a part of the argument. Nor do I design to limit the power of God in this regard, but only to show that the soul may be so contaminated with sin that reformation would involve reconstruction at the hazard of personal identity; or that after a great sin, the power of faith in God's forgiveness, or the possibility of happiness along with a faithful memory, may be gone.

Having promised these things, I am prepared to state my general argument, as follows:

I. What are the prominent occasions of the Universalist faith?

II. Are there radically bad men? Or is there a "good in all" which may justly be called a redeeming virtue in the worst, and a nucleus of their reformation and salvation?

III. Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of man as a race, or of the good—or of those who shall become good—as a class?

IV. Is the immortality of the good as a class supported by the history, especially of early Christian doctrine?

V. Does this doctrine accord with a just philosophy, and with the sentiments of humanity?

By way of apology I will offer but a single word. The compliments that have been bestowed upon my book may raise undue expectations of my present argument. Suffice it to say, the book was the fruit of long meditation, and of several years' study, my present study must be begun and ended in not many days. And I am not as familiar with Universalist as with Orthodox opinions and history. The main advantage, if any, which I shall have over the opponent of my opponent in their late discussion, will be that of my position. I have not to maintain any tenet of eternal woe. For this advantage partly do I write, and on it partly shall I rely. In one view it is a disadvantage. My change from the Orthodox view was a great emancipation, and he who has changed once may change again. Who knows that one will abide in the halfway house, and will not some day rejoice in another great emancipation? We shall see. Meanwhile I shall deem the present essay as an introduction to the great subject, on which I may possibly, years hence, gratify the wish of friends at both ends of the street, by writing more fully.

CHAPTER I.

WHAT ARE THE PROMINENT OCCASIONS OF THE UNIVERSALIST FAITH?

Here is a delicate point of argument, for the causes of human opinion bear some analogy to the motives of human conduct, of which we ought not hastily to judge. I think, however, the argument is a legitimate one, for every cause enters into and qualifies its effect.—Nothing is thoroughly known until it is traced to its source. Moreover, in every important and extensively prevalent opinion, however erroneous, there is some element of truth whence its power is derived. And we shall labor at great disadvantage if we do not thankfully recognize all that is good, even relatively, in whatever we oppose. I think the remark of Coleridge is a just one, that "unless you understand a man's ignorance, you may be sure you are ignorant of his understanding." I shall waste my words if I do not know the paths by which my gentlemanly opponent and those on his side have come to their opinions. Only thus should any one pretend to offer himself as a guide into the right way.

1. One most obvious cause of Universalism is the reaction from the doctrine of eternal misery. It is easy to utter those two fearful words without thinking what they mean. It is almost as easy to forbear thinking upon them out of a suspicion that they mean more than can be true. But to ponder them, and then believe them, is hard indeed, and requires a high [illegible]

two more prevalent beliefs: "We are all Universalists when we lose our friends." And I can easily understand those who say they did not really believe in endless woe, even when they thought they did.

In this view I would say, that the Universalist faith is relatively true. But it will be a part of my historical argument to show that this reaction did not begin—as there was no occasion for it—until the latter half of the second century, when Platonic views of the immortality of the soul had begun to be received into the faith of Christians.

2. Certain views of the sovereignty and supremacy of God have, in various ways, promoted the Universalist faith. Men would fain comprehend all things in the world, including those which seem evil and wrong, under one system and plan of God. This desire seeks to get rid of the perplexity and mystery of sin.—It is of two kinds,—intellectual and moral; the first often attended with a deadness of the moral sense, and the second growing out of a tenderness and acuteness of the moral sense.—A word respecting each of these.

(1.) I frequently meet persons who say there can be nothing in the universe opposed to the will of God, for the very idea of God makes Him the absolute sovereign, disposing and ordaining all events. In accordance with this view they excuse any apparent wrong in themselves as the necessary imperfection of finite and infant being. And as they grow consistently cold and philosophic, they extend the same charity to their neighbors. "Whatever is, is right," is their motto. And though earth is so full of apparently needless suffering, and of such exquisite counterfeits—if not realities—of guilt, these people persuade themselves that the Infinite Being can not have allowed any thing which he would disapprove or dislike, and that all men, with greater or less completeness of moral mechanism, are gliding on toward the same final happiness.

This philosophy is doubtless a reaction, in part, from the higher forms of Calvinism.—When the Scripture texts that asserted the unity and sovereignty of God against the Persian Dualism, and the Greek and Roman Polytheism, were taken as charging God with all that men ever did, and when God was said to condemn some for the sake of glorifying others, so that He must appear to do evil that good might come, it is no wonder that all evil was denied, though at the hazard of denying with it all moral good, and of locking up the universe in necessity and fate.

This doctrine of necessity I name as a cause of Universalism, not because all Universalists hold it, but because I meet it more frequently now in their books and on their lips than elsewhere. I rarely meet one who makes a thorough and outspoken denial of man's free agency, who is not a Universalist. And I so often meet Universalists who scout the notion of free will and moral responsibility, that the two beliefs have become somewhat associated in my mind. Many of the persons I speak of are not members of Universalist churches; but some of them are such, and they find support in respectable books of Universalist literature.

2. But a sensitively acute moral sense, no less than a cold philosophy, may stagger at the mystery of sin, and deny its existence. For sin, as I take it, when reduced to its proper elements, is no mere misfortune or indiscretion; but it is doing wrong in the face of conviction both of duty and of interest, and with the certain prospect of bitter regret, availing or unavailing. Thus sin, as sin, is purely [illegible] causeless and senseless, a disjointing of the will from its just [illegible] ing havoc around if not within. But this anomaly is so horrible and horrifying that, like calamitous tidings, men dread to believe it true. They sometimes turn away from it, shocked and confounded, wishing not to look at it, or to think of it again; but hoping that the apparent mystery of human guilt may be resolved into some better mystery of divine goodness and omnipotent love.

Whether the mystery can be thus solved is a question to be considered in the next chapter. I need only remark here that Olshausen, alluding to the Universalist view, has well said: "Although this may often be owing to a sickly and morbid state of the moral feelings, yet it is [illegible] deeply rooted in noble minds; it is the longing of the soul after complete harmony in the universe." Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 22.

MY DEAR SISTER:—There is another temptation that too frequently finds lodgment in the heart of the christian who has not as yet attained to "perfect love," because there still remains, in the heart not wholly sanctified, a tendency, though subdued, to acquiesce in the temptation. I refer to the disposition to "resist evil"—to retaliate—to seek to injure those who have injured us, instead of "enduring grief, suffering wrongfully.

There are those who can say with David—"For my love, they are my adversaries;" but his refuge should also be theirs—"but I give myself unto prayer." Does he "become a stranger unto his brethren, an alien unto" his "mother's children?" Is he the "song of the drunkards," and a "proverb unto them that sit in the gate?" He says—"But as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O Lord, in an acceptable time." Yes, when thus estranged, thus reproached, he finds it to be an "acceptable time" to pray. Are "the mouth of the wicked, and the mouth of the deceitful opened against" him—do "they speak against" him "with a lying tongue?" Do "they fight against him without a cause?" Do "they bend their bows, and shoot their arrows, even bitter words?" Do they "shoot in secret," and "lay snares privily?" Do they wrest his words, and mark his steps, while they wait for his soul? What is his language? "Truly my soul waiteth upon God: from him cometh my salvation. He only is my rock and my salvation: he is my defence. I shall not be greatly moved." "Though I walk in the midst of trouble, thou wilt revive me: thou shalt stretch forth thine hand against the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall save me."

When his greatest enemy was in his power, with true nobleness of heart he spared his life. He would accept deliverance from none but God, unto whom he had fully and trustingly committed his cause. It is an example worthy of imitation. In the person of Jesus Christ, we have a still brighter illustration of patient endurance of grief, suffering wrongfully. Never was his voice raised in self-vindication. Never did he seek to injure his enemies, but he prayed for them.

When the unjust accusation falls to our lot—when our words are wrested, and perverted to our injury—when unfair representations are made, calculated to hinder our usefulness, or cut off from us the sympathies and friendship to us so dear; there is nothing but "perfect love" reigning in the heart, can keep the tongue in silence, and lead us to "love our enemies," and to pray for those who despitefully use us, and persecute us. And when these afflictions come, not from an avowed enemy, but a professed friend, thereby adding a sharper sting to the poisoned arrow, it seems hard to bear—nature writhes in agony from the wound inflicted, and great must be the manifestation of that grace which can triumph over such assaults, by patient endurance, and acts of kindness in return. The natural impulse of the heart is to resent an injury, and repel an insult. The gospel, however, teaches a higher morality—a morality attained by the most thorough regeneration of man's spiritual nature. It enforces upon us a divine law—demanding from us "blessing for cursing," doing good to them who despitefully use us and persecute us—feeding, clothing, loving our enemy. It demands passiveness under insults and injuries. "Resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on the one cheek, turn to him the other also." "Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath." "Overcome evil with good."

These commands are obligatory. They are not to be set aside at our option; and, if destitute of that grace which subdues the revengeful spirit, and imparts this spirit of non-resistance, we have need to cry unceasingly to God, until the perfect work is wrought within—until selfish nature no longer pleads for gratification, and until there shall be such a triumph, such an ascendancy of the "new man"—the higher life over the "old man," and the life of self, that the individual can be "joyful" as was Paul in all his "tribulations," rejoicing that he is counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake, and that his "light afflictions" are working out for him "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Yours as ever, M. D. W.

For the Crisis.

"Come, Quickly!"

Surely, I come quickly—even so come, Lord Jesus.

Oh, hasten, Prince!
Thy marble temple is with scoffers thronged,
Thy bounteous garden by deceivers trod,
Thy orphan children are oppressed and wronged
Upon thy sod—
And we have toiled all day,
Now faint at night we pray—
"Come, quickly!"

We rose at dawn,
And beside all the waters sowed the seed;
We saw fair "lilies among thorns," we stood
To rest beneath an apple tree, and "feed
Sweet in the wood;"
Still on the leaves fell tears,
Of hope, and joy, and fears.
"Come, quickly!"

When noon was high,
We turned us to the footsteps of the flock,
And fed "the kids beside the shepherd's tent."
Toward the shadow of the holy Rock
Our feet we bent;
We felt soft breezes blow,
But yet it was not thou.
"Come, quickly!"

When evening came,
We walked within thy garden, and we heard
Thy music voice, and we were not afraid;
We heard its tone in every leaf that stirred,
We knelt and prayed
That we may meet thee there,
But Patience hushed our prayer.
"Come, quickly!"

The time is long,
And we are watching by the crumbling wall,
Waiting a herald's warning from thy camp;
Our garments with the heavy dews that fall
Are very damp.
Oh! weary is the night—
Centre of Love and Light,
"Come, quickly!"

Within are sounds
Of revelry, and mirth, and maddened tongues;
The flowers are dying in the festal hall,
Tones inharmonious mark voluptuous songs;
Their pleasures pall,
'Mid song, and dance, and shout;
Their lamps are going out,—
"Come, quickly!"

Ah! we would sleep—
But not till we can slumber on thy breast,
And feel the hand that opened up the fountain,—
Soon let us see thy fiery charger's crest
Over the mountain;
The moon and stars grow pale,
And human strength will fail,—
"Come, quickly!"

Reminiscences.

Here, within the Green Mountain range, lies a narrow vale, walled in by steep, precipitous mountain sides, presenting crag and cliff, with often a more towering spur; and here is a village, which, with all its faults and sins, has, at least, heard, like Capernaum of old, the word of the Lord concerning the Kingdom, and seen some of the mighty works which have been done in the land, by the preaching of the "Glad Tidings."

The great iron pathway, from the seaboard cities to the vast lakes, rivers, prairies, and cities of the West, runs through, alongside of the old river, whose murmur, subdued and solemn, seems not to have changed its note since the forests were removed from its banks. The same rain-washed and river-flooded road winds along across the sandy interval and under the mountain shadow. Winds howl the same, and, as of old, the sun tinges long the distant hilltop before it reaches the vale; while shadows anticipate the real eve as when in boyhood days I angled for the speckled trout in that old mill stream, or adjacent brooks, or cared for herds or flocks on mountain pasture; and often with boyish interest, to behold the larger world from the highest neighboring peak, or plunging into the deep forests, solemn with the gloom, I sought, gathering wild flowers or fruits, as the gladsome days went by—happy, but lingering—for what boy is content that the long years that wall him out from manhood should imprison him? All, alas! long, long since past.

Parts of the forest, some of the dilapidated old houses, a few old men and matrons, and some of the old brethren are here. The old stream rolls on; the rocks hang upon the hill-brow, as they did; but time in thirty years has made havoc on the one hand, if great advancement on the other.

There is still a meeting of those who love God, the truth, and the appearing of Christ. A few humble souls gather together in the Lord; but the many are scattered, here and there [illegible] glad news; some have returned to the ways of sin; and some, oh, sad thought! are lying in the unspeaking, unthinking grave.

The old brown house—the place where I was nurtured—is there; my father is there, an old man, tottering on the staff of age; my mother is there; but their large family is now scattered over this wide country.

In the old village cemetery, the change is great. Graves and monuments increase in number. The "place of graves" is getting full to repletion. There are chiseled the names of friends of youth and riper years, and of old men, who stood like patriarchs before me for many years, and of others, brethren in Christ, who sleep in Jesus till the resurrection dawns. There are the graves of sisters. There are infantile mounds, which brought a shade of sadness—till the brightness of promise gleamed over the dark realm, and the stranger on earth is lighted to the home of the restitution.

I asked my aged sire where he would lie in that receptacle of human mould. He stood looking away; then looking up; then, pointing with the tremulous hand of years to a retired corner, said, "There!"

In former years but little of the graveyard element has been employed in our expectations; but now we must look at it; so I looked, and passed!

Many, in passing, even on the "lightning train," would recognize the plain cottage where we once lived, and possibly think of an "altar with abiding fire." "The pilgrim's home" to the children, and welcome rest to the toil-worn laborer, is there no more. The altar fire burns no more! Now, where many will remember to have found cheerful welcome and refreshing seasons in prayer, desolation reigns. Never again, in all human probability, will an "Advent home" exist under that roof. But brethren and sisters are there, and altars of truth and hope. The old school-house is there, and there the antiquated pilgrims of an ancient faith assemble to stir up minds of pure expectation.

Thinking intensely of my former preaching in that plain sanctuary, in the kitchen, in the grove, I turned away, and left to the day of judgment the result! May many have been fitted for the Kingdom of God. To many whom we used to see at our home in the valley, we have said the final good bye. Farewell to the battle there! We renew it elsewhere. Farewell to the scenes of trial and labor, the graves of friends, the wild home of my youth.

A dream came over my spirit as I slumbered near the ancient hearthstone, under the stately maples which, long years ago, I brought, saplings from the hill, one by one, and planted with my own hands; whose moanings led me back to scenes of animation and hope in the day's morn, whose noon I have now passed. Revivals were remembered; preachers were remembered. Prominent among them, Father Hastings, of blessed memory!—a pioneer of truth—I imagine I see him,—an original man, in appearance, in thought, in action; a marked and decided man; a positive christian man; one who felt the force of his calling, and left the power of his presence and work wherever he went. I see myself meeting him at appointments, a mere stripling, and making my early efforts, a "boy preacher," under his counsel. I see him on his flying journeys over the hills; up and down the mountains; and still, while strength lasted to stand, even with sepulchral voice, preaching Christ, the life. Think of it as you may, lessons were learned as lasting as life. I often in vision see him, as if twenty-five years had not rolled away. I hear the thunder of his natural, untamed, irresistible, logical eloquence; for with his vast descriptive and persuasive power, he was a logical man. Men will hold his memory still more precious, as the men of his stamp pass away.

He is gone! Others are gone who were with him; the rest are going; and who will make their places good? We hear now but few impassioned appeals such as burst then on the ears of wandering sinners or weeping mourners, and christians warring for the immortal crown. His arguments and illustrations were like apostolic persuasions,—"knowing the terror of the Lord."

Rest, man of God, till glory breaks on the death-closed eye of earth, and the deaf mortal ear drinks in anew the melody of immortal song; till thy voice shall aid the swelling chorus of the redeemed!

Adieu! old river—symbolical burial-place of myself and other preachers—of my children also—of many whom we hope to meet in a land where separation shall not be known. W. A. C.

The Nature of Death.—No. 2.

In my former article it was stated that some writers on this subject seemed not to have become sufficiently acquainted with it to publicly teach, write, and discuss it. This may appear to be a severe remark. I mean nothing of a severe character, but I would have every one see that truth often suffers more by unskillful friends, than by its most skillful enemies. That any one has the right to state his belief, or his opinion on a subject, I fully believe, and if asked, he should give what evidence he can for it, with meekness and fear; but for every one to enter discussion with opponents, or to set forth his views to a world of critics, illogically defended, and to attempt also, as he must, to meet and overthrow the objections of the deep-rooted and long established theology of Christendom, requires a more thorough knowledge of Scripture language, and its usage, and of the fundamental principles of the doctrine, as well as more natural ability, than some of us have. Therefore we should be moderate in our pretensions and modest in our address to others.

Let me illustrate. One learns that the dead are unconscious—that the wicked shall be utterly consumed. He declares it. This he should do. He is opposed by others—becomes zealous, and looks at the ideas he once had, but now rejects, with dignified horror, and uses the most excessive language he can call to his aid, to make his opponents see how odious their view looks to him, and what a tyrant God must be, if he is the author of such doctrine. He attempts to show that God's character is opposed to it. Human sympathy is opposed to it, etc., etc. Now it seems to me this course is injurious to the truth.

Again, one, in his zeal to promulgate the truth, publishes those ideas to the world. An objector takes them before an intelligent audience, or portrays them in the columns of a paper, and shows that there is no argument here, it is a tirade of excessive terms of odium, on what they think sacred, followed up by a system of collateral, or assumed reasoning; then tells his hearers that this is the foundation of our views. There may be good evidence and sound argument used by such, but this is kept back by critics, and the weakness of the writer used for the weakness of the subject.

Another wishes to show that there is much evidence for the doctrine, and writes a book, quoting almost every thing from Gen. to Rev., referring to "death" and "destruction," and uses it as evidence that his doctrine is true. An opponent replies, taking up passage after passage quoted, and showing they have no reference to the question at issue, and then asserts that we prove out views by such means. This he asserts dishonestly, it is true, but let us not put the tools in the hands of others to use against the truth.

Another denounces "everlasting punishment," because he has not yet discriminated between that and everlasting torment, while the opponent can show conclusively that the Bible teaches "everlasting punishment," and he asserts gratuitously that this means everlasting, or eternal torment. Now these forms of effort only injure the truth we wish to advance. We have seen so much of scandalous epithets, bad names, and perverted statements used against us by opponents; so many erroneous statements, and perversions of our use of terms, both in the pulpit and papers, that we ought to see and shun its sinful influence, and pray God to lead us by his Spirit, and keep us from following these pernicious examples, and seek to be guided by heavenly wisdom in all our labors; that God may be honored and his truth advanced.

A few plain texts of scripture, legitimately applied, are worth more than a hundred used improperly. "Let every tub stand on its own bottom," or every scripture have its own place. Let us study to learn the proper use of scripture, and then we shall not be teaching this, to-day, that, to-morrow, and something else next day; or one exposition of the same text this week, and another next. We may find new light, and be obliged to change views, but not rashly, nor often, if we study to show ourselves approved unto God, workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.

There are various productions on this subject ably, candidly, and modestly written, worthy the example of all who write and teach. I. C. WELLCOME.

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

Introduction.

For several generations past the great controversy in the Christian Church has turned on the question of a supposed eternal misery of the wicked, and a supposed eternal evil in the universe of God. Two parties have been arrayed against each other, separated by a twice infinite difference of opinion, inasmuch as endless bliss and endless woe are each infinitely removed, and in opposite directions, from man's original nothingness. Each party has also maintained, consistently with its confidence in the safety of truth, or at least in the hurtfulness of error, that its opinion is most conducive to the present and future welfare of man. And when we look to the lives of those who have held the opposing opinions with any devoutness, it cannot be denied that they have exhibited real, though sometimes different, graces and virtues.

Paradoxical, though it may seem, their twice infinite difference has turned on one point of agreement. They have held alike and in common the actual immortality of all human souls. The paradox vanishes at a single thought, and appears an essential and explanatory fact. For only as immortal beings can sinful men be eternally blessed or endlessly wretched.

But this common opinion of a general immortality is lately, more than for several centuries past, challenged and denied. It is claimed, by respectable and growing numbers, that man's immortality is not absolute, but dependent on personal goodness and virtue of character. The language of Paul, "to those who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, honor, and immortality, eternal life," is taken by these persons in a literal sense, which precludes the endless life of those who obey not the Gospel of Christ. This third opinion, commonly known as that of the final annihilation of the wicked, is now giving a triangular character to the Eschatology of the day. In its recent history it is not old enough to have produced much character of any kind, and will be judged somewhat by the existing character of those who embrace it. I think it suffers no disparagement by their general morals. And two hundred years ago, when it had lived long enough to allow some estimate of its proper fruits, we are told it was "matter of public notoriety that in respect to morals no sect had approached more nearly to the simplicity and strictness of the early Christians" than those who held this view.

It has fallen to my lot to offer this view instead of that of eternal suffering, in my book on "The Doctrine of a Future Life." There has been a little criticism on the part of my Orthodox friends, as if I had more ably combatted their view than defended my own. And I have met a few who told me they would sooner accept the Universalist faith than mine. The former fact, I think, is due to the aggressive character of my book; the latter, to the modern novelty of my opinion. But in view of both facts I am happy in my present opportunity to treat the question anew; to show—if my pen and the truth will allow it—that the Universalist view is untenable, and to say some things that more directly concern the view I hold.

But before I proceed to the argument I should meet certain prejudices of various kinds that may beset me.

1. I shall not by the phrase "Universalist faith" imply the opinion that all men, without respect to present character, enter immediately after death into a state of unsullied happiness. This notion has been ably opposed by those called Restorationists, and it is fast declining. Yet I find the term Restorationist inconvenient, because it implies the opinion that there is a fall in the history of the human race from which man is restored; and this opinion is disowned by many who believe that condition is ever the inseparable consequence of acquired character, that salvation is never forfeited or lost, and that Restoration is strictly impossible. By the term Universalist, then, I mean simply one who holds that all men will be at last both holy and happy.

2. I shall disclaim all opinion of a special or violent interposition on the part of God, in the final perishing of the wicked. My view is that the unrepenting sinner destroys himself; and though this self-destruction may not be complete in the death of the body, but in a second installment of death, I shall still regard it not as miracle, but the natural growth of the life divorced from an unloved God, languishing back to nought.

This view also cuts off a frequent objection that final punishment is "vindictive," and that God is wrathful in a bad sense of the word. It also allows the opinion that physical death is not a crisis in the history of one's being, and that one who has not deliberately rejected God and virtue before the dying breath, may embrace God and virtue thereafter. Thus I hold, and have long held, the salvability of the heathen. The doctrine of an intermediate state without change, and of an appointed limit of probation on either side of the interval between death and resurrection, may still be true.

3. I speak of "persistently wicked" men. I do not assume that there are such, that being a part of the argument. Nor do I design to limit the power of God in this regard, but only to show that the soul may be so contaminated with sin that reformation would involve reconstruction at the hazard of personal identity; or that after a great sin, the power of faith in God's forgiveness, or the possibility of happiness along with a faithful memory, may be gone.

Having promised these things, I am prepared to state my general argument, as follows:

I. What are the prominent occasions of the Universalist faith?

II. Are there radically bad men? Or is there a "good in all" which may justly be called a redeeming virtue in the worst, and a nucleus of their reformation and salvation?

III. Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of man as a race, or of the good—or of those who shall become good—as a class?

IV. Is the immortality of the good as a class supported by the history, especially of early Christian doctrine?

V. Does this doctrine accord with a just philosophy, and with the sentiments of humanity?

By way of apology I will offer but a single word. The compliments that have been bestowed upon my book may raise undue expectations of my present argument. Suffice it to say, the book was the fruit of long meditation, and of several years' study; my present study must be begun and ended in not many days. And I am not as familiar with Universalist as with Orthodox opinions and history. The main advantage, if any, which I shall have over the opponent of my opponent in their late discussion, will be that of my position. I have not to maintain any tenet of eternal woe. For this advantage partly do I write, and on it partly shall I rely. In one view it is a disadvantage. My change from the Orthodox view was a great emancipation, and he who has changed once may change again. Who knows that one will abide in the half-way house, and will not some day rejoice in another great emancipation? We shall see. Meanwhile I shall deem the present essay as an introduction to the great subject, on which I may possibly, years hence, gratify the wish of friends at both ends of the street, by writing more fully.

CHAPTER I.

WHAT ARE THE PROMINENT OCCASIONS OF THE UNIVERSALIST FAITH?

Here is a delicate point of argument; for the causes of human opinion bear some analogy to the motives of human conduct, of which we ought not hastily to judge. I think, however, the argument is a legitimate one; for every cause enters into and qualifies its effect.—Nothing is thoroughly known until it is traced to its source. Moreover, in every important and extensively prevalent opinion, however erroneous, there is some element of truth whence its power is derived. And we shall labor at great disadvantage if we do not thankfully recognize all that is good, even relatively, in whatever we oppose. I think the remark of Coleridge is a just one, that "unless you understand a man's ignorance, you may be sure you are ignorant of his understanding." I shall waste my words if I do not know the paths by which my gentlemanly opponent and those on his side have come to their opinions. Only thus should any one pretend to offer himself as a guide into the right way.

1. One most obvious cause of Universalism is the reaction from the doctrine of eternal misery. It is easy to utter those two fearful words without thinking what they mean. It is almost as easy to forbear thinking upon them out of a suspicion that they mean more than can be true. But to ponder them, and then believe them, is hard indeed, and requires a high opinion or a deep sense of human guilt and ill desert. I have met with ministers who confessed they did not dare to think of the eternity of misery, for fear they should doubt the fact. And it has been said very pointedly, and very truly, in the choice between the two more [illegible] Universalism [illegible] And I [illegible] they did [illegible] even when [illegible]

In this view [illegible] versalist faith [illegible] will be a part of my [illegible] show that this [illegible] there was no occasion for it [illegible] half of the [illegible] views of the [illegible] begun to be received into the [illegible] Christians.

2. Certain views of the [illegible] supremacy of God have, in various ways, promoted the Universalist faith. [illegible] fain comprehend all things in [illegible] including those which seem evil and [illegible] under one system and plan of God. [illegible] desire seeks to get rid of the perplexity and mystery of sin.—It is of two kinds, intellectual and moral; the first, often attended with a deadness of the moral sense, and the second growing out of a tenderness and acuteness of the moral sense.—A word respecting each of these.

(1.) I frequently meet persons who say, there can be nothing in the universe opposed to the will of God, for the very idea of God makes Him the absolute sovereign, disposing and ordaining all events. In accordance with this view, they excuse any apparent wrong in themselves as the necessary imperfection of finite and infant beings. And as they grow consistently cold and philosophic, they extend the same charity to their neighbors. "Whatever is, is right," is their motto. And though earth is so full of apparently needless suffering, and of such exquisite counterfeits—if not realities—of guilt, these people persuade themselves that the Infinite Being can not have allowed any thing which he would disapprove or dislike, and that all men, with greater or less completeness of moral mechanism, are gliding on toward [illegible] final happiness.

This philosophy is doubtless a reaction, in part, from the higher forms of Calvinism.—When the Scripture texts that asserted the unity and sovereignty of God against the Persian Dualism, and the Greek and Roman Polytheism, were taken as charging God with all that men ever did, and when God was said to condemn some for the sake of glorifying others, so that He must appear to do evil that good might come, it is no wonder that all evil was denied, though at the hazard of denying with it all moral good, and of looking upon the universe in necessity and fate.

This doctrine of necessity I name as a cause of Universalism, not because all Universalists hold it, but because I meet it more frequently now in their books and on their lips than elsewhere. I rarely meet one who makes a thorough and outspoken denial of man's free agency, who is not a Universalist. And I so often meet Universalists who slight the notion of free will and moral responsibility, that the two beliefs have become somewhat associated in my mind. Many of the persons I speak of are not members of Universalist churches; but some of them are such, and they find support in respectable books of Universalist literature.

2. But a sensitive acute moral [illegible] no less than a cold philosophy, may stumble at the mystery of sin, and deny its existence. For sin, as I take it, when reduced to its proper elements, is no more misfortune or indiscretion; but it is doing wrong in the face of conviction [illegible] of interest, and with the certain [illegible] of bitter regret [illegible] Thus sin, as sin, is purely [illegible] causeless and [illegible] will from its just [illegible] ing havoc around [illegible] this anomaly is so horrible and horrifying, that, like [illegible] believe it true. They sometimes turn away from it, shocked and confounded, [illegible] not to look at [illegible] but hoping that the apparent [illegible] human guilt may be resolved [illegible] better mystery of divine [illegible] nipotent love.

Whether [illegible] is a question to be [illegible] chapter. I [illegible]

[illegible] higher power may safely leave [illegible] [illegible] for the very reason that it is omnipo[tent]; for it is the character of [illegible] [illegible] to our freedom; and it is precisely [because] Omnipotence governs the world, that no infringement of universal order is to be apprehended from the personal self-[sub]sistence [or perverse action] of finite spirits."*

[illegible] whether Universalists do not [illegible] opinion of the "highest good," from which I should dissent, but [illegible] has contributed to their faith. The natural and just revulsion from the thought of eternal misery has given prominence to the question of happiness or misery; and it were no wonder if this question should displace that which is most important,—What is the highest kind of happiness or welfare? Is it not virtue? Is it not better to be worthy than to be fortunate? My noble opponent, and multitudes of Universalists with him, will at once say, "Yes, virtue by all means, and let the happiness take care of itself. First pure, then peaceable. Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness."—And the moral philosophy prevalent among Universalists, —that blessing cannot be sundered from goodness, that suffering is inseperable from guilt, and that the only forgiveness is the putting away of sin,—this philosophy has opposed the happiness-worship of which I speak. Still I doubt if many have not become Universalists out of a primary love of enjoyment,—here or hereafter,—to which moral worth is secondary. The same may be true of other religionists—this is religionism as distinct from genuine godliness, and it is an exceedingly subtle mischief in human nature. But is it not fostered more by the hope of a final happiness, in spite of any guilty abatement or postponement of that happiness, than by the doctrine that makes godliness the condition of the gain or total loss of the happiness?

I have watched the progress of phrenology, and have read some phrenological books. I am sure that multitudes of them make virtue the means and happiness the end, as if virtue were not intrinsically good. Many of them manifestly use words of moral and religious import in a merely physical sense, as Epicurus doubtless did when he wrote a book about holiness. In fact, much of the phrenological philosophy is strictly epicurian, making pleasure the highest good, and prudence the highest virtue. Of the phrenologists the great majority I think are Universalists—many because they have found in their science special and striking proofs of the goodness of God in the economy of Pain—of which hereafter. But many of them are Universalists on the happiness principle. This is no disparagement to those who are nobler minded; but the fact is proper to be named among the causes of the faith.

4. Important among these causes are various modern reforms, such as those of criminal codes, of prison discipline and of the treatment of the insane, and efforts in behalf of the intemperate, of abandoned females, and of vagrant children. All these reforms have grown out of a kindlier feeling of humanity, and they have all encouraged a higher faith in the salvability of those who seemed beyond hope.—Many who had been given up as lost have been recovered back to the paths of virtue. These reforms are an honor to our age, and no lover of his kind should discourage the least effort to save the fallen. They are our brothers and our sisters all. But the question still remains whether the cases of reformation form so large an induction as to warrant the inference of a general salvation in the holiness and blessedness of God's kingdom. This question I reserve for the next chapter, where I shall examine the doctrine of the "good in all," which is one form of the Universalist faith.

Philanthropic effort in behalf of the slave is another occasion of this faith. "God hath made of one blood all nations of men."—There is a human brotherhood, and a divine Fatherhood; and he is false to humanity and to piety who does not recognize and live out this truth. But whether the fact warrants the faith in question is to be considered.

6. Modern Spiritualism has doubtless promoted the belief of the final salvation of all.—I would not by any means confound the two doctrines; for the majority of Universalists may think no more of the supposed revelations of spiritualism than I do. And I shall have no occasion to discuss their merits. I simply name the fact that nearly all spiritualists are Universalists, and may refer to the opinions of some spiritualists when I come to the Scripture doctrine of immortality.

7. I think that Universalists have thought less than others of the infinitude of blessing implied in eternal life, and have thus been more ready to regard eternal life as the destiny of all. I think this is the fact, because I have frequently heard Universalists speak, as if it were unjust that the sufferings of this life were not compensated with endless joy; or as if the eternal life of [illegible] of all would be an unequal [illegible] trial. The reasons for the [illegible] have not [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] be [illegible] much [illegible] exceedingly important [illegible] of [illegible] more com[illegible] methods of vindicating the divine [goodness]. God is so good as to offer immortal glory to man, once and again. If man declines—refuses—rejects—scorns the offer, does he not deserve the pains of hell? How shall we escape endless pangs, if we neglect so great salvation? Such is the argument; and it is so plausible that I have heard of one Universalist preacher, who, in a pardonable vexation with the people for not welcoming his faith said, that if there was not a hell, there ought to be one. The Orthodox reasoning on this subject is indeed a monstrous perversion, which pressed,—its consequences involve the notion that, from the beginning and for ever, infinite evil has as good a right of possession, and may claim as fair a chance in the universe, as infinite good.

But, notwithstanding this fearful corollary, the orthodox man, compelled to offset an infinite good against an infinite evil, has got some benefit of the process. With this doctrine of election, or selection, he has thought intensively, has intently considered the "powers of the world to come," has reckoned the "unsearchable riches," until he has felt that they were past computation, and has contemplated the "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," until not only the heaviest temporal calamities should seem a "light affliction," but the hazards of deathless pain, however imminent, have seemed of little account.

The method of the Universalist, on the other hand, has been the extensive. He has enlarged the range of the eternal life, making it comprehend the entire host of the human race, and the whole range of God's intelligent creatures. The orthodox estimates have been those of magnitude; the Universalist, those of multitude. And I believe that many Universalists have sought to enlarge the bounds of the eternal weal, (they cannot make them wider than I shall,) because they have less fathomed its depths.

I think the early christians had an advantage here. With no eternal evil to fear for any, but deeming themselves called by God's free gift freely received, to be "heirs of glory," joint heirs with Christ of all that eternity can yield, they gained some sense of what is "length, and breadth, and depth, and height," in the computations of the celestial kingdom. Hence we cease to wonder that when fiery trials come, and not the strong men only, but delicate women and children of tender age were killed all day long, counted out like sheep for the butcher,—they thought they more than conquered, in the name of the Prince of life who had loved them unto death. The early christian martyrdoms served as a precedent for the courage of the latter martyrs, burdened with the tenet of eternal woe. Let that burden be removed, and the "great salvation" be great not as from an infinite evil, but as for an eternal and ever augmenting good,—and when poor, weak men, born of yesterday, shall begin to reckon the magnitude of the salvation, modesty may inspire some doubt whether all are thus saved. To be indeed "children of the Most High," "sons of God" "kings and priests" unto the Lord of all, may be so high an honor that an "election," or selection, shall not be a very unworthy doctrine.

(2.) The slight estimate of which I speak, is in part due to a reaction from a false heavenly mindedness. There are many professing christians who seem to do christian duties because they lead on to eternal glory. This is what Coleridge has well styled "the-other-worldliness."—trying to be godly, not because it is right, but because it will pay well. This is a gross perversion, the overworking and abuse of considerations that should be properly used,—for cherishing of gratitude and for comfort in tribulation. It is the counterfeit, doing harm to the genuine. And this spurious piety is specially mischievous when it assumes that the degree of future glory is never affected by one's attainments in virtue, but that the best and the worst of the saved will be at once and equally blessed when they pass the pearly gates—a doctrine which the parable of the laborers in the vineyard was never designed to teach.—This selfish and miraculous theory of future glory is justly repudiated by many Universalists, who find the law and the measure of happiness in virtue itself. Science and philosophy are discovering to men close and natural connexions between well doing and well being. —A very important gospel this—or rather a very important law of all gospel. But it may go too far with its doctrine of natural processes, sinking the supernatural in these, and losing itself in the finite, which is its proper sphere.—And it will be well if, in the rigor of moral law, men do not forget the miracle of infinite love that has offered immortal life to those who had incurred some sort of death.

(3.) The light estimate of eternity is also due in fact to the secular prosperity of this age, and to the unwonted preaching of the gospel in its secular bearings. The gospel easily catches the spirit of the times; and in this age of social wealth, with its new social interests and pressing problems, the attention of christians is a little turned away from heaven to earth. In the gospel for the times, many things are said that are [illegible] true and important. [illegible]

[illegible] be to [illegible] we [illegible] not all these [illegible]. Yet they are worthless and [false and] they will [soon] degenerate into mere temporalities, if they are not leavened and permeated with the old gospel of salvation from sin and death, for a life that was parallel with the eternal being of God. We have need to remember what Archbishop Leighton once said, when reproached for not preaching up the times. He hoped that while so many were preaching up the times, he might be excused if one humble servant of Jesus Christ should preach of Heaven and Eternity.

The Spirit.—No. 6.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

In our last, we aimed to notice the strongest examples that are brought from the Old Testament in favor of the popular view about the spirit, but we have found nothing yet, which, to our mind, affords any proof that "the (ruakh) breath of life," which was breathed into man's nostrils, is different from the breath of life" in the animal creation; but we do find the wise man declaring, when speaking of man and beast, that "they have all one (ruakh) breath." Eccl. 3: 19. This point, then, must be considered as settled, till some proof can be brought to the contrary; and when that is done, the Bible would be proved in an error. We have no fears of success on the part of the opponent. We think, when this subject is carefully and prayerfully examined from a Bible standpoint, instead of that of the creeds, letting the Lord "reason" with us as intelligent, common sense individuals, who have come out from behind the Papal veil, and the misty fogbank of spiritualism, that the whole subject will be perfectly clear, and easy of comprehension.

We will notice a few more examples, showing the use of the word ruakh. When Ahab, King of Israel, failed in his first attempt to get the vineyard of Naboth, he felt quite sad, and his wife Jezebel "came to him and said unto him, why is thy (ruakh) spirit so sad, that thou eatest no bread?" 1 Kin. 21: 5. Ahab was in a state of feeling corresponding with one who is said to be "low spirited."

In 2 Chron. 21: 16, we read, "The Lord stirred up against Jehoram the (ruakh) spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians, that were near the Ethiopians." In this example ruakh is used to represent the feeling of these nations toward Jehoram. Again, in chap. 36: 22, it is said:—"The Lord stirred up the (ruakh) spirit of Cyrus, King of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout his kingdom, and put it also in writing." Here we have ruakh used to represent a state of feeling, as before. If this spirit is the real man, why should it invariably be represented by the neuter pronoun, it? If the material organism, made "of the dust of the ground," is only a house in which the real man lives, and which is not the accountable being, this should always be denoted by the pronoun it; and the spirit, by the words he, him, his, etc.

Says Solomon:—"A man's pride shall bring him low; but honor shall uphold the humble in (ruakh) spirit." Prov. 29: 23. In this example ruakh is also used to represent a state of feeling, as well as in the following:—"The Lord hath poured out upon you the (ruakh) spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes." Isa. 29: 10. We need not pursue this point further, to give more examples where ruakh represents a state of feeling. We see no chance for doubt that this is one of its significations.

Let us examine one or two more examples where ruakh is used to denote the atmosphere, or "breath of life." "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible (ruakh) tempest." Ps. 11: 6. In this case, the air is moved with such violence as to form an "horrible tempest." In speaking of the scattering of the children of Israel, the Lord declares: —"I have spread you abroad as the four (ruakh) winds of the heaven, saith the Lord." Zech. 2: 6. When speaking of Alexander's kingdom, Daniel says:—"His kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four (ruakh) winds of heaven." Dan. 11: 4. Says the prophet Ezekiel:—"I looked, and behold, a whirl-(ruakh) wind came out of the north, a great cloud." Ezk. 1: 4. These examples are too plain to need comment. Many more might be given, if it were necessary, to show that ruakh is very commonly used to denote the atmosphere we breathe, when it is called the spirit or "breath of life," without which, we die at once, and return to dust, to await the resurrection of the last day.

If there are any passages in the Old Testament which conflict with the position we have taken, that we have not noticed, we should be pleased to have any of our readers forward them for consideration. Truth [illegible] the light, or the closest [illegible] [illegible] truth. Let us buy the truth and sell it not."

In our next, we propose to commence the classification of the examples where ruakh is rendered by any other word than spirit. Our readers will do well to preserve them for reference, as they have been prepared with considerable labor.

Absurdities of Modern Theology.

We have recently had occasion to look over some popular works written in defence of the immortality of the soul, and the conscious state of the dead, and, we have been more than ever astonished at the palpable absurdities in the writings of those who endeavor to sustain modern theology. No wonder that so many thinking men, who suppose the theology of these days to be in harmony with the Bible, have turned infidels. Others will soon follow their example, unless the plain, consistent teaching of the Scriptures be substituted for the contradictory fables that have been palmed off upon the people for the truth of the Lord. We have come to a period when people dare think for themselves, even in opposition to an Orthodox clergyman; if he does not sustain his position with Scripture and common sense. Laymen find they have the same right to think as professional men, and many intend to exercise that right, though they may receive the anathemas of sectarian bigots. Luthers are wanted in every direction to stand up in defence of "the faith which was once delivered to the saints."

In a work published by L. Lee, on the soul, he says, on p. 33, the soul is "without figure, form, color, impenetrability, extension, divisibility, gravitation, attraction, or repulsion." We can hardly conceive how nothing could be better defined. He says:—"The mind in its present state is dependent upon the bodily organs for primary ideas." How that which has no "extension" can depend upon matter for ideas, remains to be shown. "The soul" he says, "is an immaterial spirit." And then says: "If the soul is a simple, spiritual essence, immaterial, uncompounded, and indivisible, it must be immortal in itself." As well say nothing is immortal! For that which is immaterial, uncompounded and indivisible cannot possibly be a living being either praising the Lord, or wailing in agony. As soon as a sound is made, it is proof positive that something material is in motion. He says:—"Frost will kill the body, but no one will contend that an immaterial spirit can be frozen to death." Of course not. "It will not be pretended," he says, "that an immaterial, intangible, indivisible soul can be cut to pieces with saws, knives or axes." Certainly not. He goes on to say: "An immaterial,, uncompounded spirit cannot be affected by material fire, any more than it can by frost; it could dwell alike in the sun or in the polar regions." In summing up his arguments, he says:—"By all the conclusiveness, then, by which we have sustained the immateriality of the soul, does its immortality follow." If nothing has a conscious existence, then we might conceive how it could be immortal. He further says:—"The argument drawn from the immateriality of the soul, not only proves that it is immortal in itself, living forever, if left to the operations of the laws of its own nature, but it proves that God cannot destroy it." "If God himself has made the soul immaterial, he cannot destroy it by bringing material agents to act upon it. God cannot destroy that which is uncompounded, or divide that which is indivisible." We think it needs no labored argument to prove that nothing is indestructible.

Mr. Lee introduces an argument from Drew, a very able writer on the subject. When arguing for the immateriality of the soul, and its nature, he says:—

"As an immaterial substance has no surface, it is a contradiction to suppose that matter can ever be brought in contact with it. To suppose such a contact possible, is to suppose a surface in an immaterial being, which at the same time is excluded by its natural immateriality. Whatever has an exterior must have an interior, and what has both, must be extended. An immaterial substance has no surface, and that which has no surface can never be brought into contact with that which has; it therefore follows that the soul must be inaccessible to all violence from matter, and that it cannot perish through its instrumentality."

Let the reader strain his imagination to get some idea of such a being as described by these writers, and when most successful, he will find he has only been trying to conceive nothing to be something. But we are told this "immortal soul" "is the real man." We are also told in a recent work, entitled "Spirit Life," by Rev. T. Spicer, D. D., that "there is no conceivable connection between matter and thought." We would like to inquire of this highly esteemed and venerable minister of Christ, what causes derangement in case of brain fever or from any other cause, if there is no "connection between matter and thought?" And why do old men, when their physical systems are nearly worn out, manifest such imbecility of mind? Why does a blow on the head stop the thinking, and render the individual insensible? Why does intoxicating liquor produce delirium tremens? Why has not the idiot, with his low, sloping forehead, the same strength of mind as he who has a well developed brain, if [illegible]

Again, Dr. Spicer says:—"The soul exists wholly independent of the body which it inhabits, although there are certain actions it cannot perform without using the body to which it belongs. It can neither see, hear, nor speak, without using the body."

Imagine a soul in heaven that "can neither see, hear, nor speak." We consider it a great misfortune to be deaf, so that we cannot hear the sweet music of our friends' voices; but when deaf and dumb, so that we cannot sing the praises of God, nor hear others, how lonely and sad would be our condition. But, oh! to be deaf and dumb and BLIND, is of all conditions the most pitiable. We should feel relieved when such an one was laid away in the sleep of death.

Further, if "the soul . . . . can not see, hear, nor speak, without using the body," it would follow, we think, that it cannot taste, smell, nor feel "without using the body." Reader, what do you think of such a soul, such an immortal soul as this? It is "immaterial," "uncompounded," "indivisible," without "exterior," or "interior," "has no surface, can never be brought into contact with that which has;" "can neither see, hear, nor speak!" Is this MAN?

Strange Times.

The Chicago Democrat in speaking of the "times" in that enterprising city says, they are characterized by "plenty and scarcity." This is a paradox. How is it explained? The Democrat goes on to say that,

"We never knew the times so hard in our city when money was so plenty. Men who have money are afraid to invest it; and persons out of debt are determined to keep so. It is very seldom now that you can find men of good credit who will undertake any speculation which requires the borrowing of money. On the other hand men in straitened circumstances never found it so hard to get money. Men who have a plenty of property and own a little money, are skinned harder than we ever knew them to be before."

The secret is now told. Men "are afraid" to act and go forward in business operations as formerly. All is uncertainty. When describing the last days of this world's history, and the state of feeling that would characterize its inhabitants, said Jesus:—"Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth." Luke 21: 20. We think worldly men will realize this more fully soon. Let the apostle James address this class of men a few moments, who "are afraid to invest" their money, and consequently keep it laid up in bank safes.

"Go to now ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days." Jas. 5: 1–3.

Why is their gold and silver cankered? Because not in circulation. Why not in use? Because they "are afraid to invest it." How faithfully the last jots and tittles of prophecy are being fulfilled. Let every christian be upon his watch tower, for "blessed is he that watcheth." Keep ready to meet the coming King.

INTERESTING DISCUSSION.—Bro. C. F. Hudson, author of the able work on the destruction of the wicked, entitled "Debt and Grace," and Sylvanus Cobb, editor of the Christian Freeman, (Universalist) have arranged for a discussion in that paper on on the subject of Human Destiny. The discussion has now commenced, and will probably continue about three months. It will, doubtless, be one of the most interesting ever had on that subject. We publish the first article of Bro. Hudson in this week's Crisis.

☞ We have received an interesting little tract, published by Tho. G. Newman, Seneca Falls, N. Y., entitled "Divine Instruction to the Inquirer after Truth." It consists of eight pages, price 50 cts. per 100, $3.50 per 1000. For sale by the publisher.

For the Crisis.

Good Prayer Meetings.

The way to have a good prayer meeting is, first, to pray before you go for a blessing on the meeting; look to God after you get there, to teach you what to do, and when to move, and then obey the first impulse to speak or pray,—ask for what you want, then and there, not for somebody, somewhere else, and at some time or other; claim it now, if you need it now, if not, stay at home until you do need something, and let others have the time.

Many prayer meetings are run into the ground out of sight, by the following inconsistent course. You go to see what kind of a meeting they have—look at every one that comes in—whisper about others—sit looking around in prayer time—do nothing, so get nothing, then find fault with the meeting before others, and discourage them from going and doing their duty. Such a course kills you and others, and displeases God and his people.

Good, well conducted prayer meetings, are the life of any church. Some have become over wise, and want no meeting, un[illegible] taking up the time and destroying the spirit of the meeting, discouraging the weak ones that come to get strong.

Another wrong course is, to go late—sing a long hymn—pray a long prayer—say from five to ten minutes—sing six or eight verses—talk ten to fifteen minutes—sing again, then ask others to do their duty, when you have taken your time and theirs also. Such a course ruins prayer meetings, and the church becomes cold and formal.

If brethren would study to make the social meetings interesting and lively, by short prayers and exhortations, urging the weak to do duty, even if it is to call on some personally, God will bless such efforts and meetings as before.

Class, or inquiry meetings, always have been a blessing, and a great help to the weak and tempted, and are opposed only by the ignorant, or the backslidden portion of the church, that pretend to want a revival, and resist the very means that God has ordained to bring it about.

Misquoting Scripture.

This is a very common evil among men, and as various as common.

1. There is home-made Scripture, such as those passages that speak of "never-dying souls," "deathless spirits," "eternal misery," "eternal torments," immortal souls," "dying and going to glory," "Christ's spiritual coming," the Holy Trinity," etc., etc.

2. There is Catechism Scripture, such as, "God did from all eternity unchangeably fore-ordain whatsoever comes to pass," etc., etc.

3. There is mutilated Scripture, such as, "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, ye may be also." Or, like that of the M. E. preacher in Great B——, who read in his pulpit the 104th Psalm, leaving off the last verse only, as the idea of the sinners being consumed out of the earth and the wicked being no more, was not quite up to the creed, or to his standard. A class leader in the same town, (I presume in the same church) I was told, once prayed as follows:—"Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly—we mean thy spiritual coming."

4. There is Scripture which is improved to meet the necessities of modern doctrine, and imposed upon the credulity of people, who don't read the Bible for themselves. And this peculiar type of misquotation becomes the more glaring, when the person professes to correct the quotation of some one else, and commits a more grievous error, by far, than the one corrected. I heard once of a person, who, speaking of his acquirements, said he never, or rarely, used an "*in*grammatical phrase," and he was quite surprised to learn that "*in*grammatical" was "*un*grammatical." Thus many a "Martin Martext" corrects his neighbor by mangling the very Word of God.

I noticed quite an amusing instance of this kind of misquotation, which occurred a short time since, "Out West." A certain traveler related how, in journeying, he fell in with a kind of Kansas border ruffian, full of bad whiskey, with whom he had quite a conversation, which finally turned upon theological subjects, when it appeared that the rummy was a believer, by some means, as Milton, Luther and Law have been, in the doctrine that the dead are asleep till the resurrection. The traveler, being a champion for the opposite view, after various expositions, came upon this point. There is, as most readers of the Bible know, a passage in Eccl. 9: 4–6, as follows:—"For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope; for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun." This passage seems to many good people, to say nothing of the whiskey drinker aforesaid, to teach,

1. That the living person of the smallest consequence is of more value than a dead one, no matter how great he is. For a living dog is better than a dead lion.

2. That the living, however ignorant they may be, do generally know as much as this, that they shall die.

3. That the dead, whether great or small, are more ignorant than this, for they know not anything.

4. That whatever they may have deserved or earned while living, they can, while dead, have no reward for it, for the memory of them is forgotten, (which agrees well with the fact, that rewards to the people of God are not given till the resurrection).

5. That all those passions of love, hate and envy, have now perished, and are hushed in the silence of death.

6. That the dead have no more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun. A statement which seems to knock into confusion the ideas of certain wise men, that the spirits of the wicked dead go to and fro in the earth as demons, rapping, tipping tables, etc.; and which renders it even doubtful whether Samuel of [illegible] imparting to Saul certain information which it was wicked for him to seek, and for the obtaining of which (with other sins,) he was doomed to die.

Well, to return. Our whiskey drinker quoted to our traveler, in proof of the doctrine of unconsciousness in death,—"The dead know not anything." Whereupon the traveler replied: "Why do you stop here at a comma? Does it not also say, 'Neither SHALL they any more have a reward?' and taking it without qualification, how can the righteous ever be RAISED?" The whiskey drinker, almost non-plussed by this, and supposing the traveler posted upon the point, not having read his Bible himself enough to see that the statement concerning the reward is in the present tense, and that the "SHALL" on which the whole argument rested was the product of the brains of some one, however good he might be as a corrector of the press, was still by no means "wiser than Solomon," and so unfit to improve upon his utterances, at once gave up the point saying "That's so. I never thought of that." Of which statement, the first part was entirely untrue, and the latter no doubt quite true, for I presume he never would have "Thought of that" from reading his Bible ever so much. I really think that this proving doctrines by adding emphatic words to God's revelation is, on the whole, rather worse than altering the current sense of Luke 23: 43, by moving a little comma that the Evangelist never put there at all, but which was inserted by Greek expositors or copyists sometimes in one place, and sometimes in another, as in their best judgment the sense demanded.

I would not make a man an offender for a word: yet, I think it no more than right, that when learned and critical men attempt to pluck the motes out of the eyes of poor whiskey drinkers, they should, at least, avoid such beams in their own eyes as are indicated by such misquotations of Scripture as I have referred to. The remedy for misquotations is,

1. To study the Bible carefully.

2. Be sure and get the sense of the passage, and then your misquotation will not pervert that.

3. Recollect the very words, if possible.

4. Believe the Bible and shape your faith by it, and then you will not need to alter it to prove a doubtful position.

5. Study various translations of it, and the original, if practicable, and thus acquire correct ideas concerning its meaning.

6. Don't take passages from newspapers as Scripture till you have examined them in the Bible.

7. Be very jealous of all passages that are used in controversy, and examine them as closely as possible, and never say "That is so" to a quotation made contrary to or agreeing with your previous ideas, until you have first called for the documents to see whether it is really "so" or not.

Avoid also all unscriptural and anti-scriptural "phrases" in discussing Scriptural truth; such as, "material," "materiality," "immaterial," "essence," "annihilation," materialism," etc. Allow no one, with your approbation, to use such unscriptural expressions to illustrate or controvert Scripture doctrine, unless the terms are first accurately defined; and secondly, the definitions agreed to by both parties. Neglecting this, you may "play hide and seek" perpetually with every wily quibbler who appears. Finally, if you have a Bible faith you can tell it in Bible language, unabridged and unadulterated. Read your Bibles a great deal—quote them a great deal. and be sure you quote them rightly.

For the Crisis.

To Bro. Cook.

In an article in the Crisis of the 13th ult., from Bro. Cook, headed "Symbols, No. 3," there is proven by the clearest possible evidence, that the ten-horned beast of Rev. 13: 1–10 is a symbol of Rome papal, embracing both the civil and ecclesiastical power for 1260 years, from which it received its power, throne, and great authority, and was the successor of imperial Rome, and ruled supreme without a contemporaneous power, etc. As there are some points in his theory, and the theory of others who have, with him, fixed upon the present Napoleonic dynasty of France, as the true two-horned beast, I take the liberty of asking a very few questions, which, if definitely and fully answered, will relieve the subject from much embarrassment, viz.:—

1. As Rome papal received its power from, and was the successor of, Rome imperial, and ruled without a competitor, why may we not with propriety call it the 7th form of Roman government?

2. As the ten-horned beast succeeded the dragon, is it not a mistake to extend the 6th form of government over the entire period occupied by papal Rome to the days of Napoleon II., and thus to call him or his government the 7th form?

3. Are not those, who thus do, in danger of making the "word" both yea and nay?

P. ALLING.

☞ The piety which is faithful in that which is least is really a more difficult piety than that which triumphs and glares on high occasions. It requires less piety to be a martyr for Christ, than it does to look upon the success of a rival without envy, or [illegible]

This higher power may safely leave man free, for the very reason that it is omnipotent; for it is the character of almightiness not to fear freedom; and it is precisely because Omnipotence governs the world, that no infringement of universal order is to be apprehended from the personal self-subsistence [or perverse action] of finite spirits."†

3. I query whether Universalists do not usually hold an opinion of the "highest good," from which I should dissent, but which has contributed to their faith. The natural and just revulsion from the thought of eternal misery has given prominence to the question of happiness or misery; and it were no wonder if this question should displace that which is most important,—What is the highest kind of happiness or welfare? Is it not virtue? Is it not better to be worthy than to be fortunate? My noble opponent, and multitudes of Universalists with him, will at once say, "Yes, virtue by all means, and let the happiness take care of itself. First pure, then peaceable. Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness."—And the moral philosophy prevalent among Universalists,—that blessing cannot be sundered from goodness, that suffering is inseparable from guilt, and that the only forgiveness is the putting away of sin,—this philosophy has opposed the happiness-worship of which I speak. Still I doubt if many have not become Universalists out of a primary love of enjoyment,—here or hereafter,—to which moral worth is secondary. The same may be true of other religionists—this is religionism as distinct from genuine godliness, and it is an exceedingly subtle mischief in human nature. But is it not fostered more by the hope of a final happiness, in spite of any guilty abatement or postponement of that happiness, than by the doctrine that makes godliness the condition of the gain or total loss of the happiness?

I have watched the progress of phrenology, and have read some phrenological books. I am sure that multitudes of them make virtue the means and happiness the end, as if virtue were not intrinsically good. Many of them manifestly use words of moral and religious import in a merely physical sense, as Epicurus doubtless did when he wrote a book about holiness. In fact, much of the phrenological philosophy is strictly epicurian, making pleasure the highest good, and prudence the highest virtue. Of the phrenologists the great majority I think are Universalists—many because they have found in their science special and striking proofs of the goodness of God in the economy of Pain—of which hereafter. But many of them are Universalists on the happiness principle. This is no disparagement to those who are nobler minded; but the fact is proper to be named among the causes of the faith.

4. Important among these causes are various modern reforms, such as those of criminal codes, of prison discipline and of the treatment of the insane, and efforts in behalf of the intemperate, of abandoned females, and of vagrant children. All these reforms have grown out of a kindlier feeling of humanity, and they have all encouraged a higher faith in the salvability of those who seemed beyond hope.—Many who had been given up as lost have been recovered back to the paths of virtue. These reforms are an honor to our age, and no lover of his kind should discourage the last effort to save the fallen. They are our brothers and our sisters all. But the question still remains whether the cases of reformation form so large an induction as to warrant the inference of a general salvation in the holiness and blessedness of God's kingdom. This question I reserve for the next chapter, where I shall examine the doctrine of the "good in all," which is one form of the Universalist faith.

Philanthropic effort in behalf of the slave is another occasion of this faith. "God hath made of one blood all nations of men."—There is a human brotherhood, and a divine Fatherhood; and he is false to humanity and to piety who does not recognize and live out this truth. But whether the fact warrants the faith in question is to be considered.

6. Modern Spiritualism has doubtless promoted the belief of the final salvation of all. I would not by any means confound the two doctrines, for the majority of Universalists may think no more of the supposed revelations of spiritualism than I do. And I shall have no occasion to discuss their merits. I simply name the fact that nearly all spiritualists are Universalists, and may refer to the opinions of some spiritualists when I come to the Scripture doctrine of Immortality.

7. I think that Universalists have thought less than others of the infinitude of blessing implied in eternal life, and have thus been more ready to regard eternal life as the destiny of all. I think this is the fact, because I have frequently heard Universalists speak, as if it were unjust that the sufferings of this life were not compensated with endless joy, or as if the eternal life of some instead of all would be an unequal partiality in God. The reasons for the ... [illegible] ... have not been computed ... consider and weigh an infinite hope ... [illegible] ... supposed ... is an infinite woe. This is an Orthodox thought, as I am unwillingly informed, that if man ... exceedingly imposing, and which is one of the more common methods of vindicating the divine justice. God is so good as to offer immortal glory to man, once and again. If man declines—refuses—rejects—scorns the offer, does he not deserve the pains of hell? How shall we escape endless pangs, if we neglect so great salvation? Such is the argument; and it is so plausible that I have heard of one Universalist preacher, who, in a pardonable vexation with the people for not welcoming his faith said, that if there was not a hell, there ought to be one. The Orthodox reasoning on this subject is indeed a monstrous perversion, which pressed,—its consequences involve the notion that, from the beginning and for ever, infinite evil has as good a right of possession, and may claim as fair a chance in the universe, as infinite good.

But, notwithstanding this fearful corollary, the orthodox man, compelled to offset an infinite good against an infinite evil, has got some benefit of the process. With this doctrine of election, or selection, he has thought intensively, has intently considered the "powers of the world to come," has reckoned the "unsearchable riches," until he has felt that they were past computation, and has contemplated the "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," until not only the heaviest temporal calamities should seem a "light affliction," but the hazards of deathless pain, however imminent, have seemed of little account.

The method of the Universalist, on the other hand, has been the extensive. He has enlarged the range of the eternal life, making it comprehend the entire host of the human race, and the whole range of God's intelligent creatures. The orthodox estimates have been those of magnitude, the Universalist, those of multitude. And I believe that many Universalists have sought to enlarge the bounds of the eternal weal, (they cannot make them wider than I shall,) because they have less fathomed its depths.

I think the early christians had an advantage here. With no eternal evil to fear for any, but deeming themselves called by God's free gift freely received, to be "heirs of glory," joint heirs with Christ of all that eternity can yield they gained some sense of what is "length, and breadth, and depth, and height," in the computations of the celestial kingdom. Hence we cease to wonder that when fiery trials come, and not the strong men only, but delicate women and children of tender age were killed all day long counted out like sheep for the butcher,—they thought they more than conquered, in the name of the Prince of life who had loved them unto death. The early christian martyrdoms served as a precedent for the courage of the latter martyrs, burdened with the tenet of eternal woe. Let that burden be removed, and the "great salvation" be great not as from an infinite evil, but as for an eternal and ever augmenting good—and when poor, weak men, born of yesterday, shall begin to reckon the magnitude of the salvation, modesty may inspire some doubt whether all are thus saved. To be indeed "children of the Most High," "sons of God" "kings and priests" unto the Lord of all, may be so high an honor that an "election," or selection, shall not be a very unworthy doctrine.

(2.) The slight estimate of which I speak, is in part due to a reaction from a false heavenly mindedness. There are many professing christians who seem to do christian duties because they lead on to eternal glory. This is what Coleridge has well styled "the other-worldliness"—trying to be godly, not because it is right, but because it will pay well. This is a gross perversion, the overworking and abuse of considerations that should be properly used,—for cherishing of gratitude and for comfort in tribulation. It is the counterfeit, doing harm to the genuine. And this spurious piety is specially mischievous when it assumes that the degree of future glory is never affected by one's attainments in virtue, but that the best and the worst of the saved will be at once and equally blessed when they pass the pearly gates—a doctrine which the parable of the laborers in the vineyard was never designed to teach.—This selfish and miraculous theory of future glory is justly repudiated by many Universalists, who find the law and the measure of happiness in virtue itself. Science and philosophy are discovering to men close and natural connexions between well doing and well being.—A very important gospel this—or rather a very important law of all gospel. But it may go too far with its doctrine of natural processes, sinking the supernatural in these, and losing itself in the finite, which is its proper sphere.—And it will be well if, in the rigor of moral law, men do not forget the miracle of infinite love that has offered immortal life to those who had incurred some sort of death.

(3.) The light estimate of eternity is also due in fact to the secular prosperity of this age, and to the unwonted preaching of the gospel in its secular bearings. The gospel easily catches the spirit of the times; and in this age of social wealth, with its new social interests and pressing problems, the attention of christians is a little turned away from heaven to earth. In the gospel for the times, many things are said that are immensely true and important. There is a gospel for the drunkard, for the harlot, for the pauper, and for the slave; and woe be to us if we preach not all these gospels. Yet they are all worthless and false, and they will surely degenerate into mere temporalities, if they are not leavened and permeated with the old gospel of salvation from sin and death, for a life that was parallel with the eternal being of God. We have need to remember what Archbishop Leighton once said, when reproached for not preaching up the times. He hoped that while so many were preaching up the times, he might be excused if one humble servant of Jesus Christ should preach of Heaven and Eternity.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MAY 11, 1859.

The Spirit.—No. 6.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

In our last, we aimed to notice the strongest examples that are brought from the Old Testament in favor of the popular view about the spirit, but we have found nothing yet, which, to our mind, affords any proof that "the (ruakh) breath of life," which was breathed into man's nostrils, is different from the breath of life" in the animal creation, but we do find the wise man declaring, when speaking of man and beast, that "they have all one (ruakh) breath" Eccl 3 19 The point, then, must be considered as settled till some proof can be brought to the contrary, and when that is done, the Bible would be proved in an error. We have no fears of success on the part of the opponent. We think, when this subject is carefully and prayerfully examined from a Bible standpoint, instead of that of the creeds, letting the Lord "reason" with us as intelligent, common sense individuals, who have come out from behind the Papal veil, and the misty fogbank of spiritualism, that the whole subject will be perfectly clear, and easy of comprehension.

We will notice a few more examples, showing the use of the word ruakh. When Ahab, King of Israel, failed in his first attempt to get the vineyard of Naboth, he felt quite sad, and his wife Jezebel came to him and said unto him, why is thy (ruakh) spirit so sad, that thou eatest no bread?" 1 Kin 21 5. Ahab was in a state of feeling corresponding with one who is said to be "low spirited."

In 2 Chron 21 16 we read, "The Lord stirred up against Jehoram the (ruakh) spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians that were near the Ethiopians." In this example ruakh is used to represent the feeling of these nations toward Jehoram. Again, in chap 36 22 it is said —"The Lord stirred up the (ruakh) spirit of Cyrus, King of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout his kingdom, and put it also in writing." Here we have ruakh used to represent a state of feeling, as before. If this spirit is the real man why should it invariably be represented by the neuter pronoun, it? If the material organism, made "of the dust of the ground," is only a house in which the real man lives, and which is not the accountable being, this should always be denoted by the pronoun it, and the spirit, by the words he, him, his, etc.

Says Solomon —"A man's pride shall bring him low, but honor shall uphold the humble in (ruakh) spirit." Prov 29 23. In this example ruakh is also used to represent a state of feeling, as well as in the following —"The Lord hath poured out upon you the (ruakh) spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes." Isa 29 10. We need not pursue this point further, to give more examples where ruakh represents a state of feeling. We see no chance for doubt that this is one of its significations.

Let us examine one or two more examples where ruakh is used to denote the atmosphere, or "breath of life." "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible (ruakh) tempest." Ps 11 6. In this case, the air is moved with such violence as to form an "horrible tempest." In speaking of the scattering of the children of Israel, the Lord declares —"I have spread you abroad as the four (ruakh) winds of the heaven, saith the Lord." Zech 2 6. When speaking of Alexander's kingdom, Daniel says —"His kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four (ruakh) winds of heaven." Dan 11 4. Says the prophet Ezekiel —"I looked, and behold, a whirl- (ruakh) wind came out of the north, a great cloud." Ezk 1 4. These examples are too plain to need comment. Many more might be given, if it were necessary, to show that ruakh is very commonly used to denote the atmosphere we breathe, when it is called the spirit or "breath of life," without which, we die at once, and return to dust, to await the resurrection of the last day.

If there are any passages in the Old Testament which conflict with the position we have taken, that we have not noticed, we should be pleased to have any of our readers forward them for consideration. Truth never need to fear the light, or the closest criticism. He, who holds error, will delight in having it exposed, if he loves the truth. Let us "buy the truth and sell it not."

In our next, we propose to commence the classification of the examples where ruakh is rendered by any other word than spirit. Our readers will do well to preserve them for reference, as they have been prepared with considerable labor.

Absurdities of Modern Theology.

We have recently had occasion to look over some popular works written in defence of the immortality of the soul, and the conscious state of the dead, and we have been more than ever astonished at the palpable absurdities in the writings of those who endeavor to sustain modern theology. No wonder that so many thinking men, who suppose the theology of these days to be in harmony with the Bible, have turned infidels. Others will soon follow their example, unless the plain, consistent teaching of the Scriptures be substituted for the contradictory fables that have been palmed off upon the people for the truth of the Lord. We have come to a period when people dare think for themselves, even in opposition to an Orthodox clergyman, if he does not sustain his position with Scripture and common sense. Laymen find they have the same right to think as professional men, and many intend to exercise that right, though they may receive the anathemas of sectarian bigots. Luthers are wanted in every direction to stand up in defence of "the faith which was once delivered to the saints."

In a work published by L. Lee, on the soul, he says on p 33, the soul is "without figure form, color, impenetrability extension, divisibility, gravitation, attraction, or repulsion." We can hardly conceive how nothing could be better defined. He says —"The mind in its present state is dependent upon the bodily organs for primary ideas." How that which has no "extension" can depend upon matter for ideas, remains to be shown. "The soul" he says, "is an immaterial spirit." And then says "If the soul is a simple, spiritual essence, immaterial, uncompounded, and indivisible, it must be immortal in itself." As well say nothing is immortal! For that which is immaterial, uncompounded and indivisible cannot possibly be a living being either praising the Lord, or wailing in agony. As soon as a sound is made, it is proof positive that something material is in motion. He says —"Frost will kill the body, but no one will contend that an immaterial spirit can be frozen to death." Of course not. "It will not be pretended," he says, "that an immaterial, intangible, indivisible soul can be cut to pieces with saws, knives or axes. Certainly not. He goes on to say, "An immaterial, uncompounded spirit cannot be affected by material fire, any more than it can by frost, it could dwell alike in the sun or in the polar regions." In summing up his arguments, he says —"By all the conclusiveness, then, by which we have sustained the immateriality of the soul, does its immortality follow." If nothing has a conscious existence, then we might conceive how it could be immortal. He further says —"The argument drawn from the immateriality of the soul, not only proves that it is immortal in itself, living forever, if left to the operations of the laws of its own nature, but it proves that God cannot destroy it." "If God himself has made the soul immaterial he cannot destroy it by bringing material agents to act upon it. God cannot destroy that which is uncompounded, or divide that which is indivisible." We think it needs no labored argument to prove that nothing is indestructible.

Mr Lee introduces an argument from Drew, a very able writer on the subject. When arguing for the immateriality of the soul, and its nature, he says —

"As an immaterial substance has no surface, it is a contradiction to suppose that matter can ever be brought in contact with it. To suppose such a contact possible, is to suppose a surface in an immaterial being, which at the same time is excluded by its natural immateriality. Whatever has an exterior must have an interior, and what has both, must be extended. An immaterial substance has no surface, and that which has no surface can never be brought into contact with that which has, it therefore follows that the soul must be inaccessible to all violence from matter, and that it cannot perish through its instrumentality."

Let the reader strain his imagination to get some idea of such a being as described by these writers, and when most successful, he will find he has only been trying to conceive nothing to be something. But we are told this "immortal soul" "is the real man." We are also told in a recent work entitled "Spirit Life," by Rev T. Spicer, D D, that "there is no conceivable connection between matter and thought." We would like to inquire of this highly esteemed and venerable minister of Christ, what causes derangement in case of brain fever or from any other cause, if there is no "connection between matter and thought?" And why do old men, when their physical systems are nearly worn out, manifest such imbecility of mind? Why does a blow on the head stop the thinking, and render the individual insensible? Why does intoxicating liquor produce delirium tremens? Why has not the idiot, with his low, sloping forehead, the same strength of mind as he who has a well developed brain, if there is no "connection between matter and thought?"

Again, Dr. Spicer says—"The soul exists wholly independent of the body which it inhabits, although there are certain actions it cannot perform without using the body to which it belongs. It can neither see, hear, nor speak, without using the body."

Imagine a soul in heaven that "can neither see, hear, nor speak." We consider it a great misfortune to be deaf, so that we cannot hear the sweet music of our friends' voices, but when deaf and dumb, so that we cannot sing the praises of God, nor hear others, how lonely and sad would be our condition. But, oh! to be deaf and dumb and BLIND, is of all conditions the most pitiable. We should feel relieved when such an one was laid away in the sleep of death.

Further, if "the soul ... can not see, hear nor speak, without using the body," it would follow, we think, that it cannot taste, smell, nor feel "without using the body." Reader, what do you think of such a soul, such an immortal soul as this? It is "immaterial," "uncompounded," "indivisible," without "exterior," or "interior," "has no surface, can never be brought into contact with that which has," "can neither see, hear, nor speak." Is this MAN?

Strange Times.

The Chicago Democrat in speaking of the "times" in that enterprising city says, they are characterized by "plenty and scarcity." This is a paradox. How is it explained? The Democrat goes on to say that,

"We never knew the times so hard in our city when money was so plenty. Men who have money are afraid to invest it, and persons out of debt are determined to keep so. It is very seldom now that you can find men of good credit who will undertake any speculation which requires the borrowing of money. On the other hand men in straitened circumstances never found it so hard to get money. Men who have a plenty of property and own a little money, are skinned harder than we ever knew them to be before."

The secret is now told. Men "are afraid" to act and go forward in business operations as formerly. All is uncertainty. When describing the last days of this world's history, and the state of feeling that would characterize its inhabitants, said Jesus —"Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth." Luke 21 26. We think worldly men will realize this more fully soon. Let the apostle James address this class of men a few moments, who "are afraid to invest" their money, and consequently keep it laid up in bank safes.

"Go to now ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days." Jas 5 1-3.

Why is their gold and silver cankered? Because not in circulation. Why not in use? Because they "are afraid to invest it." How faithfully the last jots and tittles of prophecy are being fulfilled. Let every christian be upon his watch tower, for "blessed is he that watcheth." Keep ready to meet the coming King.

INTERESTING DISCUSSION.—Bro C F Hudson, author of the able work on the destruction of the wicked, entitled "Debt and Grace," and Sylvanus Cobb, editor of the Christian Freeman, (Universalist) have arranged for a discussion in that paper on on the subject of Human Destiny. The discussion has now commenced, and will probably continue about three months. It will, doubtless, be one of the most interesting ever had on that subject. We publish the first article of Bro Hudson in this week's Crisis.

☞ We have received an interesting little tract, published by Tho G Newman, Seneca Falls, N Y entitled "Divine Instruction to the Inquirer after Truth." It consists of eight pages, price 50 cts per 100, $3.50 per 1000. For sale by the publisher.

Good Prayer Meetings.

The way to have a good prayer meeting is, first, to pray before you go for a blessing on the meeting, look to God after you get there, to teach you what to do, and when to move, and then obey the first impulse to speak or pray,—ask for what you want, then and there, not for somebody, somewhere else, and at some time or other, claim it now, if you need it now, if not, stay at home until you do need something, and let others have the time.

Many prayer meetings are run into the ground out of sight, by the following inconsistent course. You go to see what kind of a meeting they have—look at every one that comes in—whisper about others—sit looking around in prayer time—do nothing, so get nothing, then find fault with the meeting before others, and discourage them from going and doing their duty. Such a course kills you and others, and displeases God and his people.

Good, well conducted prayer meetings, are the life of any church. Some have become over wise, and want no meeting, unless there is a chance to discuss some doctrine, and prate about questions of no profit, taking up the time and destroying the spirit of the meeting, discouraging the weak ones that come to get strong.

Another wrong course is, to go late—sing a long hymn—pray a long prayer—say from five to ten minutes—sing six or eight verses—talk ten to fifteen minutes—sing again, then ask others to do their duty, when you have taken your time and theirs also. Such a course ruins prayer meetings, and the church becomes cold and formal.

If brethren would study to make the social meetings interesting and lively, by short prayers and exhortations, urging the weak to do duty, even if it is to call on some personally, God will bless such efforts and meetings as before.

Class, or inquiry meetings, always have been a blessing, and a great help to the weak and tempted, and are opposed only by the ignorant, or the backslidden portion of the church, that pretend to want a revival, and resist the very means that God has ordained to bring it about.

Misquoting Scripture.

This is a very common evil among men, and as various as common.

1 There is home-made Scripture, such as those passages that speak of "never-dying souls," "deathless spirits," "eternal misery," "eternal torments," "immortal souls," "dying and going to glory," "Christ's spiritual coming," the Holy Trinity," etc, etc.

2 There is Catechism Scripture, such as, "God did from all eternity unchangeably fore-ordain whatsoever comes to pass," etc, etc.

3 There is mutilated Scripture, such as, "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, ye may be also." Or, like that of the M E preacher in Great B——, who read in his pulpit the 104th Psalm, leaving off the last verse only, as the idea of the sinners being consumed out of the earth and the wicked being no more, was not quite up to the creed, or to his standard. A class leader in the same town, (I presume in the same church) I was told, once prayed as follows —"Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly—we mean thy spiritual coming."

4 There is Scripture which is improved to meet the necessities of modern doctrine, and imposed upon the credulity of people, who don't read the Bible for themselves. And this peculiar type of misquotation becomes the more glaring, when the person professes to correct the quotation of some one else, and commits a more grievous error by far than the one corrected. I heard once of a person who, speaking of his acquirements, said he never, or rarely, used an "ungrammatical phrase," and he was quite surprised to learn that "ungrammatical" was "*un*grammatical." Thus many a "Martin Martext" corrects his neighbor by mangling the very Word of God.

I noticed quite an amusing instance of this kind of misquotation, which occurred a short time since, "Out West." A certain traveler related how, in journeying, he fell in with a kind of Kansas border ruffian, full of bad whiskey, with whom he had quite a conversation, which finally turned upon theological subjects, when it appeared that the rummy was a believer, by some means, as Milton, Luther and Law have been, in the doctrine that the dead are asleep till the resurrection. The traveler being a champion for the opposite view after various expositions, came upon this point. There is, as most readers of the Bible know, a passage in Eccl 9 4-6, as follows:—"For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope, for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred and their envy, is now perished, neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun." This passage seems to many good people, to say nothing of the whiskey drinker aforesaid, to teach,

1 That the living person of the smallest consequence is of more value than a dead one, no matter how great he is. For a living dog is better than a dead lion.

2 That the living, however ignorant they may be, do generally know as much as this, that they shall die.

3 That the dead, whether great or small, are more ignorant than this, for they know not anything.

4 That whatever they may have deserved or earned while living, they can, while dead, have no reward for it, for the memory of them is forgotten, (which agrees well with the fact, that rewards to the people of God are not given till the resurrection).

5 That all those passions of love, hate and envy, have now perished, and are hushed in the silence of death.

6. That the dead have no more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun. A statement which seems to knock into confusion the ideas of certain wise men, that the spirits of the wicked dead go to and fro in the earth as demons, rapping, tipping tables, etc.; and which renders it even doubtful whether Samuel of old did have a "portion" in frightening the old Scriptural medium at Endor, and also in imparting to Saul certain information which it was wicked for him to seek, and for the obtaining of which (with other sins,) he was doomed to die.

Well, to return. Our whiskey drinker quoted to our traveler, in proof of the doctrine of unconsciousness in death,—"The dead know not anything." Whereupon the traveler replied: "Why do you stop here at a comma? Does it not also say, 'Neither SHALL they any more have a reward,' and taking it without qualification, how can the righteous ever be RAISED?" The whiskey drinker, almost non-plussed by this, and supposing the traveler posted upon the point, not having read his Bible himself enough to see that the statement concerning the reward is in the present tense, and that the "SHALL" on which the whole argument rested was the product of the brains of some one, however good he might be as a corrector of the press, was still by no means "wiser than Solomon," and so unfit to improve upon his utterances, at once gave up the point saying "That's so. I never thought of that." Of which statement, the first part was entirely untrue, and the latter no doubt quite true, for I presume he never would have "Thought of that" from reading his Bible ever so much. I really think that this proving doctrines by adding emphatic words to God's revelation is, on the whole, rather worse than altering the current sense of Luke 23 43, by moving a little comma that the Evangelist never put there at all, but which was inserted by Greek expositors or copyists sometimes in one place, and sometimes in another, as in their best judgment the sense demanded.

I would not make a man an offender for a word; yet, I think it no more than right, that when learned and critical men attempt to pluck the motes out of the eyes of poor whiskey drinkers, they should, at least, avoid such beams in their own eyes as are indicated by such misquotations of Scripture as I have referred to. The remedy for misquotations is,

1 To study the Bible carefully.

2 Be sure and get the sense of the passage, and then your misquotation will not pervert that.

3 Recollect the very words, if possible.

4 Believe the Bible and shape your faith by it, and then you will not need to alter it to prove a doubtful position.

5 Study various translations of it, and the original, if practicable, and thus acquire correct ideas concerning its meaning.

6 Don't take passages from newspapers as Scripture till you have examined them in the Bible.

7 Be very jealous of all passages that are used in controversy, and examine them as closely as possible, and never say "That is so" to a quotation made contrary to or agreeing with your previous ideas, until you have first called for the documents to see whether it is really "so" or not.

Avoid also all unscriptural and anti-scriptural "phrases" in discussing Scriptural truth, such as, "material," "materiality," "immaterial," "essence," "annihilation," materialism," etc. Allow no one, with your approbation, to use such unscriptural expressions to illustrate or controvert Scripture doctrine, unless the terms are first accurately defined, and secondly, the definitions agreed to by both parties. Neglecting this, you may "play hide and seek" perpetually with every wily quibbler who appears. Finally, if you have a Bible faith you can tell it in Bible language, unabridged and unadulterated. Read your Bibles a great deal—quote them a great deal and be sure you quote them rightly.

For the Crisis.

To Bro. Cook.

In an article in the Crisis of the 13th ult., from Bro. Cook, headed "Symbols, No. 3," there is proven by the clearest possible evidence, that the ten-horned beast of Rev. 13 1-10 is a symbol of Rome papal, embracing both the civil and ecclesiastical power for 1260 years, from which it received its power, throne, and great authority, and was the successor of imperial Rome, and ruled supreme without a contemporaneous power, etc. As there are some points in his theory, and the theory of others who have, with him, fixed upon the present Napoleonic dynasty of France, as the true two-horned beast, I take the liberty of asking a very few questions, which, if definitely and fully answered, will relieve the subject from much embarrassment, viz.:—

1 As Rome papal received its power from, and was the successor of, Rome imperial, and ruled without a competitor, why may we not with propriety call it the 7th form of Roman government?

2. As the ten-horned beast succeeded the dragon, is it not a mistake to extend the 6th form of government over the entire period occupied by papal Rome to the days of Napoleon II., and thus to call him or his government the 7th form?

3. Are not those, who thus do, in danger of making the "word" both yea and nay?

P. ALLING.

☞ The piety which is faithful in that which is least is really a more difficult piety than that which triumphs and glares on high occasions. It requires less piety to be a martyr for Christ, than it does to look upon the success of a rival without envy, or even to maintain a perfect and guileless integrity in the common transactions of life.—Horace Bushnell.

Brief Expositions.

NO. VIII.—FAITH REASONABLE AND EASY.

"If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater."—1 John 5: 9

You may have heard a great deal about the difficulty of believing the gospel, but you never saw that doctrine asserted by the Holy Spirit; on the contrary, the Bible invariably, as in the text, so speaks as to convince the attentive reader that it is easy for him to credit the message of salvation. How many speak as if God were the only being in the universe whose word it was difficult to receive! Let the reasoning in the verse under consideration guide us all to a right understanding of this point. The argument is simple, rational, irresistible. We receive the witness—the testimony—the word—of man, and surely we ought at least as readily to admit the true sayings of God. We say "at least as readily," but the language is almost profane. Believe God at least as readily as man! Alas! that we are driven to argue in this style; but we must do so for the sake of scattering the gross darkness thrown around human power and duty.

When a man utters any intelligible statement in our hearing, what is it that induces us to admit it—to receive it as true? It is the known worth of the speaker's moral character. We reject the testimony of a habitual liar, in almost all circumstances, we reasonably hesitate when we are addressed by a stranger, and we instinctively admit the declaration of one possessing well-tried veracity. And, now, who proclaims the Gospel? It is the God of truth. Men may lie, God cannot men may even unintentionally deceive us, God cannot lead us astray. In every sense, then, the witness of God is greater, that is, MUCH MORE WORTHY OF BEING BELIEVED. Infinitely more so. That the reader may believe the divine message—the gospel of his salvation—the fact that Jesus loved him and bore his sins on the tree,—that Jesus is loving him still and is most willing to impart to him eternal life in the glorious kingdom about to be revealed—let him reflect for a moment, and surely a longer period cannot be required, on the transcendently holy character of Him who addresses him from the throne. Think of the divine speaker, and as you apprehend more and more clearly who addresses you, and the absolute holiness of his name, you must discover ample ground to rest on his word—and you rest on it just as you rest on the word of man—with instantaneous, increasing, delightful and unwavering confidence.

When our Lord preached to the Jews, he never taught them that they were unable to believe his word; his language was, "If I say the truth, why do ye not believe me?" He did not say, even though I speak the truth, ye cannot believe me. John 8: 46. Having the truth, and of course evidence that it was the truth, he intimates to them that they could demand no more, and that their unbelief was without excuse. O reader, you have the truth—the Gospel truth—and you are as fully qualified to believe it as any other message that ever was announced in your hearing. Believe, therefore, and live.

NO. IX.—JESUS' SELF-SACRIFICING LOVE.

"The Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."—Gal. 2: 20

So says Paul, and from these few words he drew all his salvation and all his joy. It was enough for him, a sinner, going on to judgment, that Jesus had loved him, and given himself for him. You see that the love of Jesus for Paul was not the effect of any love for Jesus on Paul's part, it was with Jesus that the love originated, and it was the fact of his loving Saul, the sinner, that filled the persecutor's heart with peace, and melted him into love and submission. How great the proof of Jesus' love for "the chief of sinners!" He "gave himself for me." It was not gold that he tendered for Paul's salvation, had that been sufficient, he could have presented abundance of it, for "the silver and the gold" were his. it was not a vast and varied pile of animals in sacrifice; if that could have purchased the rebel's life, Jesus might easily have paid the price, for "the beasts of the forest" were his, "and the cattle on a thousand hills;" but he gave HIMSELF—he submitted to shame—to torture—to death! Oh, what love! It is high as heaven and deeper than the unseen world. Eph 3: 16–19.

Now, reader, this is a sweet verse for you to meditate upon, and lovingly we recommend you to turn it over and over in your mind. It may be you exclaim, "would that I loved Jesus!"—and you wonder how you can reach that state of affection. Perhaps you are awfully impressed, and certainly you ought to be so, with these words, "if any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be Anathema Maranatha," that is, accursed—devoted to destruction—at his coming. How can you love him, then? How can you escape this terrific doom? You can only love him in one way, and that is by being made acquainted with his love for you. Jesus loves you already—even now! My fellow-sinner, think of that! He gave himself for you, since he gave himself "a ransom for all," and for "the world," and for "the whole world," expressions that include you as certainly as you are included in the universe of God. Let me present to you some of the immortal Luther's precious observations on this favorite text. When you read what he says of himself, I implore you to insert your name in place of his, and in that way you shall the more likely reap substantial profit.

"Who is this me? Even I, wretched and damnable one, so dearly beloved of the Son of God, that he gave himself for me. If I, then, through works or merits, could have loved the Son of God, and so come in to him, what needed he to deliver himself for me?"

"If I, being a wretch and a damned sinner, could be redeemed by any other price, what needed the Son of God to be given for me? But because there was no other price either in heaven or in earth, but Christ the Son of God, therefore it was most necessary that he should be delivered for me. Moreover, this he did of inestimable love; for Paul saith, 'which loved me.'"

Read, therefore, with great vehemency, these words 'me' and 'for me,' and so inwardly practise with thyself, that thou, with a sure faith, mayest conceive and print this 'me' in thy heart, and apply it unto thyself, not doubting but that thou art of the number of those to whom this 'me' belongeth also that Christ hath not only loved Peter and Paul, and given himself for them, but that the same grace, also, which is comprehended in this 'me,' as well pertaineth and cometh unto us as unto him."

For the Crisis

Travels and Incidental Items.

I informed the friends, in a previous article, of preaching in Newburg, on the eve of my arrival, with usual freedom, although I cannot recall the time when I was more exhausted. I did not sleep any the night before—was out in the blustering wind the most of the day previous, and walked some eight or more miles—walked the levee all night in the cold atmosphere and strong wind, waiting for boat—found no sleep on boat the next day on account of a band of music that had been employed, by the officers of said boat, to cheer the crew and dispel fear, I suppose, while they were running a race with another boat on a heavy wager. However, the good providence of God frustrated their design in their race, (the wind being high they could not start at the hour), and I was only annoyed by the constant music, which I could have borne well if nature had not pleaded so hard for rest.

I will here refer to a circumstance when on boat. While reading an Advent paper, a gentleman caught its heading and inquired, rather abruptly, I thought, for a stranger, "If I took that paper?" I answered him readily in the affirmative. He then very frankly commenced talking of the '43 and '44 movement, and his connection with the Advent people at that time. I learned he was preaching the doctrine of the coming kingdom at the time mentioned. He came West some ten years since, and had been practising medicine on the eclectic system, in Iraquoise Co., Ill. Had preached occasionally—always spoke his sentiments on the Advent faith freely, when preaching, and on all proper occasions. He was acquainted with most of the preachers in the East and brethren in different localities. Spoke of them with much warmth and affection. Evidently, on recalling those times, it kindled up the spark which some call the "Advent Glory," that may have been nearly quenched by the long cold rain and hail storm we have had in this State for the last fourteen months.

His name is M. C. Phiney. Many of your readers will be glad to hear from him, no doubt, even if it is a hasty sketch. He informed me Pro. George Needham lived in the same county and town, if I mistake not. They both have the same P. O. address—"Onarga, Iraquoise Co., Ill." They have been almost drowned out in that part of the State (Eastern part) as well as here in the Western part. The effect is obvious, great suffering for the comforts of life, even for daily bread.

As strange as it may appear, in a land where thousands of bushels of corn and wheat lie over, in almost every township,—corn a drug—potatoes difficult to give them away, and all eatables for man and beast abound, and thus it was two years ago, if I mistake not, yet now there is not grain enough in the country to supply its inhabitants. Many must suffer, yea, they do now suffer for want of bread-stuff. Hundreds, and I may safely say, thousands of cattle have died the past winter for want of feed. One man—a farmer—told me he had lost eighty head of cattle and six horses the past winter. True, others have not lost so many and perhaps, not so many in proportion to their number as the one spoken of, yet nearly all have shared in the loss to a greater or less extent. As to hogs, I have no definite idea of their destruction. If they were all to die I should consider it a great blessing to the human family, instead of a real loss. The flesh of swine genders too many diseases, to be of much value, but, as the people look at it differently, and consider hogs of much value, no doubt a great many of them have become food for the buzzards the past winter. However, the people say but little about losing hogs; in fact, they keep so many, a dozen or two would hardly be missed by many of our farmers. Yet I am frequently reminded (especially this Spring) of the language of a certain one describing Western hogs: "They are very large, and so poor, they lean against a tree to steady themselves while rooting—thought it would take two to make a shadow."

I will only add, in conclusion, the oldest settlers say, they never saw such times in this State before, and think there never has been a time when bread-stuff was so scarce, and so many suffering for want of it as now. However many other comforts the early settlers of this State have had to forego, the staple articles of life have never been wanting, if I have been rightly informed.

I intended in this article to have given an account of the novel time I had in Newburg; but other things have made the article too lengthy already. Hence, as I long since learned that long articles are not generally read with much interest, I will close this, and give it in my next.

Fables of Infidelity.

"You have rightly estimated my design in preparing these tracts for the masses. I have followed John Wesley's charge to his preachers, Fire low. Hence this method to simplify science and theology to such minds, vigorous and half cultivated," etc.—Extract from a letter from the author.

The Great Controversy.

Extract from a letter from R. Patterson, author of "Fables of Infidelity."

"I never entertained the current belief that we are destined to walk into the Millennium on Brussels' carpets, with all our silks and jewelry, our luxury and vanity, and pride and covetousness. The whole spirit of the word of God is against such a dream. But I had not those solemn views of the awful grandeur of the Lord's controversy with his own people and of the terrible things in righteousness by which it is too probable he will answer our prayers for the coming of his kingdom which the reading of your book has disclosed in the world's history.

If we are within a few years of the Millennium as some think, then we are near to a terrible time of refiners' fire and fullers' soap, a thorough purging of the floor which will make sad havoc in fashionable religion. The signs of the times plainly enough declare the approach of judgments in the earth, and the word of God gives us his usual rule of procedure. Begin at my house. Yes, my dear sir, it is too plain to be denied that the Lord hath a controversy with the nations—with this nation above all others. You only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore will I visit you for your iniquities. When the storm bursts over Europe, we shall not remain long mere idle spectators.

A very short opportunity is yet left us to work the works of Him that sent us. Let us do what our hands find to do with all their might. We have an Almighty ally who will appear in the hour of conflict. Blessed are all they who trust in him. That He may guide you into all truth, and make you strong in the Lord and open wide doors of usefulness before you, that you may save many souls from death, is the prayer of Affectionately yours,

ROBERT PATTERSON."

Obituary Notices.

Died, at his residence in West Becket, Mass., April 12th, 1859, of the Pneumo-Pleuritis, EPHRAIM WALKER, in the 61st year of his age.

In early life he gave his heart to his Savior and united with the Baptist church, and to the last maintained his christian integrity. In 1840 he was led to take hold unto the more sure word of prophecy, and felt that the consummation of all things spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began, was near; and when the proclamation went forth, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" he responded, Even so come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly! and expected ere this to have seen the King in his beauty and been arrayed in robes of immortality.

When he was taken sick he said his sickness was unto death, and said he had no desire to live, but longed to depart and be with Christ, which was far better. Bro. Carter called to see him. Father wished him to pray with him. He asked father what he should pray for. He replied, "For an abundant entrance into the kingdom." When Bro. C. ended praying, father exclaimed, "Open, ye gates, ye everlasting doors, and let the King of glory in." He called for the Pilgrim's Progress and wished to have read to him where Christian crossed the river, and with ecstasy of soul he exclaimed, "I am almost over the river." He prayed for patience to wait his appointed time. He retained his reason to the last, and when dying he exclaimed, "I'm going!" and wished to say more, but speech failed. Thus he fell asleep in Jesus to await the morn of the resurrection, when Jesus shall come, who says, "I am the resurrection and the life, and whoso believeth in me, though he were dead, yet he shall live, and I will raise him up at the last day." We mourn and weep at our great loss, but we sorrow not as those who have no hope, for those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. It is then I hope to meet my dear father and mother, who have gone before, to part no more forever. By father's request, Bro. Morgan, of North Becket, preached his funeral sermon. His text was Rev. 9: 12.

Thus let them slumber till Christ from the skies
Bids them in glorified bodies arise;
Singing, as upward they spring from the tomb,
Victory! victory! Jesus hath come!

LOUISA M. W. HORTON.

Eden, N. Y., April 25, 1859.

Died, in South Livermore, Me., Feb. 25th, 1859, SARAH A., daughter of John A. and Martha A. True, aged seventeen years and eight months.

Her disease was consumption. She was a great sufferer, yet never murmured, but was perfectly resigned to her lot. Although in the bloom of youth, Sarah had chosen the good part, and when the hour of her death approached, she met it with a calm resignation, trusting in Him who doeth all things well. She was converted about one year ago, and united with the Christian church in Livermore. The last meeting she ever attended, was the quarterly conference at Belgrade, last fall. She was taken sick soon after returning home, but the blessed hope of the gospel comforted and sustained her through her sufferings.

Sister Sarah possessed the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, and was beloved by all her acquaintances. She leaves a widowed mother, with brothers and sisters, to mourn her loss, but they have the assurance that she sleeps in Jesus, and that when He who is her life shall appear, then will she appear with him in glory, when this mortal shall have put on immortality, and then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory!

The christian is fearless, though nearing the tomb,
For the torch-light of promise shall light up its gloom,
Christ says, I will raise thee again, do not fear,
Thy Father, thy Portion, thy Savior is near!"

E. M. HAGGETT.

PALMER, an infant child of H. H. Arnold, aged nine months, died in Mount Pleasant, Minnesota, the 12th inst.

Bro. and Sr. Arnold have followed three of their children to the grave, yet they sorrow not as those who have no hope, they are cheered by that declaration,—"I am the resurrection and the life," and are consoled with the belief that their children shall come again from the land of the enemy.

Sleep on, loved darling, in the dust
Till the last trump shall bid you rise,
On that blest morn, among the just
To meet the Savior in the skies.

O! glorious morn triumphant day!
When Christ shall wake his sleeping dead,
Then our Destroyer he will slay,
And all his saints will join their Head.

We have a hope of life to come,
A hope that bids all sorrow flee,
Eternal life beyond the tomb,
A crown of immortality.

A. G. H.

Florence, Minn., April 25th, 1859.

Died, in Rutland, Vt., of brain fever, April 6th, 1859, ALBERT W., son of Bro. Thomas and Sr. Mary A. George, aged nine years.

This was a lovely boy, because he was good and trusted in Jesus. Though young, he manifested the sense and virtue of riper years. His resignation, during his sufferings, was such as is peculiar to the christian. He met death with calm composure, expecting to sleep till the Savior comes to raise the loved one, and give him again to the embrace of those whose hearts are now bleeding with deep sorrow. The funeral was at the Methodist church, and attended by a large audience of sympathizing friends.—ED.

THE WAR CRISIS

The London Times of the 21st ult. issued a special edition, containing the following telegram:

Turin, April 21. Gyulai, the Austrian commander in Lombardy, has been ordered to present an ultimatum for the disarmament of Piedmont and the sending away of the volunteers. If refused, war is to be declared in three days. Two more divisions of the Austrian army, of 80,000 men, have been ordered to the Ticino. The English proposal for a Congress upon the same conditions as that at Laybach has been refused.

The Times adds the following: "We have reason to believe that the same intelligence has been received by the Government. A cabinet council was at once summoned. The English Government is said to have promptly telegraphed to Vienna the strongest protest against the above measure."

The Evening Herald of the same date has a similar announcement, and it is otherwise confirmed.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times telegraphs under date of Thursday noon, as follows: "Day before yesterday Austria forwarded a categorical summons to Sardinia to dissolve the free corps. A reply is to be given within three days of the receipt of the summons, and an evasive answer will be considered equivalent to a refusal."

The Paris Moniteur of Friday says: "Austria has not given her adhesion to the propositions made by England and accepted by France, Russia and Prussia, besides which, it appears that the Cabinet of Vienna have resolved upon addressing a direct communication to the Cabinet of Turin, in order to obtain the disarmament of Piedmont. In consequence of these facts, the Emperor has ordered the concentration of several divisions of the army on the frontiers of Piedmont."

The Patrie says: "General Marmora has informed the French government by telegraph that the Austrian army had made a significant movement on the strategical line of Ticino, and that he feared being attacked at any moment."

The Emperor Napoleon held a council of Ministers, and it was attended by Princes Jerome and Napoleon as Princes of the blood.

The King of Sardinia also held a council of Ministers on Thursday, the 21st.

VIENNA, Friday. The following official statement is published: "Piedmont, which has for some years past endangered Austria's rights, has been summoned most urgently by Austria to disarm. Besides this demand, expressly addressed to Piedmont, Austria adheres firmly to the proposal for the general disarmament, although she cannot make that proposal subordinate to the summons she has sent to Sardinia."

The Constitutionnel announces that part of the army of Paris had received orders to hold itself in readiness to march.

LATEST.

LONDON, Saturday. After the Cabinet meeting on Thursday, a dispatch was sent to the Austrian government, expressing the strong disapproval of the British government of the peremptory course adopted by Austria.

The Daily News says the reply of the Emperor of Austria had been received. He declines to reconsider the responsibility in commencing the war in the heart of Europe.

Count Buol declares that his master having taken his course will pursue it to the end.

The Times says that the Imperial Manifesto which is to accompany the declaration of war against Sardinia, is already prepared. Austria, mistress of the position, is ready by act of State and deed of war, to initiate the sanguinary drama upon which the curtain is about to rise. There is no doubt but that a general move of French forces has taken place on the entire Piedmontese frontiers.

The English journals generally think that the last chance of peace has about vanished, and speculate on the opening movements of the campaign.

The London Herald gives in a semi official form some specific and exclusive information relating to the movements of the French army. It says that orders have been given for the embarkation at Toulon of 30,000 men. These troops are not, however, to sail till further orders.

The divisions at Lyons, Grenoble, Besancon, etc., have also received orders to be ready to march at a minute's notice, but not to move till further instructions. The total French force destined to co-operate with Sardinia, in the event of war, estimated at 80,000, will be in two divisions, one commanded by Canrobert, and the other by Baraguay D'Hilliers, the whole acting under the command of the Emperor in person.

FRANCE

The Herald's Paris correspondent says: "Preparations for war are pushed forward with feverish rapidity, notwithstanding the professions of a willingness to disarm.

The Times Paris correspondent says, it is certain that there is no cessation of armaments. Troops continued to concentrate at Lyons. An army is to be concentrated on the Rhine frontier, and several cavalry regiments had already commenced marching thither. A regiment of hussars had been ordered to proceed by forced marches to the Piedmontese frontiers. The French soldiers on renewable furlough are reported to have been called in.

Gen. Randon is spoken of as Major General of the army on the Piedmont frontiers. The infantry division of the army of Paris was to leave Paris for Toulon by railway on the evening of the 22d.

PRUSSIA

It is stated that the mission of the Archduke Albrecht, of Austria, was most completely successful, he having signed a military convention with Prussia, by which the latter engages to send to the Rhine an army of 250,000 men under the personal command of the Prince Regent, if the negotiations for peace fail. This force will be further increased by the contingent of Bavaria, 60,000 strong, and the Eighth Federal Army corps of 60,000, whilst the other contingents will be held ready to march. The newspapers in Prussia, it is said, had been requested not to publish anything connected with the preparations for war or the movements of troops.

AUSTRIA

The Austrian Southern Railway was retained for the exclusive service of government, and troops and ammunition were being constantly conveyed over it.

The danger of war was considered so imminent at Frankfort that the Federal Diet, which had been holding secret sessions, resolved not to adjourn for the Easter holidays.

It is reported that the Austrians had entered the Duchies of Tuscany, Parma and Modena.

QUEBEC, May 9. Steamer Anglo-Saxon from Liverpool 27th ult., arrived here this morning. Her dates are four days later than the advices per Niagara.

The crisis in Europe continues, but as yet there had been no declaration of war.

Sardinia replied to Austria's ultimatum on the 20th. The result is not known.

Austria was expected to cross the Ticino at any moment, although it was reported she had agreed to another proposed mediation by England, and had granted 14 days delay.

The French troops had entered Piedmont, and great warlike activity prevails throughout France.

The French Corps Legislatif met at Paris on the 26, to receive the government statement. Walewski made a statement, throwing all the blame of the present position of affairs on Austria.

The proposed loan of 500,000,000 francs was announced, and the contingent for the year is to be raised to 140,000 men.

Prussia, England and Russia have all protested against the conduct of Austria.

LATER

Per Steamship Adelaide. Three days later from Europe. Advices of 29th.

Hostilities have all but commenced.

French troops were pouring into Piedmont.

The government of Tuscany have joined France and Piedmont.

French troops were landing at Genoa in large numbers, and were enthusiastically received.

The King of Sardinia has gone to join his army in Allessandria.

The Tuscan army have called on the Grand Duke to join France and Piedmont, and declare war against Austria. He declined and fled, and Tuscany declared a Military Dictatorship.

Warlike preparations are going forward in England.

Active military movements were going on throughout France.

Eighty thousand French troops were expected to have arrived in Italy by the day the Adelaide sailed.

Denmark is reported to have concluded a treaty, offensive and defensive, with France.

LONDON, Saturday noon. The Austrian manifesto has been issued, and is tantamount to a declaration of war.

PARIS, Saturday. The Austrians have crossed the Ticino, and commenced hostilities. This is official.

Brief Expositions.

NO. VIII.—FAITH REASONABLE AND EASY.

"If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater."—1 John 5: 9.

You may have heard a great deal about the difficulty of believing the gospel, but you never saw that doctrine asserted by the Holy Spirit; on the contrary, the Bible invariably, as in the text, so speaks as to convince the attentive reader that it is easy for him to credit the message of salvation. How many speak as if God were the only being in the universe whose word it was difficult to receive! Let the reasoning in the verse under consideration guide us all to a right understanding of this point. The argument is simple, rational, irresistible. We receive the witness—the testimony—the word—of man, and surely we ought at least as readily to admit the true sayings of God. We say "at least as readily," but the language is almost profane. Believe God at least as readily as man! Alas! that we are driven to argue in this style; but we must do so for the sake of scattering the gross darkness thrown around human power and duty.

When a man utters any intelligible statement in our hearing, what is it that induces us to admit it—to receive it as true? It is the known worth of the speaker's moral character. We reject the testimony of a habitual liar, in almost all circumstances; we reasonably hesitate when we are addressed by a stranger; and we instinctively admit the declaration of one possessing well-tried veracity. And, now, who proclaims the Gospel? It is the God of truth. Men may lie, God cannot: men may even unintentionally deceive us, God cannot lead us astray. In every sense, then, the witness of God is greater, that is, MUCH MORE WORTHY OF BEING BELIEVED. Infinitely more so. That the reader may believe the divine message—the gospel of his salvation—the fact that Jesus loved him and bore his sins on the tree,—that Jesus is loving him still and is most willing to impart to him eternal life in the glorious kingdom about to be revealed—let him reflect for a moment, and surely a longer period cannot be required, on the transcendently holy character of Him who addresses him from the throne. Think of the divine speaker, and as you apprehend more and more clearly who addresses you, and the absolute holiness of his name, you must discover ample ground to rest on his word—and you rest on it just as you rest on the word of man—with instantaneous, increasing, delightful and unwavering confidence.

When our Lord preached to the Jews, he never taught them that they were unable to believe his word; his language was, "If I say the truth, why do ye not believe me?" He did not say, even though I speak the truth, ye cannot believe me. John 8: 46. Having the truth, and of course evidence that it was the truth, he intimates to them that they could demand no more, and that their unbelief was without excuse. O reader, you have the truth—the Gospel truth—and you are as fully qualified to believe it as any other message that ever was announced in your hearing. Believe, therefore, and live.

NO. IX.—JESUS' SELF-SACRIFICING LOVE.

"The Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."—Gal. 2: 20.

So says Paul; and from these few words he drew all his salvation and all his joy. It was enough for him, a sinner, going on to judgment, that Jesus had loved him, and given himself for him. You see that the love of Jesus for Paul was not the effect of any love for Jesus on Paul's part; it was with Jesus that the love originated, and it was the fact of his loving Saul, the sinner, that filled the persecutor's heart with peace, and melted him into love and submission. How great the proof of Jesus' love for "the chief of sinners!" He "gave himself for me." It was not gold that he tendered for Paul's salvation; had that been sufficient, he could have presented abundance of it, for "the silver and the gold" were his: it was not a vast and varied pile of animals in sacrifice; if that could have purchased the rebel's life, Jesus might easily have paid the price, for "the beasts of the forest" were his, "and the cattle on a thousand hills;" but he gave HIMSELF—he submitted to shame—to torture—to death! Oh, what love! It is high as heaven and deeper than the unseen world. Eph. 3: 16–19.

Now, reader, this is a sweet verse for you to meditate upon; and lovingly we recommend you to turn it over and over in your mind. It may be you exclaim, "would that I loved Jesus!"—and you wonder how you can reach that state of affection. Perhaps you are awfully impressed, and certainly you ought to be so, with these words, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be Anathema Maranatha," that is, accursed—devoted to destruction—at his coming. How can you love him, then? How can you escape this terrific doom? You can only love him in one way, and that is by being made acquainted with his love for you. Jesus loves you already—even now! My fellow-sinner, think of that! He gave himself for you, since he gave himself "a ransom for all," and for "the world," and for "the whole world," etc. [illegible] you as certainly as you are [illegible] in the universe of God. [illegible] you some of the im-[illegible] mortal Luther's precious observations on this favorite text. When you read what he says of himself, I implore you to insert your name in place of his, and in that way you shall the more likely reap substantial profit.

"Who is this me? Even I, wretched and damnable one, so dearly beloved of the Son of God, that he gave himself for me. If I, then, through works or merits, could have loved the Son of God, and so come in to him, what needed he to deliver himself for me?"

"If I, being a wretch and a damned sinner, could be redeemed by any other price, what needed the Son of God to be given for me? But because there was no other price either in heaven or in earth, but Christ the Son of God, therefore it was most necessary that he should be delivered for me. Moreover, this he did of inestimable love; for Paul saith, 'which loved me.'"

Read, therefore, with great vehemency, these words 'me' and 'for me,' and so inwardly practise with thyself, that thou, with a sure faith, mayest conceive and print this 'me' in thy heart, and apply it unto thyself, not doubting but that thou art of the number of those to whom this 'me' belongeth: also that Christ hath not only loved Peter and Paul, and given himself for them, but that the same grace, also, which is comprehended in this 'me,' as well pertaineth and cometh unto us as unto him."

For the Crisis.

Travels and Incidental Items.

I informed the friends, in a previous article, of preaching in Newburg, on the eve of my arrival, with usual freedom; although I cannot recall the time when I was more exhausted. I did not sleep any the night before—was out in the blustering wind the most of the day previous, and walked some eight or more miles—walked the levee all night in the cold atmosphere and strong wind, waiting for boat—found no sleep on boat the next day on account of a band of music that had been employed, by the officers of said boat, to cheer the crew and dispel fear, I suppose, while they were running a race with another boat on a heavy wager. However, the good providence of God frustrated their design in their race, (the wind being high they could not start at the hour), and I was only annoyed by the constant music, which I could have borne well if nature had not pleaded so hard for rest.

I will here refer to a circumstance when on boat. While reading an Advent paper, a gentleman caught its heading and inquired, rather abruptly, I thought, for a stranger, "If I took that paper?" I answered him readily in the affirmative. He then very frankly commenced talking of the '43 and '44 movement, and his connection with the Advent people at that time. I learned he was preaching the doctrine of the coming kingdom at the time mentioned. He came West some ten years since, and had been practising medicine on the eclectic system, in Iraquoise Co., Ill. Had preached occasionally—always spoke his sentiments on the Advent faith freely, when preaching, and on all proper occasions. He was acquainted with most of the preachers in the East and brethren in different localities. Spoke of them with much warmth and affection. Evidently, on recalling those times, it kindled up the spark which some call the "Advent Glory," that may have been nearly quenched by the long cold rain and hail storm we have had in this State for the last fourteen months.

His name is M. C. Phiney. Many of your readers will be glad to hear from him, no doubt, even if it is a hasty sketch. He informed me Bro. George Needham lived in the same county and town, if I mistake not. They both have the same P. O. address—"Onarga, Iraquoise Co., Ill." They have been almost drowned out in that part of the State (Eastern part) as well as here in the Western part. The effect is obvious, great suffering for the comforts of life, even for daily bread.

As strange as it may appear, in a land where thousands of bushels of corn and wheat lie over, in almost every township,—corn a drug—potatoes difficult to give them away, and all eatables for man and beast abound, and thus it was two years ago, if I mistake not; yet now there is not grain enough in the country to supply its inhabitants. Many must suffer; yes, they do now suffer for want of bread-stuff. Hundreds, and I may safely say, thousands of cattle have died the past winter for want of feed. One man—a farmer—told me he had lost eighty head of cattle and six horses the past winter. True, others have not lost so many and perhaps, not so many in proportion to their number as the one spoken of, yet nearly all have shared in the loss to a greater or less extent. As to hogs, I have no definite idea of their destruction. If they were all to die I should consider it a great blessing to the human family, instead of a real loss. The flesh of swine genders too many diseases, to be of much value; but, as the people look at it differently, and consider hogs of much value, no doubt a great many of them have become food for the buzzards [illegible]. However, the people say but little about losing hogs; in fact, they keep so many, a [illegible] be missed by [illegible]. Yet I am frequently reminded (especially this Spring) of the language of a certain one describing Western hogs: "They are very large, and so poor, they lean against a tree to steady themselves while rooting—thought it would take two to make a shadow."

I will only add, in conclusion, the oldest settlers say, they never saw such times in this State before, and think there never has been a time when bread-stuff was so scarce, and so many suffering for want of it as now. However many other comforts the early settlers of this State have had to forego, the staple articles of life have never been wanting, if I have been rightly informed.

I intended in this article to have given an account of the novel time I had in Newburg; but other things have made the article too lengthy already. Hence, as I long since learned that long articles are not generally read with much interest, I will close this, and give it in my next.

Fables of Infidelity.

"You have rightly estimated my design in preparing these tracts for the masses. I have followed John Wesley's charge to his preachers, Fire low. My level is that of the dock yard and machine shop, where the stronghold of infidelity now lies, untouched by any tracts which I could hear of. Hence this method to simplify science and theology to such minds, vigorous and half cultivated," etc.—Extract from a letter from the author.

The Great Controversy.

Extract from a letter from R. Patterson, author of "Fables of Infidelity."

"I never entertained the current belief that we are destined to walk into the Millennium on Brussels' carpets, with all our silks and jewelry, our luxury and vanity, and pride and covetousness. The whole spirit of the word of God is against such a dream. But I had not those solemn views of the awful grandeur of the Lord's controversy with his own people and of the terrible things in righteousness by which it is too probable he will answer our prayers for the coming of his kingdom which the reading of your book has disclosed in the world's history.

If we are within a few years of the Millennium, as some think, then we are near to a terrible time of refiners' fire and fullers' soap, a thorough purging of the floor which will make sad havoc in fashionable religion. The signs of the times plainly enough declare the approach of judgments in the earth, and the word of God gives us his usual rule of procedure. Begin at my house. Yes, my dear sir, it is too plain to be denied that the Lord hath a controversy with the nations—with this nation above all others. You only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore will I visit you for your iniquities. When the storm bursts over Europe, we shall not remain long mere idle spectators.

A very short opportunity is yet left us to work the works of Him that sent us. Let us do what our hands find to do with all their might. We have an Almighty ally who will appear in the hour of conflict. Blessed are all they who trust in him. That He may guide you into all truth, and make you strong in the Lord, and open wide doors of usefulness before you, that you may save many souls from death, is the prayer of Affectionately yours,

ROBERT PATTERSON."

Obituary Notices.

Died, at his residence in West Becket, Mass., April 12th, 1859, of the Pneumo-Pleuritis, EPHRAIM WALKER, in the 61st year of his age.

In early life he gave his heart to his Savior and united with the Baptist church, and to the last maintained his christian integrity. In 1840 he was led to take heed unto the more sure word of prophecy, and felt that the consummation of all things spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began, was near; and when the proclamation went forth, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" he responded, Even so come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly! and expected ere this to have seen the King in his beauty and been arrayed in robes of immortality.

When he was taken sick he said his sickness was unto death, and said he had no desire to live, but longed to depart and be with Christ, which was far better. Bro. Carter called to see him. Father wished him to pray with him. He asked father what he should pray for. He replied, "For an abundant entrance into the kingdom." When Bro. C. ended praying, father exclaimed, "Open, ye gates, ye everlasting doors, and let the King of glory in." He called for the Pilgrim's Progress and wished to have read to him where Christian crossed the river, and with ecstasy of soul he exclaimed, "I am almost over the river." He prayed for patience to wait his appointed time. He retained his reason to the last, and when dying he exclaimed, "I'm going!" and wished to say more, but speech failed. Thus he fell asleep in Jesus to await the morn of the resurrection, when Jesus shall come, who says, "I am the resurrection and the life, and whoso believeth in me, though he were dead, yet he shall live, and I will raise him up at the last day." We mourn and weep at our great loss, but we sorrow not as those who have no hope, for those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. It is then I hope to meet my dear father and mother, who have gone before, to part no more forever. By father's request, Bro. Morgan, of North Becket, preached the funeral sermon. His text was Eccl. 9: 10.

Thus let them slumber till Christ from the skies
Bids them in glorified bodies arise;
Singing, as upward they spring from the tomb,
Victory! victory! Jesus hath come!

LOUISA M. W. HORTON.

Eden, N. Y., April 25, 1850.

Died, in South Livermore, Me., Feb. 25th, 1859, SARAH A., daughter of John A. and Martha A. True, aged seventeen years and eight months.

Her disease was consumption. She was a great sufferer, yet never murmured, but was perfectly resigned to her lot. Although in the bloom of youth, Sarah had chosen the good part, and when the hour of her death approached, she met it with a calm resignation, trusting in Him who doeth all things well. She was converted about one year ago, and united with the Christian church in Livermore. The last meeting she ever attended, was the quarterly conference at Belgrade, last fall. She was taken sick soon after returning home, but the blessed hope of the gospel comforted and sustained her through her sufferings.

Sister Sarah possessed the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, and was beloved by all her acquaintances. She leaves a widowed mother, with brothers and sisters, to mourn her loss; but they have the assurance that she sleeps in Jesus, and that when He who is her life shall appear, then will she appear with him in glory; when this mortal shall have put on immortality, and then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory!

"The christian is fearless, though nearing the tomb,
For the torch-light of promise shall light up its gloom;
Christ says, I will raise thee again, do not fear,
Thy Father, thy Portion, thy Savior is near!"

E. M. HAGGETT.

PALMER, an infant child of H. H. Arnold, aged nine months, died in Mount Pleasant, Minnesota, the 12th inst.

Bro. and Sr. Arnold have followed three of their children to the grave, yet they sorrow not as those who have no hope; they are cheered by that declaration,—"I am the resurrection and the life," and are consoled with the belief that their children shall come again from the land of the enemy.

Sleep on, loved darling, in the dust,
Till the last trump shall bid you rise;
On that blest morn, among the just,
To meet the Savior in the skies.

O! glorious morn, triumphant day!
When Christ shall wake his sleeping dead;
Then our Destroyer he will slay,
And all his saints will join their Head.

We have a hope of life to come,
A hope that bids all sorrow flee;
Eternal life beyond the tomb,
A crown of immortality.

A. G. H.

Florence, Minn., April 25th, 1859.

Died, in Rutland, Vt., of brain fever, April 6th, 1859, ALBERT W., son of Bro. Thomas and Sr. Mary A. George, aged nine years.

This was a lovely boy, because he was good and trusted in Jesus. Though young, he manifested the sense and virtue of riper years. His resignation, during his sufferings, was such as is peculiar to the christian. He met death with calm composure, expecting to sleep till the Savior comes to raise the loved one, and give him again to the embrace of those whose hearts are now bleeding with deep sorrow. The funeral was at the Methodist church, and attended by a large audience of sympathizing friends.—ED.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Per steamship Niagara, from Liverpool the 23d ult.

THE WAR CRISIS.

The London Times of the 21st ult. issued a special edition, containing the following telegram:

Turin, April 21. Gyulai, the Austrian commander in Lombardy, has been ordered to present an ultimatum for the disarmament of Piedmont and the sending away of the volunteers. If refused, war is to be declared in three days. Two more divisions of the Austrian army, of 80,000 men, have been ordered to the Ticino. The English proposal for a Congress upon the same conditions as that at Laybach has been refused.

The Times adds the following: "We have reason to believe that the same intelligence has been received by the Government. A cabinet council was at once summoned. The English Government is said to have promptly telegraphed to Vienna the strongest protest against the above measure."

The Evening Herald of the same date has a similar announcement, and it is otherwise confirmed.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times telegraphs under date of Thursday noon, as follows: "Day before yesterday Austria forwarded a categorical summons to Sardinia to dissolve the free corps. A reply is to be given within three days of the receipt of the summons, and an evasive answer will be considered equivalent to a refusal."

The Paris Moniteur of Friday says: "Austria has not given her adhesion to the propositions made by England and accepted by France, Russia and Prussia; besides which, it appears that the Cabinet of Vienna have resolved upon addressing a direct communication to the Cabinet of Turin, in order to obtain the disarmament of Piedmont. In consequence of these facts, the Emperor has ordered the concentration of several divisions of the army on the frontiers of Piedmont."

The Patrie says: "General Marmora has informed the French government by telegraph that the Austrian army had made a significant movement on the strategical line of Ticino, and that he feared being attacked at any moment."

The Emperor Napoleon held a council of Ministers, and it was attended by Princes Jerome and Napoleon as Princes of the blood.

The King of Sardinia also held a council of Ministers on Thursday, the 21st.

VIENNA, Friday. The following official statement is published: "Piedmont, which has for some years past endangered Austria's rights, has been summoned most urgently by Austria to disarm. Besides this demand, expressly addressed to Piedmont, Austria adheres firmly to the proposal for the general disarmament, although she cannot make that proposal subordinate to the summons she has sent to Sardinia."

The Constitutionnel announces that part of the army of Paris had received orders to hold itself in readiness to march.

LATEST.

LONDON, Saturday. After the Cabinet meeting on Thursday, a dispatch was sent to the Austrian government, expressing the strong disapproval of the British government of the peremptory course adopted by Austria.

The Daily News says the reply of the Emperor of Austria had been received. He declines to reconsider the responsibility in commencing the war in the heart of Europe.

Count Buol declares that his master having taken his course will pursue it to the end.

The Times says that the Imperial Manifesto which is to accompany the declaration of war against Sardinia, is already prepared. Austria, mistress of the position, is ready by act of State and deed of war, to initiate the sanguinary drama upon which the curtain is about to rise. There is no doubt but that a general move of French forces has taken place on the entire Piedmontese frontiers.

The English journals generally think that the last chance of peace has about vanished, and speculate on the opening movements of the campaign.

The London Herald gives in a semi-official form some specific and exclusive information relating to the movements of the French army. It says that orders have been given for the embarkation at Toulon of 30,000 men. These troops are not, however, to sail till further orders.

The divisions at Lyons, Grenoble, Besancon, etc, have also received orders to be ready to march at a minute's notice, but not to move till further instructions. The total French force destined to co-operate with Sardinia, in the event of war, estimated at 80,000, will be in two divisions, one commanded by Canrobert, and the other by Baraguay D'Hilliers, the whole acting under the command of the Emperor in person.

FRANCE.

The Herald's Paris correspondent says: "Preparations for war are pushed forward with feverish rapidity, notwithstanding the professions of a willingness to disarm.

The Times Paris correspondent says, it is certain that there is no cessation of armaments. Troops continued to concentrate at Lyons. An army is to be concentrated on the Rhine frontier, and several cavalry regiments had already commenced marching thither. A regiment of hussars had been ordered to proceed by forced marches to the Piedmontese frontiers. The French soldiers on renewable furlough are reported to have been called in.

Gen Randon is spoken of as Major General of the army on the Piedmont frontiers. The infantry division of the army of Paris was to leave Paris for Toulon by railway on the evening of the 22d.

PRUSSIA.

It is stated that the mission of the Archduke Albrecht, of Austria, was most completly successful, he having signed a military convention with Prussia, by which the latter engages to send to the Rhine an army of 250,000 men under the personal command of the Prince Regent, if the negotiations for peace fail. This force will be further increased by the contingent of Bavaria, 60,000 strong, and the Eighth Federal Army corps of 60,000, whilst the other contingents will be held ready to march. The newspapers in Prussia, it is said, had been requested not to publish anything connected with the preparations for war or the movements of troops.

AUSTRIA.

The Austrian Southern Railway was retained for the exclusive service of government, and troops and ammunition were being constantly conveyed over it.

The danger of war was considered so imminent at Frankfort that the Federal Diet, which had been holding secret sessions, resolved not to adjourn for the Easter holidays.

It is reported that the Austrians had entered the Duchies of Tuscany, Parma and Modena.

QUEBEC, May 9. Steamer Anglo-Saxon from Liverpool 27th ult., arrived here this morning. Her dates are four days later than the advices per Niagara.

The crisis in Europe continues, but as yet there had been no declaration of war.

Sardinia replied no Austria's ultimatum on the 20th. The result is not known.

Austria was expected to cross the Ticino at any moment, although it was reported she had agreed to another proposed mediation by England, and had granted 14 days delay.

The French troops had entered Piedmont, and great warlike activity prevails throughout France.

The French Corps Legislatif met at Paris on the 26, to receive the government statement. Walewski made a statement, throwing all the blame of the present position of affairs on Austria.

The proposed loan of 500,000,000 francs was announced, and the contingent for the year is to be raised to 140,000 men.

Prussia, England and Russia have all protested against the conduct of Austria.

LATER

Per Steamship Adelaide. Three days later from Europe Advices of 29th.

Hostilities have all but commenced.

French troops were pouring into Piedmont.

The government of Tuscany have joined France and Piedmont.

French troops were landing at Genoa in large numbers, and were enthusiastically received.

The King of Sardinia has gone to join his army in Allessandria.

The Tuscan army have called on the Grand Duke to join France and Piedmont, and declare war against Austria. He declined and fled, and Tuscany declared a Military Dictatorship.

Warlike preparations are going forward in England.

Active military movements were going on throughout France.

Eighty thousand French troops were expected to have arrived in Italy by the day the Adelaide sailed.

Denmark is reported to have concluded a treaty, offensive and defensive, with France.

LONDON, Saturday noon. The Austrian manifesto has been issued, and is tantamount to a declaration of war.

PARIS, Saturday. The Austrians have crossed the Ticino, and commenced hostilities. This is official.

'Tis Sweet to be at Rest.

'Tis sweet to be at rest,
From every doubt and fear,
Of heavenly peace possessed,
Even while [illegible] here;
And such a peace doth Jesus give
To those who by believing live.

The [illegible] amid the toils,
The battle, and its blood,
To know that sorrows all
Are working for our good;
Such trust have we who look above,
And dwell in God, and dwell in love.

'Tis sweet, when toils are past,
And every conflict won,
To hear our Lord at last
Pronounce the word, "well done!"
This joy have those whose hearts sincere
To life's last labor persevere.

The Good Fight.—The Victory.

"Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life."—1 Tim. 6: 12.

Practical preaching, that reaches and regulates the practice of the hearer, must have a foundation and an object. The foundation lies in man's pressing need; in God's wonderful love in Christ; and in the adaptability of all this love to supply our actual wants. The object is,—the crown of life in the kingdom of the King of kings.—Jas. 1: 12; Rev. 1: 5–7.

Practical preaching must of course be plain, doctrinal, or Gospel preaching; for otherwise it has neither Scripture nor common sense to recommend it. For to tell men to fight the good fight—run the race, and overcome the world, and without telling the occasion and object, the origin or end, is to be and appear a very "babe" before God, or good men.

Failure is the certain result of not knowing; for no preacher (nor person) can be "crowned, except he strive lawfully." The nature, rules and object of the warfare must be known, in order to "strive lawfully," according to the prescribed rules of the warfare.

The Gospel's "joyful sound" sounds mainly of "the kingdom." The Lord's supper is authorized "till he come" to call us to "the marriage supper of the Lamb." Baptism is a burial into "the likeness" of Christ's death, and a [illegible] in the likeness of his resurrection. Thus all parts of the Gospel refer to and reach on to "the consummation." Till then, the holy strife must be maintained by all who shall overcome. There is no peace nor truce. The war is deadly. Every advance is a real conquest; and victory to Christ and his people involves destruction to their foes. He will put down "all enemies" in "his time," and not before. Then he will be the only administrator of power—the blessed and only Potentate.

The [illegible] is not single handed, but combined. It involves all the evil against the good. "The flesh" is organized into "the world;" (of politics and pleasure and compromising religion) and all is pervaded and directed to one end by "the Devil." Thus, "the world, the flesh and the Devil" are all in hostile array against God and his gracious cause, by Jesus Christ and his church.—1 Pet. 5: 8–9; Jer. 17: 5; 1 John 2: 15; Eph. 6: 11–17. The combatants are active and unceasing. No peace can obtain till it shall be conquered. "The God of peace will bruise Satan under our feet shortly." Then "the Prince of peace" will reign in peace—give the kingdom to "his saints," and triumph in boundless, glorious, [illegible] deliverance!

"The good fight" must be altogether good; for it is all of God, and it is to end, infallibly, in everlasting good, throughout the vast universe of God—leaving no trace of sin or Satan, sickness or sorrow, pain or death, or hell.—Rev. 20: 14; 21: 1–5; 22: 3; Ps. 7: 9; 104: 35; Isa. 65: 17; 2 Pet. 3: 13, 14; John 1: 29; 1 John 3: 8. This was begun with the tempter, the creature, and time. It is to end finally with the close of earth's great work—the period of revealed distinctive time. All beyond is the "age of ages"—in untold eternal triumphs of all good. Amen and amen.

All warfare is good and honorable that is waged for, and ends in, securing a great and permanent good. This will end in all and endless good; and hence it is now "good." Other wars are oft excited on both sides by the worst passions; waged with the worst of motives; and even though successful for the time, end, even to the victors, in everlasting loss! But in this "good fight" the motive, object and end are all glorious, Godlike and unceasingly good. It is now to restrain; at last to conquer death, Devil and hell—leaving only the good. This good warfare is against all evil; it embodies in its gracious range all the good of earth and heaven; and is ultimately to attain all, and the only triumph, eternally. Our engagement in this "good fight" is by admitting, believing, confessing and [illegible] God's truth concerning it. Taking Christ's yoke, and living for [illegible] and bodily [illegible] "the [illegible] Matt. 6: 10–33; John 6: [illegible] consequence, it is ignorance and guilt—it is in aid of the enemy, to ignore prophecy; or to assume to preach practically for Christ, our coming, conquering King, "as they (in the opposition) can bear it." Of such, Christ and the Holy Ghost have spoken—"I never knew you."—Matt. 7: 21–23. Hear the Judge,—"Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." You must attain it, or perish.

Therefore all of us are to act and live; preach and pray; be all over and altogether engaged for God's revealed triumph! To those who overcome, (unbelief, erring theories and friends, fleshly and Satanic stumbling-blocks,) He will crown amid the seven-fold—manifested and exhaustless honors of the Kingdom. They shall be kings and priests unto God and his Christ, and reign with him over the earth.

The good prevail in this "fight" not alone; but in alliance with Christ and his cause. The victory will be an allied victory. The foes are to fall as allied foes; and hence all who ever become overcomers, must needs come to Christ—abide in Christ and each other—be filled with the Spirit, and maintain the cause of truth as God's truth! It is truth as a whole.—The armor of righteousness is made up of this heavenly metal. All its elements of faith, hope and strength, are of the Truth; and all aspects of Gospel truth ally its friends in everlasting league with God, and a coming Christ, to salvation.—Heb. 9: 28; 2 Tim. 4: 1–8; Rev. 12: 10.

It is then treason to the Holy Ghost and the kingdom of God, to suppress the truth as it relates to Christ's coming,—as the "Blessed and only Potentate." Now Death has a dreadful and deadly power. Hades has power "as a roaring lion." But soon our King, into whose alliance we have entered, by the obedience of faith, will take His great power and be King.—Rev. 11: 17. Then He only will have power! "The only Potentate" is then his title. Hades, death and the devil will then have no power. "Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." Amen.

Cause in the West.

Bro. Grant:—Since I last wrote, I have visited Onion Grove, Iowa. I spent one week; there was some interest, and some confessed the truth. I hope to visit them again soon. Visited Earleville, Lazelle Co., Ill., where I held a quarterly meeting. A number were added to the church. Visited Shabbona Grove church. Found them looking for that "blessed hope." Had a refreshing season. From there returned home, and spent a few days; preached to the churches in Cordova and Princeton. Visited Brown Co., spending a few days. Found Walker's Neck church prospering. Visited Ripley's church. They have had preachers there, who have distracted and almost destroyed them. I tried to strengthen the things that remain. Had a good time; the people began to rally again, but I was called to go to Mt. Pleasant to preach the funeral sermon of one of our sisters, (Sister Raymond), who died in the Lord. Returned north as far as Warren Co., and visited the churches there. Spent two weeks, baptized four, and received seven into the church.

This field is where Bro. Rathburn has been laboring the past year; he has met with good success; the Lord has blessed his labors, and given him many souls as seals of his ministry. I arrived home on Friday. Yesterday (Sunday) preached once in Cordova. Tuesday evening am to preach again. Subject—The rich man and Lazarus.

Wednesday, I start for Iowa; am to make a tour in Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. This is a great field, but how much we need faithful laborers in the vineyard. The field is ripe, the people want to hear. The times are hard, but the Gospel must be preached.

Preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom of God at hand, is not a money making business, in this world, but we think it is a good and safe investment, not on long credit, either, for the Master will come quickly.

I would say in conclusion, if there is any surplus change in the Lord's treasury East, or any where, that can be spared, to help advance the cause West, I wish the Treasurer would forward it.

The last year I have traveled about twenty-five hundred miles, through storm and mud, and have in my weak way been laboring day and night. I have averaged, in my preaching, once per day, and baptized one hundred or over, and organized five churches, composed of from twenty-one to forty members each. All are flourishing now; additions made since to all of them. I have tried to set in order other churches. The Lord has been with me by his Spirit.

During the past two years I have not received any more than my traveling expenses. We do not murmur; the Gospel must be preached. The Lord is at the door. I expect He will open some way before us. He will make all right soon; and for the present He knows what we need.

"The Gift of God is Eternal Life."

That we immortal joys might know,
The blest Redeemer died;
Immortal life doth only flow
From Jesus' wounded side!

Christ is the life; and all must die
To whom that fount is sealed.
Life's soldier reads a hope on high,
Upon his blood-stained shield.

Unto the truth we have a guide:
The Bible must be true!
Nor can the shades of darkness hide
Its splendors from our view.

Each page is like a guiding star,
To light us on the way
To where immortal glories are,
Of resurrection day!

And 'missioned from the burning throne,
Where is the "perfect day,"
Each guiding star that ever shone
Upon the christian's way—

And showed him that immortal life
Beyond the dark'ning gloom,
Beyond the rest from care and strife,
Beyond the silent tomb.

And showed to him the white robed throng,
Their blood-washed garments worn,
The crown, the robe, the harp, the song
Of resurrection morn!

And showed him that if he would rise
To that immortal life,
He must in warfare win the prize,
And gird himself for strife.

Hark! Jesus speaks—oh, sinners, think
What mercy great and high!
"Come, of the living waters drink,
And thou shalt never die!"

"Now cast upon me all thy care;
My life do I lay down,
That in my kingdom thou may'st wear
A bright, immortal crown!"

O Thou, our hope, our life, our love!
We know that Thou wilt be
The light that shineth from above
To lead us unto Thee!

And when, as victors in the strife,
We yield to Thee our breath,
O may we rise again to LIFE,
Nor know the second death!

Charity.—No. 5.

Charity is above the virtue of Martyrdom.—"Though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." A man may die for his opinions, and yet be destitute of true charity. Infidelity has had its martyrs. The Romish church hers; but both systems of faith are incompatible with "Charity" in a Scriptural sense. Many a professor in the Christian Church, no doubt, has died a martyr's death upon the block, or burned at the stake, or been given to the wild beasts to be devoured, and yet they were destitute of love.

Real christian martyrdom has the element of love in it, as exhibited in the death of Christ when he could pray for his enemies in the affecting language—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and as seen too—Stephen the first christian martyr, when with a "loud voice" he cried "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." A patriot may die for his country, and yet flee from the fires of persecution which would test his love for the good of universal man. There are patriots in our day; or who pretend to be,—who would fight in the face of the cannon's mouth in defence of our country against foreign invasion and a hostile foe; but will allow Roman Catholic influence to corrupt our politics,—destroy the purity of the ballot box, remove the Bible from the common school,—though the first book of moral culture in the world; and otherwise undermine the liberties and institutions of our beloved country,—and who will support the system of slavery, and its aggressive power to the extent of their influence, even to the crushing of its millions of victims, and yet suppose they are possessed of charity!

Charity is love to universal man;—to all created intelligences; and seeks the universal good and happiness of all.

"The State of Souls."

Under this heading there is an article in the editorial column of the Independent, that seems to have attracted some attention in the religious world; but which appears to me to be full of contradictions, and "flights of conjecture and discovery," as they seem to admit. They begin by an assertion without any evidence or proof. "One thing, however, we must believe in regard to it, (the soul) that it is in a state of active, vivid consciousness."

I do not see where this "must" comes from, it certainly does not come from the Bible; that declares that the dead know not anything, in that very day their thoughts perish. Neither does it follow from their after argument, for they admit that it is destitute of sensation; all the senses go to sleep in the grave, and whatever is dependent upon them becomes quiescent." They can neither see, hear, speak, or feel. They are "in the presence of Christ," and yet do not know where they are; they have no idea or cognizance of time; do not "know duration or change;" are not rewarded or punished." Is it no penalty to be under the dominion of death? But yet they are in a state of happiness or misery, "and have a vivid active consciousness." Was there ever such a jumble of contradictions and "flights of conjecture" and imagination as this?

Again, they acknowledge that very little is revealed in the Bible of an intermediate state, and that the resurrection is the period of future reward and punishment, and remark: "It is human to tattle in such promises; it is God-like to hold all in awful sequestration!" Who are the "tattlers" on this subject? Is it not those who pretend to explain by mere figments of the imagination, what they confess is not revealed in the book? Who strive to be wise above what is written; and thus prove that they are "human?"

Where there is such a strange variety of opinion on any subject, it must needs be, that conjecture and imagination is the baseless fabric on which men build, instead of the rock of Divine truth.

A noted Scotch minister remarked at a funeral the other day, that the lowest order of beings in the heavenly world were angels! The spirits of the redeemed were greatly superior to them in power and glory! Another popular minister, a few days after, told his people that the righteous, at death, were made equal to the angels! Then what need of a resurrection, for they will be at that time equal to the angels, and no more? Does not this system virtually do away with the great scriptural doctrine of "the resurrection of the dead?"

Where there are so many various and contradictory views of the state of the dead, it is evident that our would-be-wise men are, on this subject, altogether in the dark, and it is to be feared, will practically experience the truth of the old saying: "When the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch." They seem to have a marvelous faculty of seeing things that have no existence, and, at the same time, are utterly unable to discern what is clearly revealed in God's word as to the final abode of the righteous after the judgment of the great day.

Some locate the redeemed in Paradise, which, they tell us, is a part of Hades. Some place them in first, second, or third heaven. Some banish them "beyond the bounds of time and space," and all seem to forget the promise of God to give to those who love him an everlasting inheritance in the "New Heavens and the New Earth," in the New Jerusalem, that comes down from God out of Heaven on the earth. The righteous shall be recompenced on the earth.

Christ has promised to come again the second time, to set up his kingdom under the whole heavens; to subdue all things to himself; to reign over the house of Jacob forever; to destroy the kingdom of Satan, and to have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. Surely there are none so blind, as those who will not see the exceeding great and precious promises God has treasured up in his Word, for the consolation of his suffering and sanctified ones, that they shall reign with Christ in his kingdom.

In the prospect of this blessed hope Christ taught his disciples daily to hope and pray—"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth, as it is in heaven."

Home Missions.—No. 2.

In my first I put the question to our brethren in Maine,—shall we make another missionary effort? Some may reply, that nearly all our efforts are now on that principle. If this is so, then can we not put it on a footing to increase it, to direct our efforts to given points?

Here let me specify. We notice that in some of the States, a society is formed, a fund is raised and pledged, one or more faithful laborers are chosen and sent out as Evangelists, to preach where there is an ear to hear, to supply destitute churches with the word of life, and to open new interests for the message of the kingdom of God. These men go out to preach and visit, to pray and instruct, from "house to house," not to preach and peddle, nor to preach without time to study the word, and then retire to bed to study and pray, and plan how their family shall be fed and clothed, house rent and other bills met, until the night is spent, then to arise to pursue some scheme decided upon to earn the money. No; not to go out west under these embarrassments, but to go and labor with all his energies for the unsearchable riches of Christ; to present the claims of the Gospel, its hope, and the duty to support, as well as to hear and believe it, take up collections and receive what may be freely given for the mission, and his family be supported with the fund in the missionary treasury.

These are the points to which I wish to direct your attention. It is not to interfere with the labors of pastors of churches, nor to draw away their necessary support; but to call into action much that is now dormant,—to open a channel for those who are isolated from the treasury of the Lord, and to stir up others to enlist in the cause of truth, and to set men of God in the field who can and ought to preach constantly, but who cannot now do so because our means are not so directed as to sustain them. Let us remember God works by means. Yours in behalf of Christ,

I. C. Wellcome.

Morning.

"The watchman saith, 'The morning cometh.'"—Isa. 21: 12.

O, the dreary, dreary darkness, how it girds the stifled land!
How it falls in viewless torrents from the frowning midnight skies!
When shall Lucifer resplendent on the eastern mountains stand?
Will the morning never rise?

Tell me, oh ye bards prophetic, where in olden time ye stood,
When he saw the flying shadows and the swift-approaching day;
Saw its bannered army marching like a silver-rolling flood
Through the lands where darkness lay.

I have climbed these earthly Babels, many and many a time, to look
For the dawning of the morning in the eastern sky afar;
But I saw at brightest, only in some dim, cloud-circled nook,
One lone, faintly burning star.

Upward, upward through the darkness, mount on Faith's undrooping wing,
Till the dim horizon merges in Eternity's broad sea!
Till the eye shall catch the glory which the latter day shall bring
To the millions yet to be.

See the heavy, blinding shadows, lying sadly, like a pall,
On the nations that have never felt the gladness of the light.
And they love their weary groping: Father, hear us when we call,
Let the blind receive their sight!

O, let morning, radiant morning, come with healing in its breath,
Filling vale, and crowning mountain with the splendor of its beams;
Let the slumbering millions waken, are they sleep the sleep of death,
From the madness of their dreams!

Yonder! see the cloudy curtains of the East are rising now;
And the morning twilight glimmers, and the daylight follows fast;
Floods of radiance are streaming o'er the mountains' kindling brow;
Life and day have come at last!

See the startled nations waking: giants bursting from their chains;
Heroes, girding on their panoply and hasting to the field;
Hear a million voices singing on a thousand smiling plains
Of the glory just revealed.

* * * * * * *

Ah, how many hearts have waited for the glory of this time!
Beat their faintest, last pulsations with a yearning for the dawn;
Ah, how many ears have hearkened for this triumph note sublime,
Till both faith and sense were gone!

Sorrowing, yet rejoicing ever,—hoping for the promised gain,—
Struggling toward the great Hereafter with the earnestness of love,
Passed they through this world triumphant in a faith that reck'd not pain,
To a grander sight above.

In that city, built of sapphire, walled with jasper, paved with gold,
Where the Tree of Life is growing, crowned with heavenly fruitage fair,
Kingdoms, tribes and tongues and peoples shall be gathered and enrolled,

To a Certain Reader.

Fellow disciple, when were you last in your closet for devotional purposes? Did you go there because you desired and loved communion with God? Did you first of all read a portion of His word, with the feeling that you ought to hear him, before speaking to him? How long did you remain there? Did you grudge the time, or regard it as a sacrifice? Had you any spiritual perception of the presence of God, and did you feel that you was holding intercourse with Him at the mercy seat? Had you any humbling, refreshing view of Christ as the Mediator between you and infinite purity?

In your acknowledgment of mercies, were you sincerely grateful? Were your confessions prompted by a sense of guilt, and accompanied by deep emotions of penitence? How did your own moral nature appear when contrasted with the perfect holiness of God? Were your petitions the honest utterance of desires for favors which you really, earnestly wished to obtain? Did you remain on your knees until you had an inward assurance that your prayer was heard? Was it the prayer of faith?

Were you in no respect crippled or embarrassed by a conscious self-condemnation, occasioned by a recollection of your own inconsistencies? Did you remember no wrong done to others, for which you had made no reparation? Did you, from the heart, forgive all who had injured you? Was there no sin which conscience told you was unrepented of? Was you willing and anxious to give up every sin, however small, however inwrought into your habits? Did you make no secret reservation?

Did you fervently plead for the conversion of sinners? Had you, during the preceding twenty-four hours, done anything for the salvation of any soul, upon which you could ask the blessing of God? For whose conversion, in particular, did you pray?

When you came out of your closet, which way did your heart turn? Were you reluctant to leave the spot, or were you eager to get away and mingle with the world? How long did the influence of that season of devotion remain with you, and what was its effect upon your subsequent spirit and conscience? Do you long for the hour to arrive when you can again retire and hold communion with God?

Will you now turn to the following passages, and meditate upon them? Mat. 6: 6; Mark 11: 24–26; Psalm 66: 18; Gen. 32: 26; James 5: 16; Psalm 109: 4.—Watchman and Reflector.

☞ Truth will be uppermost, one time or other, like cork, though kept down in the water.

Forward!

A WORD FOR ANXIOUS INQUIRERS.

It is the first step that costs. When the Israelites came up to the Red Sea, the command of God was, "Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." But how? The Jewish leader might well cry out, We have no fleet to bear us over. "Go forward!" But, Lord! we cannot for the gulf before us. "Go forward!" Wouldst thou have us, Lord, to perish in the billows? Still the same answer comes—"Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." The command is peremptory. It admits of no delay. And just as soon as Israel goes forth in obedience to Jehovah's voice, lo! the waves part asunder, and the mighty cavalcade marches through, dry shod! Unhesitating obedience to God always insures a blessing.

Here is a lesson for troubled inquirers. To you comes the command of God, "Go forward." Death is behind you. Hell followeth hard after you. There is no salvation in retreat. Heaven lies before you—not behind. No man ever saved his soul by relapsing into indifference. If you give up you are lost.

1. Perhaps you say, "I have prayed many a time already, and no blessing has yet come." Will you cease to pray then? Will that bring an answer? As well might a voyager to Liverpool, when one hundred miles from port, put about his helm, and steer back to New York; he is almost there; why does the foolish man retreat? How many a soul has quit praying when the door of mercy was just about opening to him! Go forward.

2. Another one is kept back by fear of ridicule. He cannot stand a laugh. There is a sneer waiting for him at his father's table, or a cutting sarcasm in his counting-room. He wavers before it. He winces under the slightest word, and imagines terrible things in store for himself. Go forward; the sea will open to you, and so will many a heart to cheer you on. You will inspire respect in the very quarters from which you now expect opposition. He is a weakling who is pushed back with a straw.

3. A third person complains, "I am in the dark; I cannot see my way." Then go forward, and get out of the dark. The determination to do your duty will be attended by a luminous discernment of the path of duty. God will show you the way; only go forward, looking for The cross.

4. Unbelief draws back a fourth. There is only one way to conquer doubt. It is—to believe. Then, instead of halting and shivering in an ague-fit of indecision, take a bold decisive step. End the torturing uncertainty by going forward, "looking unto Jesus."

The only way to do a thing is to do it. God gives strength to the obedient. He has no promise for cowards or double-minded vacillating doubters. He bestows grace on those who try to do their duty. His grace is all-sufficient for you. The deepest sea of difficulties will divide its waters for your advancing footsteps, just as soon as you determine to obey that voice which says to you, Go forward.—Chr. Intel.

"There are battles fierce and many,
By our valor to be fought,
And we want for soldiers any
Who will fight as brave men ought;
Not with sword of glittering steel
Laying waste the fruitful lands,
But with humble, christian zeal,
And the Bible in our hands."

Christian Principle.

A few years ago, in a violent storm, a ship was driven upon the bar on the south shore of Long Island. The waves swept over the deck, and the crew clung for safety to the rigging. Upon the shore, a company of men were gathered who stood motionless by the life-boat which they dragged to the beach. They were appalled by the danger, and felt that it would be certain death to venture out upon such a sea. Suddenly, a man who had once been a sailor rushed down to the beach, took his place by the boat, and shouted, "Come, men, lend a hand; I've been there myself!" That appeal was enough. The life boat shot forth among the foaming breakers on its merciful though perilous mission, and the crew were saved. That sailor had experienced a similar peril; he had felt the joy of rescue, and was ready to hazard his life to carry the same boon to those shipwrecked men. So the christian, because of his experimental appreciation of the worth of the Gospel, labors successfully to extend its blessings when other men would yield to despair. He has seen flaming up before him the wrath of an offended God; and he has felt the embrace of a loving Father as he forgave and welcomed the returning prodigal. He was once in the horrible pit and the miry clay, and now his feet are planted upon the rock. His soul was once famishing and faint, and now he feels that he shall hunger no more; he shall thirst no more. Once he was without hope and without God in the world, and now he rejoices in the anticipation of eternal glory, and is able to look up to God and say, Abba, Father! Can such an one grow weary, or be disheartened, or shrink from danger in striving to extend the influence of the Gospel? Never!

The Bible.—Out of it have come all pure moralities. Forth from it have sprung all sweet charities. It has been the motive power of regeneration and reformation to millions of men. It has comforted the humble, consoled the mourning, sustained the suffering, and given trust and triumph to the dying. The wise old man has fallen asleep with it folded to his breast. The simple cottager has used it for his dying pillow; and even the innocent child has breathed his last happy sigh with his fingers between its promise-freighted leaves.—Timothy Titcomb.

God Unchangeable.—There are many christians like young sailors, who think the shore and the whole land do move, when the ship and they themselves are moved; just so, not a few imagine that God moveth, and faileth, and changeth places, because their godly souls are subject to alteration; but the foundation of the Lord abideth sure.—Rutherford.

A Lesson from the Birds.

"See how it rains, rains, rains," said little Mary Jellis, as she gazed from the closet window of her mother's chamber, longing to see the shower cease and the sun shine out bright and clear again. "Oh! mamma, it will never stop, and I do hate rainy weather." Just then a little bird, whose nest hung from a tree not far off, broke out in one of his sweetest strains, and Mary listened wonderingly.

"Hark, daughter, hear what the bird says," said her good mamma, who observed the fixed attention of her little one.

"Why, it only sings," answered Mary.

"Yes; but while you are fretting and whining in this nice, large room, with all your playthings around you, and doll waiting to be dressed, birdie sings from the dripping bushes as though he would remind you that God makes the rain fall! See how his throat swells."

Mary looked up to the bough, and sure enough there he was, warbling merrily, and when his song ceased, she said it was because she had quit murmuring at the weather.

The next day, Anna Grey came over to spend the day with her friend, and while playing together on the green grass, Anna suddenly laid by her doll, and ran towards the house.

"Why do you go away?" cried Mary, surprised at her sudden freak.

"Oh! it's so hot we can't play out of doors. I do wish the sun would go under a cloud, and stay there a good bit."

"Why hear that little bird in the bush," answered Mary, laughing in her sleeve, as she remembered her rainy day lesson.

"Well, what of it?"

"Why, it says, 'God makes the sun shine,' and Mary forthwith related her experience with the bird. From that day to this, Mary and Anna are content with either rain or sunshine, for they recollect the lesson of the birds.—Little Pilgrim.

The Boy that obeyed God rather than Man.

In a town in one of the midland counties of England lived a poor boy; his clothes were almost threadbare, and his daily allowance of food was often very scanty. He was an orphan, and having no one to provide for him, he supported himself by working at a factory, where he earned five shillings a week. He was a very good boy, and loved to read his Bible, and to go to the house of God on the Sabbath day. But he had an ungodly master, who knowing of his wish to go to church on the Sabbath, ordered him to come to work on that day. However, Jem thought it his duty not to obey, and accordingly spent that sacred day in his usual peaceful manner.

The next morning, when he presented himself at the factory, the master inquired, "Where were you yesterday?" The boy answered, "I went to church, sir." "Then you may go to church again to-day!" replied the master, angrily; and paying him what was due to him, he instantly dismissed him. Jem was now without any means of earning a livelihood; but he knew it was useless to despair, so he began to look out for another situation.

On one of his applications, a gentleman asked him the reason of his dismissal from his former place. The boy replied, "Because I did not wish to go to work on the Sabbath, sir." The merchant was much pleased with this answer, and immediately engaged him at the increased wages of ten shillings a week. "Godliness has promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."—Ex.

A Beautiful Incident.

In the public school in Coates Street, above Twelfth, in this city, one day last week, while the school was in session, a transom window fell out with a crash. By some means the cry of "fire" was raised, and a terrible panic ensued. The scholars rushed into the street shrieking in wild dismay. The alarm extended to the teachers also, one of whom, a young lady, actually jumped from the window. Among the hundreds of children, with whom the building was crowded, was one girl, among the best in the school, who, through all the frightful scene, maintained entire composure. The color indeed forsook her cheek. Her lip quivered. The tears stood in her eyes. But she moved not. After order had been restored, and her companions had been brought back to their places, the question was asked her, how she came to sit still without apparent alarm, when everybody else was in such a fright. "My father," said she, "is a fireman, and knows what to do in such a case, and he told me, if there was an alarm of fire in the school, I must just sit still." What a beautiful illustration of faith? "My father told me so, and my father knows!" That is the gist of the whole matter—implicit, unfaltering trust in our Heavenly Father.—Guardian.

The Simplicity of Christ.

"But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ."—2 Cor. 11: 3.

The Corinthian church seems to be compounded of the two elements, excellence and folly. The evil of contention had appeared among its members, and they had broken up into several parties, one calling itself after Paul, another after Apollos, another after Cephas, and doubtless becoming somewhat warm, they had carried their debate to such a length as to threaten destruction to the entire body. The great apostle, apprised of this by letter, wrote his two epistles, containing wholesome advice, together with an excellent code of laws for their government, which, if followed, would serve to restore them to that unanimity which ran so much danger of being annihilated. The numerous points of disputes were analyzed, and reduced to their proper bearing; and rules of conduct laid down by Paul for their future government.

The primary cause of all was, that the church had departed from its original simplicity, become factious and discordant, proud of its knowledge and privileges, and consequently fell away from that virtue which appears so lovely among those who, sinking every idea of self, are wholly swallowed up in the love of God through Jesus Christ, and hourly striving to demean themselves to the standard prescribed.

The character of our Lord, as set forth in the Scriptures, is of the most unblemished excellence that can be imagined; and even those who profess to deny his very existence, admit that, although it is as immaterial as the gorgeous rainbow which throws its aerial arch from cloud to cloud, it is a sublime conception of all the cardinal virtues embodied. To us, whose faith in his divine reality is our only hope, he is the chief of all the works of God, a merciful Savior and a mighty King; and our hearts bound with rapturous gratitude when we contemplate from what an exalted station he descended, and what he endured, and all for love to fallen man. His humility, in his choice of birth and companions, and in his submission to a cruel and ignominious death; his patience under temptation, insult, buffetings and stripes; his gentleness, when led like a lamb to the slaughter; his freedom from malice and revenge when, suffering the most acute agony, he exclaimed—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" (How different such a spirit from that of too many professing christians when suffering under wrong!") his charity, going about doing good, feeding the hungry, healing the sick, raising the dead, and offering to all a free salvation; his long-suffering, in bearing with the waywardness of his ungrateful people, who like swine trampled under foot the inestimable pearl, and turned rending upon the giver. How his tender heart dissolved into tears, when from the mountain he looked upon and wept over the doomed city of David—"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not." Thus every attribute, which makes a being amiable and good, was embraced in that which the apostle calls the "simplicity of Christ."

His childlike simplicity is essentially necessary to salvation; for, says Jesus—"Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdom of heaven." Matt. 18: 3. This was spoken as a warning to those of his disciples who evinced a disposition to covet honor and an exalted station above their fellows, and plainly showed them that the way to "the mount above" was through the low valley of humility.

This simplicity is always opposed to worldly wisdom, now, even as when the [illegible]

Divine revelation, would never by their industry have found out God, or formed a just estimate of his Divine Nature. They peopled the mountains with Jupiter and inferior deities, and the earth with demi-gods and goddesses; and all their ideas of heavenly beatitude were such as tallied with the indulgence of their lusts and passions. Neither have the Pagan sages and philosophers, with all their investigations, handed down to us discoveries which have really been useful to us, this being reserved for men who loved and feared the Lord, as Newton, Boyle, Pascal, and many others.

This simplicity should be manifested in preaching. How very many ministers entirely destroy the simple beauty of the text, by endeavoring to heighten the effect by the miserable daubing of their bombast, which they mistake for eloquence. Earth, water, fire and air are ransacked for metaphors to illustrate the subject, and the speaker, like an exhausted gobbler, works himself up to the very verge of apoplexy; and so violent has been the effervescence that nothing remains but froth! Thunder, lightning and cataracts are favorite similies used by these sublime orators; yet Christ, in his simplicity, says—"Consider the lillies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Matt. 6: 28, 29; Luke 12: 27.

Christian simplicity, as shown in acts of benevolence, is not preceded by sound of trump or self-applauding clamor. Christ inculcates this unostentatious philanthropy, by exhorting them not to let their right hand know what their left hand doeth. And Paul, writing to the Romans, says, "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity." Rom. 12: 8. Thousands upon thousands of dollars might be placed under the caption of some great man's benevolence, and yet the donor be as utterly devoid of charity or merit in the gift, as those who never gave a shilling to the poor; for the "searcher of hearts" might discover that the motive was personal aggrandizement, and not the glory of God and love for his fellow man.

This simplicity is shown in the christian's conduct. Paul rejoices that he and his coworkers have, through grace, been circumspect. "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world." 2 Cor. 1: 12. "We have had our conversation" should be translated—"We have conducted ourselves;" for such is the signification of the Greek word Anestraphemen; and properly refers to the whole course of a man's life, its aim and object. "The verb anastrepho, is compounded of ana, again, and stepho, to turn; a continual coming back again to the point from which he set out; a circulation, beginning, continuing, and ending everything to the glory of God." See Clarke on this text. Influenced by the Spirit of God, as the planets by the sun, held in their spheres by his attraction, and warmed and enlightened by the effulgence of his glory; or, like the blood thrown from the heart, after traversing every artery and vein in the human body, returns to its source for strength, purity and vitality.

Simplicity is shown in self-depreciation. There were some in the church at Corinth, like some at the present day, who had a much higher opinion of themselves than was seemly among christians. This spirit is the source of much trouble in a church, and unless brought under subjection will work much evil. This arrogance is always demonstrated in those who really know the least; for the truly wise man, like a branch heavily laden with fruit, bows lowest to the earth. The great apostle aims at such a disturber of the harmony which should exist, thus: "If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world," that is, affecteth a superiority over his brethren—"let him become a fool that he may be wise." Let him throw overboard that self-sufficiency which inflateth to vanity, and be satisfied to be considered a fool by those who pride themselves in worldly wisdom, and being thus emptied of self, is fit to receive the wisdom of God abundantly, receiving as babes that divine revelation which God thought fit to hide from the wise and prudent. See Matt. 11: 25; Ps. 19: 7; 119: 130.

The simple have the spirit to be profited by the correction of others, and thus be led to bow low their head to escape that stroke which overturns all who set up their philosophy in opposition to the word of God: "Smite the scorner, and the simple will beware: and reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge." Prov. 19: 25. "When the scorner is [illegible] eyes lofty; neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of its mother: my soul is even as a weaned child."—Ps. 131: 1, 2. Also in Jeremiah 1: 6. "Then said I, ah, Lord God! behold I cannot speak; for I am a child."

If we be permitted to call God our father, we must humble ourselves to his will, with the simple confidence of loving and obedient children, without calling in question his right to command, or his power to execute his promises or threatenings. It is not necessary for a dutiful child to understand the purposes of his father, to insure his obedience; he is convinced that he is secure in the superior wisdom and might of his parent, and, yielding implicitly to his desire, he fearlessly ventures upon his father's word. Thus it should be with the christian—thus it was with Christ. With power to avoid suffering, he bowed to his Father's will; and while the bloody sweat fell from his sacred body, he cried, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me! nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt."

Let us therefore cultivate the simplicity of Christ, and whatever trials, sorrows or temptations may assail, we shall be able in the heaviest hour of trouble to echo the words of our dear Lord and Saviour—"Not my will, but thine be done!"

Awake and Sing!

BY E. L. H.

Awake ye! awake ye! Break forth into singing—
Ye who in the dust have been dwelling so long!
Soon heaven's broad expanse shall with praises be ringing,
When ye shall unite in the victor's glad song.
Within death's damp prison ye long have been sleeping,
And round its dark portals the pilgrims are weeping;
But Jesus is mighty—"the keys" he is keeping,
He's coming in glory to wake you ere long.

Soon, soon shall the bonds of corruption be riven,
By Christ, the Redeemer, Deliverer and King;
Then praises unceasing to him shall be given,
By glorified saints, who in Zion shall sing.
Then through Time's dark valley, while night shades are o'er me,
I'll sing; for the Mount and the Morn are before me—
The mountain of song, and the mountain of glory,
Where all of the ransomed immortal shall sing.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 23.

MY DEAR SISTER:—There is one more failing, another easily besetting sin, of which I would speak, and then close this series of letters, already protracted far beyond my intentions. It is this—an impatience of spirit towards the faults and errors of others. We are prone to be hasty—ofttimes to censure our brethren and sisters for their deviation from the strict path of rectitude. Forgetful of our own infirmities, our own deficiencies, we regard with impatience the errors of others. With a beam projecting from our own eye, we would fain extract the mote from a brother's eye.

I believe it to be true that those who have had the most clear discovery of their own nature—the corruption of their own heart—are the most ready to offer an excuse for an erring brother or sister. Oppressed with a sense of their own weakness, their own short comings, their own struggles to overcome selfish nature, and repel temptation, they are prepared to sympathise with others in their failures—in their struggles. As they kneel at the mercy-seat, scarcely daring to look heavenward, so weighed down in spirit with a consciousness of imperfections, of short comings, how sweetly does the whisper of the angel of the covenant fall upon the heart, bringing to remembrance the words of Holy Writ, "Who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities."

How faith now wings her way to heaven, and rests on the bosom of that "Advocate with the Father." Once he was a "man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." He was a man of "like passions with us"—he suffered, being tempted; he hungered, he thirsted, he was weary, he was sad, he was persecuted—forsaken—betrayed: and all this that he might be qualified to become a merciful and compassionate High Priest—that he might be touched with the very feelings that our infirmities awaken within us. We remember how patiently he bore with the errors of his disciples—with what compassionate sympathy he addressed the woman brought before him, for whom her accusers clamored for accusation.

We remember a Peter, who with oaths denied his Lord, but who was by him forgiven. [illegible]

parently no tokens of love—no sweet manifestations of sympathy towards those hypocritical Scribes and Pharisees, who, wrapped up in a garment of their own righteousness, deemed themselves perfectly whole, and in no need of a physican? What though his withering rebukes and denunciations fell harshly upon their ears? Towards the erring ones—the "lost sheep of the house of Israel," and the despised Gentile, his arms of love were opened wide—for them he had words of kindness, and a large place in his heart of love. Hear him as he teaches his disciples a lesson on forgiveness. He limits it not to a transgression seven times repeated, but until seventy times seven!—Well might the apostles ask, "Lord, increase our faith!" Long time has he borne with our transgressions—oft-repeated have been the pardons received, and shall we condemn an erring brother and sister for occasional errors?

What says the inspired apostle? "Charity," or love, "covereth a multitude of faults." Notice also the advice given in respect to the faults of our brethren and sisters. "If any man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted."

Spiritual ones are required to restore, not condemn—not crush—not injure; and they are to do it in meekness, mildly, gently, not upbraidingly; considering themselves that they are liable to be tempted and overcome, and they ought to exercise the same spirit toward their erring brother, that they would like to have exercised toward them. O how many, who might have been recalled to the path of virtue—who might have been reclaimed from their sin by meekness and love, have been driven further and further from God, and his church, by a denunciatory spirit and harsh dealing.

The exercise of a compassionate spirit—the winning words of love—the fair and honorable dealing with the transgressor, accomplish more towards their rescue, than the severe denunciation—the telling abroad the fault—the look of scorn and cold shoulder. Too often there appears at first view, to outward observation, a deviation, when, if the matter were fully examined—if all the motives and causes could be ascertained there might be less cause for censure, and perhaps none at all. In some cases, disease induces a restlessness of spirit, an irritability of the nervous system, which exhibits itself in petulancy; little things irritate; sometimes pain in the head distracts the mind—a morbid state of the liver produces melancholy, listlessness, etc. These are too lightly regarded by those unqualified to sympathize; and many a devoted christian, whose whole soul is in the work of God, whose will is in harmony with his, is the subject of censure, when "pity ought to be shewn for his friend." From the infirmities induced by a diseased body, there is no salvation provided in the gospel—the resurrection to immortality alone can effect a cure, unless there be first a removal of the disease; therefore such infirmities ought not to be classed with other sins.

"Forbearing one another in love." How important this command, and how blessed the results if obeyed. To meekly bear the coldness, the condemnation of others, for those errors or imperfections which are not the fruit of an unsanctified nature, but of a diseased body, requires much patience and love. Sweet is the thought—Jesus knows all about us. Our Father in heaven pities us, for he knoweth our frame—he remembereth that we are dust. Prayer should be our solace. Submission to these painful trials ought ever to be exercised. Every thing will be adjusted and made right at the judgment.

May God bestow upon us that grace which shall wholly sanctify our natures—impart to us holy principles—give us the spirit of forgiveness toward our enemies—patience with the infirmities of others—victory over every temptation, and bring us safely to the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen. Farewell.

☞ For every one life has some blessing—some cup that is not mixed with bitterness. At every heart there is some fountain of pure water, and all men at some time taste its sweetness. Who is he that has not found in his path of life some fragrant rosebush, scenting all the air with its sweet perfume, and cheering the heart of the weary traveler with its beauty?

"Hail! sacred truth, whose piercing rays
Dispel the shades of night;
Diffusing o'er a ruined world
The healing beams of light."

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER II.

ARE THERE RADICALLY BAD MEN?

By radically bad men, I do not mean persons who are born of badness and unto badness, as if character were a thing of parentage or race. But, are there human beings in whom evil feelings, purposes and habits so predominate that they mark and determine the character? And I use the popular phrase "bad men," rather than the Scriptural phrase "the wicked," because I think the former best represents the latter in its original and proper sense. But Scriptural expressions are apt to be used in a technical and conventional sense; "the righteous" and "the wicked" may come to signify men who are such according to an arbitrary and false standard. This is a great evil, and it needs to be corrected by substituting for the technical phrases such homely but hearty Saxon words as scarcely need defining.

And by the question, Are there radically bad men?—I do not mean to intimate that there are no traces of good nature even in the worst men. The real question will be, Is the "good in all," upon which the Universalist so much relies, a genuine goodness, a real virtue, a moral principle? Is it an element so substantial and a germ so vital, that it must by a natural law of character grow and develop into a prevailing goodness and a final salvation? If this question is answered in the negative, then the question remains, Will God, by methods higher than the native elements of character, secure in all men a final holiness and blessedness? This question will be considered in the closing chapter.

Here, at the outset, I should discard a host of rash and conventional judgments that are wont to be pronounced upon human character. Men are too often judged good or bad according to outward appearance. This is the way of men as compared with the judgment of Him who looketh upon the heart. Precisely this is meant by the "respect of persons" which the Scriptures so much rebuke. Human nature, fallen desperately in love with happiness, is apt to think that those who are "well off" must be good people, and that those who are badly off must be bad folks. This was the great mistake of Job's friends, and it has been made thousands of times since his day. God is no such "respecter of persons," or of outward advantages; but in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, in whatever condition, is accepted of him.

This principle cuts off all hasty condemnation of the heathen in the mass, as if they must inevitably perish. If they cherish true goodness and virtue, neither their ignorance nor their unscriptural methods of worship will exclude them from God's kingdom. But as ignorance is a very great evil, and the gospel is worth preaching to every body, the question remains, Whether a heathen, with his false views of God, may not lose confidence in the supremacy of goodness, take the side of an evil divinity because the evil divinity is supposed to be the more powerful, and thus debauch the conscience and allow vice to become a settled policy and ruling principle of the character? How else shall we understand Paul's account, in which, after giving a long catalogue of heathen sins, he says: "Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them?"

In judging of character, I also throw out of account all considerations of natural temper or disposition, as amiable or otherwise. The brutes, in their measure, may have these as well as men. We are responsible, not for the nature we are born with, but for the use we make of native temper and capacity, in repressing the evil and cherishing the good. I also throw out of the account the manifold differences of education and custom, whereby the same act which expresses ill feeling and hate in one man may express goodness and love in another man. All this, I presume, is so well understood between himself and my opponent, that it needs only to be named, and not argued.

The whole subject of human character is a vast one, and it is all involved in the question if there be radically bad men. I [illegible]

This mystery of sin, which seems to be involved in the very idea of moral character, has been recognised by various eminent writers, ever since the time of Plato. I will quote but one, and that one doubtless a Universalist. I mean Neander, whose labors in Church History have such signal merit because he was not a mere compiler of facts, but a philosopher, profoundly versed in the causes of human action. He says: "According to my conviction, the origin of evil can only be understood as a fact—a fact possible by virtue of the freedom belonging to a human being, but not to be otherwise deduced or explained. It lies in the idea of evil that it is an utterly inexplicable thing; and whoever would explain it nullifies the very idea of it. It is not the limits of our knowledge which make the origin of sin something inexplicable to us, but it follows from the essential nature of sin as an act of free will that it must remain to all eternity an inexplicable fact. It can only be understood emphatically by means of the moral self-consciousness."—Planting and Training of the Church, bk. 6, chap. 1, note.

1. The first point to be insisted on is the essential and responsible freedom of the human will. I believe—it is almost a proverb—that the common consciousness of man asserts his freedom. Without this there could be no merit, either good or ill. Without this, whatever right or wrong there might be in the nature of things, there could be neither in actions, or in men. There could be neither praise nor blame, there could be no character, worthy of the name. Without freedom, the native dispositions and original feelings of men might be more complex than those of the brute, and more interesting for study; they might be more agreeable or disagreeable, more fortunate or unfortunate; still they would be the inevitable result of forces within the man and of circumstances without him, for which he would be as thankless and as blameless as the revolutions of the windmill.

But this practical consciousness of freedom,—which excuses or condemns ourselves if it be real, and makes God an imposter if it be unreal—has been often denied for the sake of a theory. I believe it has often been denied by men troubled with a sense of guilt, of which they wished to be rid. Still more unfortunately has it been deemed by divines, to save their views of a divine sovereignty and efficiency, or to save a false theory respecting God's fore-knowledge. Supposing that God could foreknow only as a natural philosopher does, or as an astronomer predicts an eclipse,—by calculations of cause and effect,—they have ignored all actions that could not be determined by such calculation. The same class of divines have also been prejudiced by a false theory of freedom; one which divorced the will utterly from moral considerations, and reduced it to a sheer caprice. At an earlier date—in the Reformation—the notion of free will was supposed to make man independent of the gratuitous help of God. This explains that remarkable book of Luther's, on the Bondage of the Will, (De Servo Arbitrio.) The other causes culminated in the no less remarkable and more famous work of Edwards on the Freedom of the Will.

Those who have opposed the Calvinistic scheme have often said that Universalism is its legitimate fruit. I think, for the theoretic denial of free will I have just named, that this is true. The Calvinists, by a happy inconsistency, have maintained a deep sense of the evil and wickedness of sin. But when they had, by a method ["more honored in the breach than in th' observance,"] made the Author of man's nature and surroundings responsible for all men's doings, it was natural that men should infer that God's fairness required the salvation of one as well as another. The principle, or rather the lack of principle, by which God elected one man, appeared equally good for the election of all men. Hence we need not wonder that the Universalism of eighty years ago was offered as a "Calvinism Improved"—a title given by Dr. Joseph Huntington to his Universalist book. Here another cause of Universalism is worthy of note. The Old School doctrine of the nature of the Atonement made it a legal satisfaction for the sins of the saved. The New School doctrine of the extent of the Atonement makes it sufficient for all men. Combine the two, and all are saved at a stroke of logic. Some of the Universalists have employed this logic, and the result of their reasoning abides, though the old and false view of the Atonement is discarded. But the Calvinistic views of the human will, I think, prevail now more among Universalists [illegible]

Now I admit that the [illegible] of the human will, as uncontrolled by any [illegible] power of motives, [illegible] of man as more traceable by any philosophy of cause and effect. We shall then have what Dr. Bushnell calls the "supernatural" in the will itself. And when the will does not follow the motives, or sinks which it ought to follow, there is a wild lawlessness that perplexes us, and threatens disorder and ruin, limited only by the power of the perverse free agent. But this lawlessness is precisely what I understand to be the essence of sin. Sin is the transgression of law; and sin is guilty, and not unfortunate merely, just because it is not impelled by motive, or passion, or any cause out of the free will itself. And this, too, is the mystery of sin. It is that for which there is no valid reason,—an act which the person knows to be equally wrong and imprudent, and so an act of unreason; an act admitting no excuse save those worthless pleas by which the selfish or malicious guilt was first palliated or instigated. Such are the excuses which the [illegible] tongue fails to utter when one is confronted with the conscience, suppressed for a while but again accusing. And by this final verdict of the conscience the guilty man is rendered—like him in the parable of the wedding garment—speechless.

I have thought it is important thus to insist on the freedom of the will and the reasonless nature of guilt, to show that man may be really guilty and bad. This alone, of course, does not prove any man radically bad, since [illegible] may, [illegible], repent of little sins, and reform [illegible] into entire goodness. Yet the reasonless nature of guilt shows that it may not so be. He who acts foolishly, lawlessly, madly in a small matter, may do the same in things of weightier moment. He that is unjust in that which is least may also be unjust in much.—Nay, as physical disorder tends to further and utter derangement, so the human will forsaking the law of reason may gain fresh impulse away from the true good, and end in final and utter abandonment, in the darkness of un-reason which it has freely entered.

I will here remark that while I am glad to hear my Universalist friends speak of charity and forgiveness, and doubt not they cherish a real feeling of good will toward all, yet a very common theory pressed to its consistent results would destroy the very idea of charity and forgiveness. If no man acts against known duty or interest, if all are doing precisely according to their best light and knowledge, then what place for charity or pardon? One who is conscious of having done the best he knew or could, does not ask forgiveness, nor thank one for the offer of it. And if it is further said that men do wrong only under the influence of strong temptation, the question recurs, Do they act with good conscience? and, Can they not resist and conquer their foes, the evil passions? If they can not, they need no pardon, for they are simply victims. If they can do better, their guilt remains; and while we should forgive until the seventy times seven, it should be with some fear that the actual and, in its measure, reasonless and causeless guilt may continue and subvert the soul. But let us never speak of forgiveness under a theory that leaves nothing to be forgiven.

2. The nature of genuine moral virtue is such that we should not hastily conclude that all men possess it, even in slight measure.—Virtue is something more than prudence, or a regard for one's interest. It is true that duty and interest ever coincide; neither can properly interfere with the other. Honesty is ever the best policy. Yet it has been well said that he who is honest from policy is not an honest man. To do a certain act because it is prudent and profitable, and to do the same act because it is right, generous and noble, are two very different things. Though all that is really virtuous is also really prudent, still here are two kinds of motive totally different. The two planes are indeed exactly parallel, and the figures are equal and similar; yet he who moves in one plane may have no sympathy whatever with him that moves in the other.—The two persons are of different aims, and may therefore reach different moral [illegible]

The nature of virtue as something more than prudence may be [illegible] relations, and illustrated in various ways. The man of prudence [illegible] to be self-seeking and selfish. The man of principle regards what is right [illegible] less than for himself.—[illegible] centre about which [illegible] the other [illegible] all. [illegible]

[illegible] to be at rest,
From every doubt and fear,
Of heavenly peace possessed,
Even while [illegible] here;
And such a peace doth Jesus give
To those who by believing live.

'Tis sweet, amid the toil,
The battle, and its blood,
To know that sorrows all
Are working for our good;
Such trust have we who look above,
And dwell in God, and dwell in love.

'Tis sweet, when toils are past,
And every conflict won,
To hear our Lord at last
Pronounce the word, "well done!"
This joy have those whose hearts sincere
To life's last labor persevere.

The Good Fight.—The Victory.

"Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life."—1 Tim. 6: 12.

Practical preaching, that reaches and regulates the practice of the hearer, must have a foundation and an object. The foundation lies in man's pressing need; in God's wonderful love in Christ; and in the adaptability of all this love to supply our actual wants. The object is,—the crown of life in the kingdom of the King of kings.—Jas. 1: 12; Rev. 1: 5–7.

Practical preaching must of course be plain, doctrinal, or Gospel preaching; for otherwise it has neither Scripture nor common sense to recommend it. For to tell men to fight the good fight—run the race, and overcome the world, and without telling the occasion and object, the origin or end, is to be and appear a very "babe" before God, or good men.

Failure is the certain result of not knowing; for no preacher (nor person) can be "crowned, except he strive lawfully." The nature, rules and object of the warfare must be known, in order to "strive lawfully," according to the prescribed rules of the warfare.

The Gospel's "joyful sound" sounds mainly of "the kingdom." The Lord's supper is authorized "till he come" to call us to "the marriage supper of the Lamb." Baptism is a burial into "the likeness" of Christ's death, and a [illegible] in the likeness of his resurrection. Thus all parts of the Gospel refer to and reach on to "the consummation." Till then, the holy strife must be maintained by all who shall overcome. There is no peace nor truce. The war is deadly. Every advance is a real conquest; and victory to Christ and his people involves destruction to their foes. He will put down "all enemies" in "his time," and not before. Then he will be the only administrator of power—the blessed and only Potentate.

[illegible] is not single handed, but combined. It involves all the evil against the good. "The flesh" is organized into "the world;" (of politics and pleasure and compromising religion) and all is pervaded and directed to one end by "the Devil." Thus, "the world, the flesh and the Devil" are all in hostile array against God and his gracious cause, by Jesus Christ and his church.—1 Pet. 5: 8–9; Jer. 17: 5; 1 John 2: 15; Eph. 6: 11–17. The combatants are active and unceasing. No peace can obtain till it shall be conquered. "The God of peace will bruise Satan under our feet shortly." Then "the Prince of peace" will reign in peace—give the kingdom to "his saints," and triumph in boundless, glorious, endless deliverance!

"The good fight" must be altogether good; for it is all of God, and it is to end, infallibly, in everlasting good, throughout the vast universe of God—leaving no trace of sin or Satan, sickness or sorrow, pain or death, or hell.—Rev. 20: 14; 21: 1–5; 22: 3; Ps. 7: 9; 104: 35; Isa. 65: 17; 2 Pet. 3: 13, 14; John 1: 29; 1 John 3: 8. This was begun with the tempter, the creature, and time. It is to end finally with the close of earth's great work—the period of revealed distinctive time. All beyond is the "age of ages"—in untold eternal triumphs of all good. Amen and amen.

All warfare is good and honorable that is waged for, and ends in, securing a great and permanent good. This will end in all and endless good; and hence it is now "good." Other wars are oft excited on both sides by the worst passions; waged with the worst of motives; and even though successful for the time, end, even to the victors, in everlasting loss! But in this good fight, the motive, object and end are all glorious, Godlike and unceasingly good. [illegible] to restrain; at last to conquer [illegible] death, Devil and hell—leaving only the good. This good warfare is against all evil; it embodies in its gracious range all the good of earth and heaven; and is ultimately to attain all, and the only triumph, [illegible] in this "good [illegible] by [illegible], believing, confessing [illegible] God's truth concerning [illegible] Christ's yoke, and living for [illegible] and bodily [illegible] "the [illegible] Matt. 6: 10–33; John 6: [illegible]

consequence, it is ignorance and guilt—it is in aid of the enemy, to ignore prophecy; or to assume to preach practically for Christ, our coming, conquering King, "as they (in the opposition) can bear it." Of such, Christ and the Holy Ghost have spoken—"I never knew you."—Matt. 7: 21–23. Hear the Judge,—"Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." You must attain it, or perish.

Therefore all of us are to act and live; preach and pray; be all over and altogether engaged for God's revealed triumph! To those who overcome, (unbelief, erring theories and friends, fleshly and Satanic stumbling-blocks,) He will crown amid the seven-fold—manifested and exhaustless honors of the Kingdom. They shall be kings and priests unto God and his Christ, and reign with him over the earth.

The good prevail in this "fight" not alone; but in alliance with Christ and his cause. The victory will be an allied victory. The foes are to fall as allied foes; and hence all who ever become overcomers, must needs come to Christ—abide in Christ and each other—be filled with the Spirit, and maintain the cause of truth as God's truth! It is truth as a whole.—The armor of righteousness is made up of this heavenly metal. All its elements of faith, hope and strength, are of the Truth; and all aspects of Gospel truth ally its friends in everlasting league with God, and a coming Christ, to salvation.—Heb. 9: 28; 2 Tim. 4: 1–8; Rev. 12: 10.

It is then treason to the Holy Ghost and the kingdom of God, to suppress the truth as it relates to Christ's coming,—as the "Blessed and only Potentate." Now Death has a dreadful and deadly power. Hades has power "as a roaring lion." But soon our King, into whose alliance we have entered, by the obedience of faith, will take His great power and be King.—Rev. 11: 17. Then He only will have power! "The only Potentate" is then his title. Hades, death and the devil will then have no power. "Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." Amen. J. B. C.

Cause in the West.

Bro. Grant:—Since I last wrote, I have visited Onion Grove, Iowa. I spent one week; there was some interest, and some confessed the truth. I hope to visit them again soon. Visited Earleville, Lazelle Co., Ill., where I held a quarterly meeting. A number were added to the church. Visited Shabbona Grove church. Found them looking for that "blessed hope." Had a refreshing season. From there returned home, and spent a few days; preached to the churches in Cordova and Princeton. Visited Brown Co., spending a few days. Found Walker's Neck church prospering. Visited Ripley's church. They have had preachers there, who have distracted and almost destroyed them. I tried to strengthen the things that remain. Had a good-time; the people began to rally again, but I was called to go to Mt. Pleasant to preach the funeral sermon of one of our sisters, (Sister Raymond), who died in the Lord. Returned north as far as Warren Co., and visited the churches there. Spent two weeks, baptized four, and received seven into the church.

This field is where Bro. Rathburn has been laboring the past year; he has met with good success; the Lord has blessed his labors, and given him many souls as seals of his ministry. I arrived home on Friday. Yesterday (Sunday) preached once in Cordova. Tuesday evening am to preach again. Subject—The rich man and Lazarus.

Wednesday, I start for Iowa; am to make a tour in Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. This is a great field, but how much we need faithful laborers in the vineyard. The field is ripe, the people want to hear. The times are hard, but the Gospel must be preached.

Preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom of God at hand, is not a money making business, in this world, but we think it is a good and safe investment, not on long credit, either, for the Master will come quickly.

I would say in conclusion, if there is any surplus change in the Lord's treasury East, or any where, that can be spared, to help advance the cause West, I wish the Treasurer would forward it.

The last year I have traveled about twenty-five hundred miles, through storm and mud, and have in my weak way been laboring day and night. I have averaged, in my preaching, once per day, and baptized one hundred or over, and organized five churches, composed of from twenty-one to forty members each. All are flourishing now, additions made since to all of them. I have tried to set in order other churches. The Lord has been with me by his Spirit.

During the past two years I have not received any more than my traveling expenses. We do not murmur; the Gospel must be preached. The Lord is at the door. I expect He will open some way before us. He will make all right soon; and for the present He knows what we need. Moses Chandler.

"The Gift of God is Eternal Life."

That we immortal joys might know,
The blest Redeemer died;
Immortal life doth only flow
From Jesus' wounded side!

Christ is the life; and all must die
To whom that fount is sealed.
Life's soldier reads a hope on high,
Upon his blood-stained shield.

Unto the truth we have a guide:
The Bible must be true!
Nor can the shades of darkness hide
Its splendors from our view.

Each page is like a guiding star,
To light us on the way
To where immortal glories are,
Of resurrection day!

And 'missioned from the burning throne,
Where is the "perfect day,"
Each guiding star that ever shone
Upon the christian's way—

And showed him that immortal life
Beyond the dark'ning gloom,
Beyond the rest from care and strife,
Beyond the silent tomb.

And showed to him the white robed throng,
Their blood-washed garments worn,
The crown, the robe, the harp, the song
Of resurrection morn!

And showed him that if he would rise
To that immortal life,
He must in warfare win the prize,
And gird himself for strife.

Hark! Jesus speaks—oh, sinners, think
What mercy great and high!
"Come, of the living waters drink,
And thou shalt never die!"

"Now cast upon me all thy care;
My life do I lay down,
That in my kingdom thou may'st wear
A bright, immortal crown!"

O Thou, our hope, our life, our love!
We know that Thou wilt be
The light that shineth from above
To lead us unto Thee!

And when, as victors in the strife,
We yield to Thee our breath,
O may we rise again to LIFE,
Nor know the second death!

Charity.—No. 5.

Charity is above the virtue of Martyrdom.—"Though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." A man may die for his opinions, and yet be destitute of true charity. Infidelity has had its martyrs. The Romish church hers; but both systems of faith are incompatible with "Charity" in a Scriptural sense. Many a professor in the Christian Church, no doubt, has died a martyr's death upon the block, or burned at the stake, or been given to the wild beasts to be devoured, and yet they were destitute of love.

Real christian martyrdom has the element of love in it, as exhibited in the death of Christ when he could pray for his enemies in the affecting language—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and as seen too—Stephen the first christian martyr, when with a "loud voice" he cried "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." A patriot may die for his country, and yet flee from the fires of persecution which would test his love for the good of universal man. There are patriots in our day; or who pretend to be,—who would fight in the face of the cannon's mouth in defence of our country against foreign invasion and a hostile foe; but will allow Roman Catholic influence to corrupt our politics,—destroy the purity of the ballot box, remove the Bible from the common school,—though the first book of moral culture in the world; and otherwise undermine the liberties and institutions of our beloved country,—and who will support the system of slavery, and its aggressive power to the extent of their influence, even to the crushing of its millions of victims, and yet suppose they are possessed of charity!

Charity is love to universal man;—to all created intelligences; and seeks the universal good and happiness of all.

"The State of Souls."

Under this heading there is an article in the editorial column of the Independent, that seems to have attracted some attention in the religious world; but which appears to me to be full of contradictions, and "flights of conjecture and discovery," as they seem to admit. They begin by an assertion without any evidence or proof. "One thing, however, we must believe in regard to it, (the soul) that it is in a state of active, vivid consciousness."

I do not see where this "must" comes from, it certainly does not come from the Bible; that declares that the dead know not anything, in that very day their thoughts perish. Neither does it follow from their after argument, for they admit that it is destitute of sensation; all the senses go to sleep in the grave, and whatever is dependent upon them becomes quiescent." They can neither see, hear, speak, or feel. They are "in the presence of Christ," and yet do not know where they are; they have no idea or cognizance of time; "do not know duration or change;" are not rewarded or punished. Is it no penalty to be under the dominion of death? But yet they are in a state of happiness or misery, "and have a vivid active consciousness." Was there ever such a jumble of contradictions and "flights of conjecture" and imagination as this?

Again, they acknowledge that very little is revealed in the Bible of an intermediate state, and that the resurrection is the period of future reward and punishment, and remark: "It is human to tattle in such premises; it is God-like to hold all in awful sequestration!" Who are the "tattlers" on this subject? Is it not those who pretend to explain by mere figments of the imagination, what they confess is not revealed in the book? Who strive to be wise above what is written; and thus prove that they are "human?"

Where there is such a strange variety of opinion on any subject, it must needs be, that conjecture and imagination is the baseless fabric on which men build, instead of the rock of Divine truth.

A noted Scotch minister remarked at a funeral the other day, that the lowest order of beings in the heavenly world were angels! The spirits of the redeemed were greatly superior to them in power and glory! Another popular minister, a few days after, told his people that the righteous, at death, were made equal to the angels! Then what need of a resurrection, for they will be at that time equal to the angels, and no more? Does not this system virtually do away with the great scriptural doctrine of "the resurrection of the dead?"

Where there are so many various and contradictory views of the state of the dead, it is evident that our would-be-wise men are, on this subject, altogether in the dark, and it is to be feared, will practically experience the truth of the old saying: "When the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch." They seem to have a marvelous faculty of seeing things that have no existence, and, at the same time, are utterly unable to discern what is clearly revealed in God's word as to the final abode of the righteous after the judgment of the great day.

Some locate the redeemed in Paradise, which, they tell us, is a part of Hades. Some place them in first, second, or third heaven. Some banish them "beyond the bounds of time and space," and all seem to forget the promise of God to give to those who love him an everlasting inheritance in the "New Heavens and the New Earth," in the New Jerusalem, that comes down from God out of Heaven on the earth. The righteous shall be recompenced on the earth.

Christ has promised to come again the second time, to set up his kingdom under the whole heavens; to subdue all things to himself; to reign over the house of Jacob forever; to destroy the kingdom of Satan, and to have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. Surely there are none so blind, as those who will not see the exceeding great and precious promises God has treasured up in his Word, for the consolation of his suffering and sanctified ones, that they shall reign with Christ in his kingdom.

In the prospect of this blessed hope Christ taught his disciples daily to hope and pray—"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth, as it is in heaven."

Home Missions.—No. 2.

In my first I put the question to our brethren in Maine,—shall we make another missionary effort? Some may reply, that nearly all our efforts are now on that principle. If this is so, then can we not put it on a footing to increase it, to direct our efforts to given points?

Here let me specify. We notice that in some of the States, a society is formed, a fund is raised and pledged, one or more faithful laborers are chosen and sent out as Evangelists, to preach where there is an ear to hear, to supply destitute churches with the word of life, and to open new interests for the message of the kingdom of God. These men go out to preach and visit, to pray and instruct, from "house to house," not to preach and peddle, nor to preach without time to study the word, and then retire to bed to study and pray, and plan how their family shall be fed and clothed, house rent and other bills met, until the night is spent, then to arise to pursue some scheme decided upon to earn the money. No; not to go out west under these embarrassments, but to go and labor with all his energies for the unsearchable riches of Christ; to present the claims of the Gospel, its hope, and the duty to support, as well as to hear and believe it, take up collections and receive what may be freely given for the mission, and his family be supported with the fund in the missionary treasury.

These are the points to which I wish to direct your attention. It is not to interfere with the labors of pastors of churches, nor to draw away their necessary support; but to call into action much that is now dormant,—to open a channel for those who are isolated from the treasury of the Lord, and to stir up others to enlist in the cause of truth, and to set men of God in the field who can and ought to preach constantly, but who cannot now do so because our means are not so directed as to sustain them. Let us remember God works by means. Yours in behalf of Christ,

I. C. Wellcome.

Morning.

"The watchman saith, 'The morning cometh.'"—Isa. 21: 12.

O, the dreary, dreary darkness, how it girds the stifled land!
How it falls in viewless torrents from the frowning midnight skies!
When shall Lucifer resplendent on the eastern mountains stand?
Will the morning never rise?

Tell me, oh ye bards prophetic, where in olden time ye stood,
When he saw the flying shadows and the swift-approaching day;
Saw its bannered army marching like a silver-rolling flood
Through the lands where darkness lay.

I have climbed these earthly Babels, many and many a time, to look
For the dawning of the morning in the eastern sky afar;
But I saw at brightest, only in some dim, cloud-circled nook,
One lone, faintly burning star.

Upward, upward through the darkness, mount on Faith's undrooping wing,
Till the dim horizon merges in Eternity's broad sea!
Till the eye shall catch the glory which the latter day shall bring
To the millions yet to be.

See the heavy, blinding shadows, lying sadly, like a pall,
On the nations that have never felt the gladness of the light.
And they love their weary groping: Father, hear us when we call,
Let the blind receive their sight!

O, let morning, radiant morning, come with healing in its breath,
Filling vale, and crowning mountain with the splendor of its beams;
Let the slumbering millions waken, ere they sleep the sleep of death,
From the madness of their dreams!

Yonder! see the cloudy curtains of the East are rising now;
And the morning twilight glimmers, and the daylight follows fast;
Floods of radiance are streaming o'er the mountains' kindling brow;
Life and day have come at last!

See the startled nations waking: giants bursting from their chains;
Heroes, girding on their panoply and hasting to the field;
Hear a million voices singing on a thousand smiling plains
Of the glory just revealed.

* * * * * * * *

Ah, how many hearts have waited for the glory of this time!
Beat their faintest, last pulsations with a yearning for the dawn;
Ah, how many ears have hearkened for this triumph note sublime,
Till both faith and sense were gone!

Sorrowing, yet rejoicing ever,—hoping for the promised gain,—
Struggling toward the great Hereafter with the earnestness of love,
Passed they through this world triumphant in a faith that reck'd not pain,
To a grander sight above.

In that city, built of sapphire, walled with jasper, paved with gold,
Where the Tree of Life is growing, crowned with heavenly fruitage fair,
Kingdoms, tribes and tongues and peoples shall be gathered and enrolled,

To a Certain Reader.

Fellow disciple, when were you last in your closet for devotional purposes? Did you go there because you desired and loved communion with God? Did you first of all read a portion of His word, with the feeling that you ought to hear him, before speaking to him? How long did you remain there? Did you grudge the time, or regard it as a sacrifice? Had you any spiritual perception of the presence of God, and did you feel that you was holding intercourse with Him at the mercy seat? Had you any humbling, refreshing view of Christ as the Mediator between you and infinite purity?

In your acknowledgment of mercies, were you sincerely grateful? Were your confessions prompted by a sense of guilt, and accompanied by deep emotions of penitence? How did your own moral nature appear when contrasted with the perfect holiness of God? Were your petitions the honest utterance of desires for favors which you really, earnestly wished to obtain? Did you remain on your knees until you had an inward assurance that your prayer was heard? Was it the prayer of faith?

Were you in no respect crippled or embarrassed by a conscious self-condemnation, occasioned by a recollection of your own inconsistencies? Did you remember no wrong done to others, for which you had made no reparation? Did you, from the heart, forgive all who had injured you? Was there no sin which conscience told you was unrepented of? Was you willing and anxious to give up every sin, however small, however inwrought into your habits? Did you make no secret reservation?

Did you fervently plead for the conversion of sinners? Had you, during the preceding twenty-four hours, done anything for the salvation of any soul, upon which you could ask the blessing of God? For whose conversion, in particular, did you pray?

When you came out of your closet, which way did your heart turn? Were you reluctant to leave the spot, or were you eager to get away and mingle with the world? How long did the influence of that season of devotion remain with you, and what was its effect upon your subsequent spirit and conscience? Do you long for the hour to arrive when you can again retire and hold communion with God?

Will you now turn to the following passages, and meditate upon them? Mat. 6: 6; Mark 11: 24–26; Psalm 66: 18; Gen. 32: 26; James 5: 16; Psalm 109: 4.—Watchman and Reflector.

Forward!

A WORD FOR ANXIOUS INQUIRERS.

It is the first step that costs. When the Israelites came up to the Red Sea, the command of God was, "Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." But how? The Jewish leader might well cry out, We have no fleet to bear us over. "Go forward!" But, Lord! we cannot for the gulf before us. "Go forward!" Wouldst thou have us, Lord, to perish in the billows? Still the same answer comes—"Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." The command is peremptory. It admits of no delay. And just as soon as Israel goes forth in obedience to Jehovah's voice, lo! the waves part asunder, and the mighty cavalcade marches through, dry shod! Unhesitating obedience to God always insures a blessing.

Here is a lesson for troubled inquirers. To you comes the command of God, "Go forward." Death is behind you. Hell followeth hard after you. There is no salvation in retreat. Heaven lies before you—not behind. No man ever saved his soul by relapsing into indifference. If you give up you are lost.

1. Perhaps you say, "I have prayed many a time already, and no blessing has yet come." Will you cease to pray then? Will that bring an answer? As well might a voyager to Liverpool, when one hundred miles from port, put about his helm, and steer back to New York; he is almost there; why does the foolish man retreat? How many a soul has quit praying when the door of mercy was just about opening to him! Go forward.

2. Another one is kept back by fear of ridicule. He cannot stand a laugh. There is a sneer waiting for him at his father's table, or a cutting sarcasm in his counting-room. He wavers before it. He winces under the slightest word, and imagines terrible things in store for himself. Go forward; the sea will open to you, and so will many a heart to cheer you on. You will inspire respect in the very quarters from which you now expect opposition. He is a weakling who is pushed back with a straw.

3. A third person complains, "I am in the dark; I cannot see my way." Then go forward, and get out of the dark. The determination to do your duty will be attended by a luminous discernment of the path of duty. God will show you the way; only go forward, looking for the cross.

4. Unbelief draws back a fourth. There is only one way to conquer doubt. It is—to believe. Then, instead of halting and shivering in an ague-fit of indecision, take a bold decisive step. End the torturing uncertainty by going forward, "looking unto Jesus."

The only way to do a thing is to do it. God gives strength to the obedient. He has no promise for cowards or double-minded vacillating doubters. He bestows grace on those who try to do their duty. His grace is all-sufficient for you. The deepest sea of difficulties will divide its waters for your advancing footsteps, just as soon as you determine to obey that voice which says to you, Go forward.—Chr. Intel.

"There are battles fierce and many,
By our valor to be fought,
And we want for soldiers any
Who will fight as brave men ought;
Not with sword of glittering steel
Laying waste the fruitful lands,
But with humble, christian zeal,
And the Bible in our hands."

Christian Principle.

A few years ago, in a violent storm, a ship was driven upon the bar on the south shore of Long Island. The waves swept over the deck, and the crew clung for safety to the rigging. Upon the shore, a company of men were gathered who stood motionless by the life-boat which they dragged to the beach. They were appalled by the danger, and felt that it would be certain death to venture out upon such a sea. Suddenly, a man who had once been a sailor rushed down to the beach, took his place by the boat, and shouted, "Come, men, lend a hand; I've been there myself!" That appeal was enough. The life boat shot forth among the foaming breakers on its merciful though perilous mission, and the crew were saved. That sailor had experienced a similar peril; he had felt the joy of rescue, and was ready to hazard his life to carry the same boon to those shipwrecked men. So the christian, because of his experimental appreciation of the worth of the Gospel, labors successfully to extend its blessings when other men would yield to despair. He has seen flaming up before him the wrath of an offended God; and he has felt the embrace of a loving Father as he forgave and welcomed the returning prodigal. He was once in the horrible pit and the miry clay, and now his feet are planted upon the rock. His soul was once famishing and faint, and now he feels that he shall hunger no more; he shall thirst no more. Once he was without hope and without God in the world, and now he rejoices in the anticipation of eternal glory, and is able to look up to God and say, Abba, Father! Can such an one grow weary, or be disheartened, or shrink from danger in striving to extend the influence of the Gospel? Never!

The Bible.—Out of it have come all pure moralities. Forth from it have sprung all sweet charities. It has been the motive power of regeneration and reformation to millions of men. It has comforted the humble, consoled the mourning, sustained the suffering, and given trust and triumph to the dying. The wise old man has fallen asleep with it folded to his breast. The simple cottager has used it for his dying pillow; and even the innocent child has breathed his last happy sigh with his fingers between its promise-freighted leaves.—Timothy Titcomb.

God Unchangeable.—There are many christians like young sailors, who think the shore and the whole land do move, when the ship and they themselves are moved; just so, not a few imagine that God moveth, and faileth, and changeth places, because their godly souls are subject to alteration; but the foundation of the Lord abideth sure.—Rutherford.

A Lesson from the Birds.

"See how it rains, rains, rains," said little Mary Jellis, as she gazed from the closet window of her mother's chamber, longing to see the shower cease and the sun shine out bright and clear again. "Oh! mamma, it will never stop, and I do hate rainy weather." Just then a little bird, whose nest hung from a tree not far off, broke out in one of his sweetest strains, and Mary listened wonderingly.

"Hark, daughter, hear what the bird says," said her good mamma, who observed the fixed attention of her little one.

"Why, it only sings," answered Mary.

"Yes; but while you are fretting and whining in this nice, large room, with all your playthings around you, and doll waiting to be dressed, birdie sings from the dripping bushes as though he would remind you that God makes the rain fall! See how his throat swells."

Mary looked up to the bough, and sure enough there he was, warbling merrily, and when his song ceased, she said it was because she had quit murmuring at the weather.

The next day, Anna Grey came over to spend the day with her friend, and while playing together on the green grass, Anna suddenly laid by her doll, and ran towards the house.

"Why do you go away?" cried Mary, surprised at her sudden freak.

"Oh! it's so hot we can't play out of doors. I do wish the sun would go under a cloud, and stay there a good bit."

"Why hear that little bird in the bush," answered Mary, laughing in her sleeve, as she remembered her rainy day lesson.

"Well, what of it?"

"Why, it says, 'God makes the sun shine,' and Mary forthwith related her experience with the bird. From that day to this, Mary and Anna are content with either rain or sunshine, for they recollect the lesson of the birds.—Little Pilgrim.

The Boy that obeyed God rather than Man.

In a town in one of the midland counties of England lived a poor boy; his clothes were almost threadbare, and his daily allowance of food was often very scanty. He was an orphan, and having no one to provide for him, he supported himself by working at a factory, where he earned five shillings a week. He was a very good boy, and loved to read his Bible, and to go to the house of God on the Sabbath day. But he had an ungodly master, who knowing of his wish to go to church on the Sabbath, ordered him to come to work on that day. However, Jem thought it his duty not to obey, and accordingly spent that sacred day in his usual peaceful manner.

The next morning, when he presented himself at the factory, the master inquired, "Where were you yesterday?" The boy answered, "I went to church, sir." "Then you may go to church again to-day!" replied the master, angrily; and paying him what was due to him, he instantly dismissed him. Jem was now without any means of earning a livelihood; but he knew it was useless to despair, so he began to look out for another situation.

On one of his applications, a gentleman asked him the reason of his dismissal from his former place. The boy replied, "Because I did not wish to go to work on the Sabbath, sir." The merchant was much pleased with this answer, and immediately engaged him at the increased wages of ten shillings a week. "Godliness has promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."—Ex.

A Beautiful Incident.

In the public school in Coates Street, above Twelfth, in this city, one day last week, while the school was in session, a transom window fell out with a crash. By some means the cry of "fire" was raised, and a terrible panic ensued. The scholars rushed into the street shrieking in wild dismay. The alarm extended to the teachers also, one of whom, a young lady, actually jumped from the window. Among the hundreds of children, with whom the building was crowded, was one girl, among the best in the school, who, through all the frightful scene, maintained entire composure. The color indeed forsook her cheek. Her lip quivered. The tears stood in her eyes. But she moved not. After order had been restored, and her companions had been brought back to their places, the question was asked her, how she came to sit still without apparent alarm, when everybody else was in such a fright. "My father," said she, "is a fireman, and knows what to do in such a case, and he told me, if there was an alarm of fire in the school, I must just sit still." What a beautiful illustration of faith? "My father told me so, and my father knows!" That is the gist of the whole matter—implicit, unfaltering trust in our Heavenly Father.—Guardian.

'Tis Sweet to be at Rest.

'Tis sweet to be at rest
From every doubt and fear,
Of heavenly peace possessed,
Even while sojourning here;
And such a peace doth Jesus give
To those who by believing live.

'Tis sweet, amid the toil,
The battle, and the blood,
To know that sorrows all
Are working for our good;
Such trust have we who look above,
And dwell in God, and dwell in love.

'Tis sweet, when toils are past,
And every conflict won,
To hear our Lord at last
Pronounce the word, "well done!"
This joy have those whose hearts sincere
To life's last labor persevere.

The Good Fight.—The Victory.

"Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life."—1 Tim. 6: 12.

Practical preaching, that reaches and regulates the practice of the hearer, must have a foundation and an object. The foundation lies in man's pressing need; in God's wonderful love in Christ; and in the adaptability of all this love to supply our actual wants. The object is,—the crown of life in the kingdom of the King of kings.—Jas. 1: 12; Rev. 1: 5–7.

Practical preaching must of course be plain, doctrinal, or Gospel preaching; for otherwise it has neither Scripture nor common sense to recommend it. For to tell men to fight the good fight—run the race, and overcome the world, and without telling the occasion and object, the origin or end, is to be and appear a very "babe" before God, or good men.

Failure is the certain result of not knowing; for no preacher (nor person) can be "crowned, except he strive lawfully." The nature, rules and object of the warfare must be known, in order to "strive lawfully," according to the prescribed rules of the warfare.

The Gospel's "joyful sound" sounds mainly of "the kingdom." The Lord's supper is authorized "till he come" to call us to "the marriage supper of the Lamb." Baptism is a burial into "the likeness" of Christ's death, and a [illegible] in the likeness of his resurrection. Thus all parts of the Gospel refer to and reach on to "the consummation." Till then, the holy strife must be maintained by all who shall overcome. There is no peace nor truce. The war is deadly. Every advance is a real conquest; and victory to Christ and his people involves destruction to their foes. He will put down "all enemies" in "his time," and not before. Then he will be the only administrator of power—the blessed and only Potentate.

The [illegible] is not single handed, but combined. It involves all the evil against the good. "The flesh" is organized into "the world" (of politics and pleasure and compromising religion) and all is pervaded and directed to one end by "the Devil." Thus, "the world, the flesh and the Devil" are all in hostile array against God and his gracious cause, by Jesus Christ and his church.—1 Pet. 5: 8–9; Jer. 17: 5; 1 John 2: 15; Eph. 6: 11–17. The combatants are active and unceasing. No peace can obtain till it shall be conquered. "The God of peace will bruise Satan under our feet shortly." Then "the Prince of peace" will reign in peace—give the kingdom to "his saints," and triumph in boundless, glorious, endless deliverance!

"The good fight" must be altogether good; for it is all of God, and it is to end, infallibly, in everlasting good, throughout the vast universe of God—leaving no trace of sin or Satan, sickness or sorrow, pain or death, or hell.—Rev. 20: 14; 21: 1–5; 22: 3; Ps. 7: 9; 104: 35; Isa. 65: 17; 2 Pet. 3: 13, 14; John 1: 29; 1 John 3: 8. This was begun with the tempter, the creature, and time. It is to end finally with the close of earth's great work—the period of revealed distinctive time. All beyond is the "age of ages"—in untold eternal triumphs of all good. Amen and amen.

All warfare is good and honorable that is waged for, and ends in, securing a great and permanent good. This will end in all and endless good; and hence it is now "good." Other wars are oft excited on both sides by the worst passions; waged with the worst of motives; and even though successful for the time, end, even to the victors, in everlasting loss! But in this "good fight" the motive, object and end are all glorious, Godlike and unceasingly good. It is now to restrain; at last to conquer death, Devil and hell—leaving only the good. This good warfare is against all evil; it embodies in its gracious range all the good of earth and heaven; and is ultimately to attain all, and the only triumph, eternally. Our engagement in this "good fight" is by admitting, believing, confessing and maintaining God's truth concerning it; taking Christ's yoke, and living for [illegible] bodily [illegible]) "the [illegible]." Matt. 6: 10–33; John 6: [illegible] [illegible] consequence, it is ignorance and guilt—it is in aid of the enemy, to ignore prophecy; or to assume to preach practically for Christ, our coming, conquering King, "as they (in the opposition) can bear it." Of such, Christ and the Holy Ghost have spoken—"I never knew you."—Matt. 7: 21–23. Hear the Judge,—"Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." You must attain it, or perish.

Therefore all of us are to act and live; preach and pray; be all over and altogether engaged for God's revealed triumph! To those who overcome, (unbelief, erring theories and friends, fleshly and Satanic stumbling-blocks,) He will crown amid the seven-fold—manifested and exhaustless honors of the Kingdom. They shall be kings and priests unto God and his Christ, and reign with him over the earth.

The good prevail in this "fight" not alone; but in alliance with Christ and his cause. The victory will be an allied victory. The foes are to fall as allied foes; and hence all who ever become overcomers, must needs come to Christ—abide in Christ and each other—be filled with the Spirit, and maintain the cause of truth as God's truth! It is truth as a whole.—The armor of righteousness is made up of this heavenly metal. All its elements of faith, hope and strength, are of the Truth; and all aspects of Gospel truth ally its friends in everlasting league with God, and a coming Christ, to salvation.—Heb. 9: 28; 2 Tim. 4: 1–8; Rev. 12: 10.

It is then treason to the Holy Ghost and the kingdom of God, to suppress the truth as it relates to Christ's coming,—as the "Blessed and only Potentate." Now Death has a dreadful and deadly power. Hades has power "as a roaring lion." But soon our King, into whose alliance we have entered, by the obedience of faith, will take His great power and be King.—Rev. 11: 17. Then He only will have power! "The only Potentate" is then his title. Hades, death and the devil will then have no power. "Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." Amen. J. B. C.

Cause in the West.

Bro. Grant:—Since I last wrote, I have visited Onion Grove, Iowa. I spent one week; there was some interest, and some confessed the truth. I hope to visit them again soon. Visited Earleville, Lazelle Co., Ill., where I held a quarterly meeting. A number were added to the church. Visited Shabbona Grove church. Found them looking for that "blessed hope." Had a refreshing season. From there returned home, and spent a few days; preached to the churches in Cordova and Princeton. Visited Brown Co., spending a few days. Found Walker's Neck church prospering. Visited Ripley's church. They have had preachers there, who have distracted and almost destroyed them. I tried to strengthen the things that remain. Had a good-time; the people began to rally again, but I was called to go to Mt. Pleasant to preach the funeral sermon of one of our sisters, (Sister Raymond), who died in the Lord. Returned north as far as Warren Co., and visited the churches there. Spent two weeks, baptized four, and received seven into the church.

This field is where Bro. Rathburn has been laboring the past year; he has met with good success; the Lord has blessed his labors, and given him many souls as seals of his ministry. I arrived home on Friday. Yesterday (Sunday) preached once in Cordova. Tuesday evening am to preach again. Subject—The rich man and Lazarus.

Wednesday, I start for Iowa; am to make a tour in Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. This is a great field, but how much we need faithful laborers in the vineyard. The field is ripe, the people want to hear. The times are hard, but the Gospel must be preached.

Preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom of God at hand, is not a money making business, in this world, but we think it is a good and safe investment, not on long credit, either, for the Master will come quickly.

I would say in conclusion, if there is any surplus change in the Lord's treasury East, or any where, that can be spared, to help advance the cause West, I wish the Treasurer would forward it.

The last year I have traveled about twenty-five hundred miles, through storm and mud, and have in my weak way been laboring day and night. I have averaged, in my preaching, once per day, and baptized one hundred or over, and organized five churches, composed of from twenty-one to forty members each. All are flourishing now, additions made since to all of them. I have tried to set in order other churches. The Lord has been with me by his Spirit.

During the past two years I have not received any more than my traveling expenses. We do not murmur; the Gospel must be preached. The Lord is at the door. I expect He will open some way before us. He will make all right soon; and for the present He knows what we need. Moses Chandler.

"The Gift of God is Eternal Life."

That we immortal joys might know,
The blest Redeemer died;
Immortal life doth only flow
From Jesus' wounded side!

Christ is the life; and all must die
To whom that fount is sealed.
Life's soldier reads a hope on high,
Upon his blood-stained shield.

Unto the truth we have a guide:
The Bible must be true!
Nor can the shades of darkness hide
Its splendors from our view.

Each page is like a guiding star,
To light us on the way
To where immortal glories are,
Of resurrection day!

And 'missioned from the burning throne,
Where is the "perfect day,"
Each guiding star that ever shone
Upon the christian's way—

And showed him that immortal life
Beyond the dark'ning gloom,
Beyond the rest from care and strife,
Beyond the silent tomb.

And showed to him the white robed throng,
Their blood-washed garments worn,
The crown, the robe, the harp, the song
Of resurrection morn!

And showed him that if he would rise
To that immortal life,
He must in warfare win the prize,
And gird himself for strife.

Hark! Jesus speaks—oh, sinners, think
What mercy great and high!
"Come, of the living waters drink,
And thou shalt never die!"

"Now cast upon me all thy care;
My life do I lay down,
That in my kingdom thou may'st wear
A bright, immortal crown!"

O Thou, our hope, our life, our love!
We know that Thou wilt be
The light that shineth from above
To lead us unto Thee!

And when, as victors in the strife,
We yield to Thee our breath,
O may we rise again to LIFE,
Nor know the second death!

Charity.—No. 5.

Charity is above the virtue of Martyrdom.—"Though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." A man may die for his opinions, and yet be destitute of true charity. Infidelity has had its martyrs. The Romish church hers; but both systems of faith are incompatible with "Charity" in a Scriptural sense. Many a professor in the Christian Church, no doubt, has died a martyr's death upon the block, or burned at the stake, or been given to the wild beasts to be devoured, and yet they were destitute of love.

Real christian martyrdom has the element of love in it, as exhibited in the death of Christ when he could pray for his enemies in the affecting language—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and as seen too—Stephen the first christian martyr, when with a "loud voice" he cried "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." A patriot may die for his country, and yet flee from the fires of persecution which would test his love for the good of universal man. There are patriots in our day; or who pretend to be,—who would fight in the face of the cannon's mouth in defence of our country against foreign invasion and a hostile foe; but will allow Roman Catholic influence to corrupt our politics,—destroy the purity of the ballot box, remove the Bible from the common school,—though the first book of moral culture in the world; and otherwise undermine the liberties and institutions of our beloved country,—and who will support the system of slavery, and its aggressive power to the extent of their influence, even to the crushing of its millions of victims, and yet suppose they are possessed of charity!

Charity is love to universal man;—to all created intelligences; and seeks the universal good and happiness of all.

"The State of Souls."

Under this heading there is an article in the editorial column of the Independent, that seems to have attracted some attention in the religious world; but which appears to me to be full of contradictions, and "flights of conjecture and discovery," as they seem to admit. They begin by an assertion without any evidence or proof. "One thing, however, we must believe in regard to it, (the soul) that it is in a state of active, vivid consciousness."

I do not see where this "must" comes from, it certainly does not come from the Bible; that declares that the dead know not anything, in that very day their thoughts perish. Neither does it follow from their after argument, for they admit that it is destitute of sensation; all the senses go to sleep in the grave, and whatever is dependent upon them becomes quiescent." They can neither see, hear, speak, or feel. They are "in the presence of Christ," and yet do not know where they are; they have no idea or cognizance of time; do not "know duration or change;" are not "rewarded or punished." Is it no penalty to be under the dominion of death? But yet they are in a state of happiness or misery, "and have a vivid active consciousness." Was there ever such a jumble of contradictions and "flights of conjecture" and imagination as this?

Again, they acknowledge that very little is revealed in the Bible of an intermediate state, and that the resurrection is the period of future reward and punishment, and remark: "It is human to tattle in such premises; it is God-like to hold all in awful sequestration!" Who are the "tattlers" on this subject? Is it not those who pretend to explain by mere figments of the imagination, what they confess is not revealed in the book? Who strive to be wise above what is written; and thus prove that they are "human?"

Where there is such a strange variety of opinion on any subject, it must needs be, that conjecture and imagination is the baseless fabric on which men build, instead of the rock of Divine truth.

A noted Scotch minister remarked at a funeral the other day, that the lowest order of beings in the heavenly world were angels! The spirits of the redeemed were greatly superior to them in power and glory! Another popular minister, a few days after, told his people that the righteous, at death, were made equal to the angels! Then what need of a resurrection, for they will be at that time equal to the angels, and no more? Does not this system virtually do away with the great scriptural doctrine of "the resurrection of the dead?"

Where there are so many various and contradictory views of the state of the dead, it is evident that our would-be-wise men are, on this subject, altogether in the dark, and it is to be feared, will practically experience the truth of the old saying: "When the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch." They seem to have a marvelous faculty of seeing things that have no existence, and, at the same time, are utterly unable to discern what is clearly revealed in God's word as to the final abode of the righteous after the judgment of the great day.

Some locate the redeemed in Paradise, which, they tell us, is a part of Hades. Some place them in first, second, or third heaven. Some banish them "beyond the bounds of time and space," and all seem to forget the promise of God to give to those who love him an everlasting inheritance in the "New Heavens and the New Earth," in the New Jerusalem, that comes down from God out of Heaven on the earth. The righteous shall be recompenced on the earth.

Christ has promised to come again the second time, to set up his kingdom under the whole heavens; to subdue all things to himself; to reign over the house of Jacob forever; to destroy the kingdom of Satan, and to have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. Surely there are none so blind, as those who will not see the exceeding great and precious promises God has treasured up in his Word, for the consolation of his suffering and sanctified ones, that they shall reign with Christ in his kingdom.

In the prospect of this blessed hope Christ taught his disciples daily to hope and pray—"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth, as it is in heaven."

Home Missions.—No. 2.

In my first I put the question to our brethren in Maine,—shall we make another missionary effort? Some may reply, that nearly all our efforts are now on that principle. If this is so, then can we not put it on a footing to increase it, to direct our efforts to given points?

Here let me specify. We notice that in some of the States, a society is formed, a fund is raised and pledged, one or more faithful laborers are chosen and sent out as Evangelists, to preach where there is an ear to hear, to supply destitute churches with the word of life, and to open new interests for the message of the kingdom of God. These men go out to preach and visit, to pray and instruct, from "house to house," not to preach and peddle, nor to preach without time to study the word, and then retire to bed to study and pray, and plan how their family shall be fed and clothed, house rent and other bills met, until the night is spent, then to arise to pursue some scheme decided upon to earn the money. No; not to go out west under these embarrassments, but to go and labor with all his energies for the unsearchable riches of Christ; to present the claims of the Gospel, its hope, and the duty to support, as well as to hear and believe it, take up collections and receive what may be freely given for the mission, and his family be supported with the fund in the missionary treasury.

These are the points to which I wish to direct your attention. It is not to interfere with the labors of pastors of churches, nor to draw away their necessary support; but to call into action much that is now dormant,—to open a channel for those who are isolated from the treasury of the Lord, and to stir up others to enlist in the cause of truth, and to set men of God in the field who can and ought to preach constantly, but who cannot now do so because our means are not so directed as to sustain them. Let us remember God works by means. Yours in behalf of Christ,

I. C. Wellcome.

Morning.

"The watchman saith, 'The morning cometh.'"—Isa. 21: 12.

O, the dreary, dreary darkness, how it girds the stifled land!
How it falls in viewless torrents from the frowning midnight skies!
When shall Lucifer resplendent on the eastern mountains stand?
Will the morning never rise?

Tell me, oh ye bards prophetic, where in olden time ye stood,
When he saw the flying shadows and the swift-approaching day;
Saw its bannered army marching like a silver-rolling flood
Through the lands where darkness lay.

I have climbed these earthly Babels, many and many a time, to look
For the dawning of the morning in the eastern sky afar;
But I saw at brightest, only in some dim, cloud-circled nook,
One lone, faintly burning star.

Upward, upward through the darkness, mount on Faith's undrooping wing,
Till the dim horizon merges in Eternity's broad sea!
Till the eye shall catch the glory which the latter day shall bring
To the millions yet to be.

See the heavy, blinding shadows, lying sadly, like a pall,
On the nations that have never felt the gladness of the light.
And they love their weary groping: Father, hear us when we call,
Let the blind receive their sight!

O, let morning, radiant morning, come with healing in its breath,
Filling vale, and crowning mountain with the splendor of its beams;
Let the slumbering millions waken, ere they sleep the sleep of death,
From the madness of their dreams!

Yonder! see the cloudy curtains of the East are rising now;
And the morning twilight glimmers, and the daylight follows fast;
Floods of radiance are streaming o'er the mountains' kindling brow;
Life and day have come at last!

See the startled nations waking: giants bursting from their chains;
Heroes, girding on their panoply and hasting to the field;
Hear a million voices singing on a thousand smiling plains
Of the glory just revealed.

* * * * * * *

Ah, how many hearts have waited for the glory of this time!
Beat their faintest, last pulsations with a yearning for the dawn;
Ah, how many ears have hearkened for this triumph note sublime,
Till both faith and sense were gone!

Sorrowing, yet rejoicing ever,—hoping for the promised gain,—
Struggling toward the great Hereafter with the earnestness of love,
Passed they through this world triumphant in a faith that rock'd not pain,
To a grander sight above.

In that city, built of sapphire, walled with jasper, paved with gold,
Where the Tree of Life is growing, crowned with heavenly fruitage fair,
Kingdoms, tribes and tongues and peoples shall be gathered and enrolled,
"And there shall be no night there."

To a Certain Reader.

Fellow disciple, when were you last in your closet for devotional purposes? Did you go there because you desired and loved communion with God? Did you first of all read a portion of His word, with the feeling that you ought to hear him, before speaking to him? How long did you remain there? Did you grudge the time, or regard it as a sacrifice? Had you any spiritual perception of the presence of God, and did you feel that you was holding intercourse with Him at the mercy seat? Had you any humbling, refreshing view of Christ as the Mediator between you and infinite purity?

In your acknowledgment of mercies, were you sincerely grateful? Were your confessions prompted by a sense of guilt, and accompanied by deep emotions of penitence? How did your own moral nature appear when contrasted with the perfect holiness of God? Were your petitions the honest utterance of desires for favors which you really, earnestly wished to obtain? Did you remain on your knees until you had an inward assurance that your prayer was heard? Was it the prayer of faith?

Were you in no respect crippled or embarrassed by a conscious self-condemnation, occasioned by a recollection of your own inconsistencies? Did you remember no wrong done to others, for which you had made no reparation? Did you, from the heart, forgive all who had injured you? Was there no sin which conscience told you was unrepented of? Was you willing and anxious to give up every sin, however small, however inwrought into your habits? Did you make no secret reservation?

Did you fervently plead for the conversion of sinners? Had you, during the preceding twenty-four hours, done anything for the salvation of any soul, upon which you could ask the blessing of God? For whose conversion, in particular, did you pray?

When you came out of your closet, which way did your heart turn? Were you reluctant to leave the spot, or were you eager to get away and mingle with the world? How long did the influence of that season of devotion remain with you, and what was its effect upon your subsequent spirit and conscience? Do you long for the hour to arrive when you can again retire and hold communion with God?

Will you now turn to the following passages, and meditate upon them? Mat. 6: 6; Mark 11: 24—26; Psalm 66: 18; Gen. 32: 26; James 5: 16; Psalm 109: 4.—Watchman and Reflector.

Forward!

A WORD FOR ANXIOUS INQUIRERS.

It is the first step that costs. When the Israelites came up to the Red Sea, the command of God was, "Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." But how? The Jewish leader might well cry out, We have no fleet to bear us over. "Go forward!" But, Lord! we cannot for the gulf before us. "Go forward!" Wouldst thou have us, Lord, to perish in the billows? Still the same answer comes—"Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." The command is peremptory. It admits of no delay. And just as soon as Israel goes forth in obedience to Jehovah's voice, lo! the waves part asunder, and the mighty cavalcade marches through, dry shod! Unhesitating obedience to God always insures a blessing.

Here is a lesson for troubled inquirers. To you comes the command of God, "Go forward." Death is behind you. Hell followeth hard after you. There is no salvation in retreat. Heaven lies before you—not behind. No man ever saved his soul by relapsing into indifference. If you give up you are lost.

1. Perhaps you say, "I have prayed many a time already, and no blessing has yet come." Will you cease to pray then? Will that bring an answer? As well might a voyager to Liverpool, when one hundred miles from port, put about his helm, and steer back to New York; he is almost there; why does the foolish man retreat? How many a soul has quit praying when the door of mercy was just about opening to him! Go forward.

2. Another one is kept back by fear of ridicule. He cannot stand a laugh. There is a sneer waiting for him at his father's table, or a cutting sarcasm in his counting-room. He wavers before it. He winces under the slightest word, and imagines terrible things in store for himself. Go forward; the sea will open to you, and so will many a heart to cheer you on. You will inspire respect in the very quarters from which you now expect opposition. He is a weakling who is pushed back with a straw.

3. A third person complains, "I am in the dark; I cannot see my way." Then go forward, and get out of the dark. The determination to do your duty will be attended by a luminous discernment of the path of duty. God will show you the way; only go forward, looking for the cross.

4. Unbelief draws back a fourth. There is only one way to conquer doubt. It is—to believe. Then, instead of halting and shivering in an ague-fit of indecision, take a bold decisive step. End the torturing uncertainty by going forward, "looking unto Jesus."

The only way to do a thing is to do it. God gives strength to the obedient. He has no promise for cowards or double-minded vacillating doubters. He bestows grace on those who try to do their duty. His grace is all-sufficient for you. The deepest sea of difficulties will divide its waters for your advancing footsteps, just as soon as you determine to obey that voice which says to you, Go forward.—Chr. Intel.

"There are battles fierce and many,
By our valor to be fought,
And we want for soldiers any
Who will fight as brave men ought;
Not with sword of glittering steel
Laying waste the fruitful lands,
But with humble, christian zeal,
And the Bible in our hands."

Christian Principle.

A few years ago, in a violent storm, a ship was driven upon the bar on the south shore of Long Island. The waves swept over the deck, and the crew clung for safety to the rigging. Upon the shore, a company of men were gathered who stood motionless by the life-boat which they dragged to the beach. They were appalled by the danger, and felt that it would be certain death to venture out upon such a sea. Suddenly, a man who had once been a sailor rushed down to the beach, took his place by the boat, and shouted, "Come, men, lend a hand; I've been there myself!" That appeal was enough. The life boat shot forth among the foaming breakers on its merciful though perilous mission, and the crew were saved. That sailor had experienced a similar peril; he had felt the joy of rescue, and was ready to hazard his life to carry the same boon to those shipwrecked men. So the christian, because of his experimental appreciation of the worth of the Gospel, labors successfully to extend its blessings when other men would yield to despair. He has seen flaming up before him the wrath of an offended God; and he has felt the embrace of a loving Father as he forgave and welcomed the returning prodigal. He was once in the horrible pit and the miry clay, and now his feet are planted upon the rock. His soul was once famishing and faint, and now he feels that he shall hunger no more; he shall thirst no more. Once he was without hope and without God in the world, and now he rejoices in the anticipation of eternal glory, and is able to look up to God and say, Abba, Father! Can such an one grow weary, or be disheartened, or shrink from danger in striving to extend the influence of the Gospel? Never!

The Bible.—Out of it have come all pure moralities. Forth from it have sprung all sweet charities. It has been the motive power of regeneration and reformation to millions of men. It has comforted the humble, consoled the mourning, sustained the suffering, and given trust and triumph to the dying. The wise old man has fallen asleep with it folded to his breast. The simple cottager has used it for his dying pillow; and even the innocent child has breathed his last happy sigh with his fingers between its promise-freighted leaves.—Timothy Titcomb.

God Unchangeable.—There are many christians like young sailors, who think the shore and the whole land do move, when the ship and they themselves are moved; just so, not a few imagine that God moveth, and faileth, and changeth places, because their godly souls are subject to alteration; but the foundation of the Lord abideth sure.—Rutherford.

A Lesson from the Birds.

"See how it rains, rains, rains," said little Mary Jellis, as she gazed from the closet window of her mother's chamber, longing to see the shower cease and the sun shine out bright and clear again. "Oh! mamma, it will never stop, and I do hate rainy weather." Just then a little bird, whose nest hung from a tree not far off, broke out in one of his sweetest strains, and Mary listened wonderingly.

"Hark, daughter, hear what the bird says," said her good mamma, who observed the fixed attention of her little one.

"Why, it only sings," answered Mary.

"Yes; but while you are fretting and whining in this nice, large room, with all your playthings around you, and doll waiting to be dressed, birdie sings from the dripping bushes as though he would remind you that God makes the rain fall! See how his throat swells."

Mary looked up to the bough, and sure enough there he was, warbling merrily, and when his song ceased, she said it was because she had quit murmuring at the weather.

The next day, Anna Grey came over to spend the day with her friend, and while playing together on the green grass, Anna suddenly laid by her doll, and ran towards the house.

"Why do you go away?" cried Mary, surprised at her sudden freak.

"Oh! it's so hot we can't play out of doors. I do wish the sun would go under a cloud, and stay there a good bit."

"Why hear that little bird in the bush," answered Mary, laughing in her sleeve, as she remembered her rainy day lesson.

"Well, what of it?"

"Why, it says, 'God makes the sun shine,' and Mary forthwith related her experience with the bird. From that day to this, Mary and Anna are content with either rain or sunshine, for they recollect the lesson of the birds—Little Pilgrim.

The Boy that obeyed God rather than Man.

In a town in one of the midland counties of England lived a poor boy; his clothes were almost threadbare, and his daily allowance of food was often very scanty. He was an orphan, and having no one to provide for him, he supported himself by working at a factory, where he earned five shillings a week. He was a very good boy, and loved to read his Bible, and to go to the house of God on the Sabbath day. But he had an ungodly master, who knowing of his wish to go to church on the Sabbath, ordered him to come to work on that day. However, Jem thought it his duty not to obey, and accordingly spent that sacred day in his usual peaceful manner.

The next morning, when he presented himself at the factory, the master inquired, "Where were you yesterday?" The boy answered, "I went to church, sir." "Then you may go to church again to-day!" replied the master, angrily; and paying him what was due to him, he instantly dismissed him. Jem was now without any means of earning a livelihood; but he knew it was useless to despair, so he began to look out for another situation.

On one of his applications, a gentleman asked him the reason of his dismissal from his former place. The boy replied, "Because I did not wish to go to work on the Sabbath, sir." The merchant was much pleased with this answer, and immediately engaged him at the increased wages of ten shillings a week. "Godliness has promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."—Ex.

A Beautiful incident.

In the public school in Coates Street, above Twelfth, in this city, one day last week, while the school was in session, a transom window fell out with a crash. By some means the cry of "fire" was raised, and a terrible panic ensued. The scholars rushed into the street shrieking in wild dismay. The alarm extended to the teachers also, one of whom, a young lady, actually jumped from the window. Among the hundreds of children, with whom the building was crowded, was one girl, among the best in the school, who, through all the frightful scene, maintained entire composure. The color indeed forsook her cheek. Her lip quivered. The tears stood in her eyes. But she moved not. After order had been restored, and her companions had been brought back to their places, the question was asked her, how she came to sit still without apparent alarm, when everybody else was in such a fright. "My father," said she, "is a fireman, and knows what to do in such a case, and he told me, if there was an alarm of fire in the school, I must just sit still." What a beautiful illustration of faith? "My father told me so, and my father knows!" That is the gist of the whole matter—implicit, unfaltering trust in our Heavenly Father.—Guardian.

The Simplicity of Christ.

"But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ."—2 Cor. 11: 3.

The Corinthian church seems to be compounded of the two elements, excellence and folly. The evil of contention had appeared among its members, and they had broken up into several parties, one calling itself after Paul, another after Apollos, another after Cephas, and doubtless becoming somewhat warm, they had carried their debate to such a length as to threaten destruction to the entire body. The great apostle, apprised of this by letter, wrote his two epistles, containing wholesome advice, together with an excellent code of laws for their government, which, if followed, would serve to restore them to that unanimity which ran so much danger of being annihilated. The numerous points of disputes were analysed, and reduced to their proper bearing; and rules of conduct laid down by Paul for their future government.

The primary cause of all was, that the church had departed from its original sympliciity, become factious and discordant, proud of its knowledge and privileges, and consequently fell away from that virtue which appears so lovely among those who, sinking every idea of self, are wholly swallowed up in the love of God through Jesus Christ, and hourly striving to demean themselves to the standard prescribed.

The character of our Lord, as set forth in the Scriptures, is of the most unblemished excellence that can be imagined; and even those who profess to deny his very existence, admit that, although it is as immaterial as the gorgeous rainbow which throws its aerial arch from cloud to cloud, it is a sublime conception of all the cardinal virtues embodied. To us, whose faith in his divine reality is our only hope, he is the chief of all the works of God, a merciful Savior and a mighty King; and our hearts bound with rapturous gratitude when we contemplate from what an exalted station he descended, and what he endured, and all for love to fallen man. His humility, in his choice of birth and companions, and in his submission to a cruel and ignominious death; his patience under temptation, insult, buffetings and stripes; his gentleness, when led like a lamb to the slaughter; his freedom from malice and revenge when, suffering the most acute agony, he exclaimed—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" (How different such a spirit from that of too many professing christians when suffering under wrong!") his charity, going about doing good, feeding the hungry, healing the sick, raising the dead, and offering to all a free salvation; his long-suffering, in bearing with the waywardness of his ungrateful people, who like swine trampled under foot the inestimable pearl, and turned rending upon the giver. How his tender heart dissolved into tears, when from the mountain he looked upon and wept over the doomed city of David—"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not." Thus every attribute, which makes a being amiable and good, was embraced in that which the apostle calls the "simplicity of Christ."

His childlike simplicity is essentially necessary to salvation; for, says Jesus—"Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdom of heaven." Matt. 18: 3. This was spoken as a warning to those of his disciples who evinced a disposition to covet honor and an exalted station above their fellows, and plainly showed them that the way to "the mount above" was through the low valley of humility.

This simplicity is always opposed to worldly wisdom, now, even as when the self-sufficient Jew stumbled over it, and the polished Greek treated it with scorn. The Greek philosophers, with Plato at their head, with all the learning which could possibly be acquired by man, independent of Divine revelation, would never by their industry have found out God, or formed a just estimate of his Divine Nature. They peopled the mountains with Jupiter and inferior deities, and the earth with demi-gods and goddesses; and all their ideas of heavenly beatitude were such as tallied with the indulgence of their lusts and passions. Neither have the Pagan sages and philosophers, with all their investigations, handed down to us discoveries which have really been useful to us, this being reserved for men who loved and feared the Lord, as Newton, Boyle, Pascal, and many others.

This simplicity should be manifested in preaching. How very many ministers entirely destroy the simple beauty of the text, by endeavoring to heighten the effect by the miserable daubing of their bombast, which they mistake for eloquence. Earth, water, fire and air are ransacked for metaphors to illustrate the subject, and the speaker, like an exhausted gobbler, works himself up to the very verge of apoplexy; and so violent has been the effervescence that nothing remains but froth! Thunder, lightning and cataracts are favorite similies used by these sublime orators; yet Christ, in his simplicity, says—"Consider the lillies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Matt. 6: 28, 29; Luke 12: 27.

Christian simplicity, as shown in acts of benevolence, is not preceded by sound of trump or self-applauding clamor. Christ inculcates this unostentatious philanthropy, by exhorting them not to let their right hand know what their left hand doeth. And Paul, writing to the Romans, says, "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity." Rom. 12: 8. Thousands upon thousands of dollars might be placed under the caption of some great man's benevolence, and yet the donor be as utterly devoid of charity or merit in the gift, as those who never gave a shilling to the poor; for the "searcher of hearts" might discover that the motive was personal aggrandizement, and not the glory of God and love for his fellow man.

This simplicity is shown in the christian's conduct. Paul rejoices that he and his coworkers have, through grace, been circumspect. "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world." 2 Cor. 1: 12. "We have had our conversation" should be translated—"We have conducted ourselves;" for such is the signification of the Greek word Anestraphemen; and properly refers to the whole course of a man's life, its aim and object. "The verb anastrepho, is compounded of ana, again, and stepho, to turn; a continual coming back again to the point from which he set out; a circulation, beginning, continuing, and ending everything to the glory of God." See Clarke on this text. Influenced by the Spirit of God, as the planets by the sun, held in their spheres by his attraction, and warmed and enlightened by the effulgence of his glory; or, like the blood thrown from the heart, after traversing every artery and vein in the human body, returns to its source for strength, purity and vitality.

Simplicity is shown in self-depreciation. There were some in the church at Corinth, like some at the present day, who had a much higher opinion of themselves than was seemly among christians. This spirit is the source of much trouble in a church, and unless brought under subjection will work much evil. This arrogance is always demonstrated in those who really know the least; for the truly wise man, like a branch heavily laden with fruit, bows lowest to the earth. The great apostle aims at such a disturber of the harmony which should exist, thus: "If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world," that is, affecteth a superiority over his brethren—"let him become a fool that he may be wise." Let him throw overboard that self-sufficiency which inflateth to vanity, and be satisfied to be considered a fool by those who pride themselves in worldly wisdom, and being thus emptied of self, is fit to receive the wisdom of God abundantly, receiving as babes that divine revelation which God thought fit to hide from the wise and prudent. See Matt. 11: 25; Ps. 19: 7; 119: 130.

The simple have the spirit to be profited by the correction of others, and thus be led to bow low their head to escape that stroke which overturns all who set up their philosophy in opposition to the word of God. "Smite the scorner, and the simple will beware: and reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge." Prov. 19: 25. "When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise."—Prov. 21: 11.

This simplicity is exemplified in David: "Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of its mother: my soul is even as a weaned child."—Ps. 131: 1, 2. Also in Jeremiah 1: 6. "Then said I, ah, Lord God! behold I cannot speak; for I am a child."

If we be permitted to call God our father, we must humble ourselves to his will, with the simple confidence of loving and obedient children, without calling in question his right to command, or his power to execute his promises or threatenings. It is not necessary for a dutiful child to understand the purposes of his father, to insure his obedience; he is convinced that he is secure in the superior wisdom and might of his parent, and, yielding implicitly to his desire, he fearlessly ventures upon his father's word. Thus it should be with the christian—thus it was with Christ. With power to avoid suffering, he bowed to his Father's will; and while the bloody sweat fell from his sacred body, he cried, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me! nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt."

Let us therefore cultivate the simplicity of Christ, and whatever trials, sorrows or temptations may assail, we shall be able in the heaviest hour of trouble to echo the words of our dear Lord and Saviour—"Not my will, but thine be done!"

Awake and Sing!

BY M. L. H.

Awake ye! awake ye! Break forth into singing—
Ye who in the dust have been dwelling so long!
Soon heaven's broad expanse shall with praises be ringing,
When ye shall unite in the victor's glad song.
Within death's damp prison ye long have been sleeping,
And round its dark portals the pilgrims are weeping;
But Jesus is mighty—"the keys" he is keeping,
He's coming in glory to wake you ere long.

Soon, soon shall the bonds of corruption be riven,
By Christ, the Redeemer, Deliverer and King;
Then praises unceasing to him shall be given,
By glorified saints, who in Zion shall sing.
Then through Time's dark valley, while night shades are o'er me,
I'll sing; for the Mount and the Morn are before me—
The mountain of song, and the mountain of glory,
Where all of the ransomed immortal shall sing.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 23.

MY DEAR SISTER:—There is one more failing, another easily besetting sin, of which I would speak, and then close this series of letters, already protracted far beyond my intentions. It is this—an impatience of spirit towards the faults and errors of others. We are prone to be hasty—ofttimes to censure our brethren and sisters for their deviation from the strict path of rectitude. Forgetful of our own infirmities, our own deficiencies, we regard with impatience the errors of others. With a beam projecting from our own eye, we would fain extract the mote from a brother's eye.

I believe it to be true that those who have had the most clear discovery of their own nature—the corruption of their own heart—are the most ready to offer an excuse for an erring brother or sister. Oppressed with a sense of their own weakness, their own short comings, their own struggles to overcome selfish nature, and repel temptation, they are prepared to sympathise with others in their failures—in their struggles. As they kneel at the mercy-seat, scarcely daring to look heavenward, so weighed down in spirit with a consciousness of imperfections, of short comings, how sweetly does the whisper of the angel of the covenant fall upon the heart, bringing to remembrance the words of Holy Writ, "Who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities."

How faith now wings her way to heaven, and rests on the bosom of that "Advocate with the Father." Once he was a "man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." He was a man of "like passions with us"—he suffered, being tempted; he hungered, he thirsted, he was weary, he was sad, he was persecuted—forsaken—betrayed: and all this that he might be qualified to become a merciful and compassionate High Priest—that he might be touched with the very feelings that our infirmities awaken within us. We remember how patiently he bore with the errors of his disciples—with what compassionate sympathy he addressed the woman brought before him, for whom her accusers clamored for accusation.

We remember a Peter, who with oaths denied his Lord, but who was by him forgiven. We are cheered with the thought that he merited the accusation brought against him by self-righteous Pharisees, viz., "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." What though there were apparently no tokens of love—no sweet manifestations of sympathy towards those hypocritical Scribes and Pharisees, who, wrapped up in a garment of their own righteousness, deemed themselves perfectly whole, and in no need of a physican? What though his withering rebukes and denunciations fell harshly upon their ears? Towards the erring ones—the "lost sheep of the house of Israel," and the despised Gentile, his arms of love were opened wide—for them he had words of kindness, and a large place in his heart of love. Hear him as he teaches his disciples a lesson on forgiveness. He limits it not to a transgression seven times repeated, but until seventy times seven!—Well might the apostles ask, "Lord, increase our faith!" Long time has he borne with our transgressions—oft-repeated have been the pardons received, and shall we condemn an erring brother and sister for occasional errors?

What says the inspired apostle? "Charity," or love, "covereth a multitude of faults." Notice also the advice given in respect to the faults of our brethren and sisters. "If any man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted."

Spiritual ones are required to restore, not condemn—not crush—not injure; and they are to do it in meekness, mildly, gently, not upbraidingly; considering themselves that they are liable to be tempted and overcome, and they ought to exercise the same spirit toward their erring brother, that they would like to have exercised toward them. O how many, who might have been recalled to the path of virtue—who might have been reclaimed from their sin by meekness and love, have been driven further and further from God, and his church, by a denunciatory spirit and harsh dealing.

The exercise of a compassionate spirit—the winning words of love—the fair and honorable dealing with the transgressor, accomplish more towards their rescue, than the severe denunciation—the telling abroad the fault—the look of scorn and cold shoulder. Too often there appears at first view, to outward observation, a deviation, when, if the matter were fully examined—if all the motives and causes could be ascertained there might be less cause for censure, and perhaps none at all. In some cases, disease induces a restlessness of spirit, an irritability of the nervous system, which exhibits itself in petulancy; little things irritate; sometimes pain in the head distracts the mind—a morbid state of the liver produces melancholy, listlessness, etc. These are too lightly regarded by those unqualified to sympathize; and many a devoted christian, whose whole soul is in the work of God, whose will is in harmony with his, is the subject of censure, when "pity ought to be shown for his friend." From the infirmities induced by a diseased body, there is no salvation provided in the gospel—the resurrection to immortality alone can effect a cure, unless there be first a removal of the disease; therefore such infirmities ought not to be classed with other sins.

"Forbearing one another in love." How important this command, and how blessed the results if obeyed. To meekly bear the coldness, the condemnation of others, for those errors or imperfections which are not the fruit of an unsanctified nature, but of a diseased body, requires much patience and love. Sweet is the thought—Jesus knows all about us. Our Father in heaven pities us, for he knoweth our frame—he remembereth that we are dust. Prayer should be our solace. Submission to these painful trials ought ever to be exercised. Every thing will be adjusted and made right at the judgment.

May God bestow upon us that grace which shall wholly sanctify our natures—impart to us holy principles—give us the spirit of forgiveness toward our enemies—patience with the infirmities of others—victory over every temptation, and bring us safely to the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen. Farewell.

☞ For every one life has some blessing—some cup that is not mixed with bitterness. At every heart there is some fountain of pure water, and all men at some time taste its sweetness. Who is he that has not found in his path of life some fragrant rosebush, scenting all the air with its sweet perfume, and cheering the heart of the weary traveler with its beauty?

"Hail! sacred truth, whose piercing rays
Dispel the shades of night;
Diffusing o'er a ruined world
The healing beams of light."

☞ It ill becomes us to be rash and hasty in our censures of others, and to be forward to believe people guilty of bad things, while either the matter of fact on which the censure is grounded, is doubtful and suspected, or is capable of a good construction. Charity commands us to hope the best concerning all, and forbids censoriousness.

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER II.

ARE THERE RADICALLY BAD MEN?

By radically bad men, I do not mean persons who are born of badness and unto badness, as if character were a thing of parentage or race. But, are there human beings in whom evil feelings, purposes and habits so predominate that they mark and determine the character? And I use the popular phrase "bad men," rather than the Scriptural phrase "the wicked," because I think the former best represents the latter in its original and proper sense. But Scriptural expressions are apt to be used in a technical and conventional sense; "the righteous" and "the wicked" may come to signify men who are such according to an arbitrary and false standard. This is a great evil, and it needs to be corrected by substituting for the technical phrases such homely but hearty Saxon words as scarcely need defining.

And by the question, Are there radically bad men?—I do not mean to intimate that there are no traces of good nature even in the worst men. The real question will be, Is the "good in all," upon which the Universalist so much relies, a genuine goodness, a real virtue, a moral principle? Is it an element so substantial and a germ so vital, that it must by a natural law of character grow and develop into a prevailing goodness and a final salvation? If this question is answered in the negative, then the question remains, Will God, by methods higher than the native elements of character, secure in all men a final holiness and blessedness? This question will be considered in the closing chapter.

Here, at the outset, I should discard a host of rash and conventional judgments that are wont to be pronounced upon human character. Men are too often judged good or bad according to outward appearance. This is the way of men as compared with the judgment of Him who looketh upon the heart. Precisely this is meant by the "respect of persons" which the Scriptures so much rebuke. Human nature, fallen desperately in love with happiness, is apt to think that those who are "well off" must be good people, and that those who are badly off must be bad folks. This was the great mistake of Job's friends, and it has been made thousands of times since his day. God is no such "respecter of persons," or of outward advantages; but in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, in whatever condition, is accepted of him.

This principle cuts off all hasty condemnation of the heathen in the mass, as if they must inevitably perish. If they cherish true goodness and virtue, neither their ignorance nor their unscriptural methods of worship will exclude them from God's kingdom. But as ignorance is a very great evil, and the gospel is worth preaching to every body, the question remains, Whether a heathen, with his false views of God, may not lose confidence in the supremacy of goodness, take the side of an evil divinity because the evil divinity is supposed to be the more powerful, and thus debauch the conscience and allow vice to become a settled policy and ruling principle of the character? How else shall we understand Paul's account, in which, after giving a long catalogue of heathen sins, he says: "Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them?"

In judging of character, I also throw out of account all considerations of natural temper or disposition, as amiable or otherwise. The brutes, in their measure, may have these as well as men. We are responsible, not for the nature we are born with, but for the use we make of native temper and capacity, in repressing the evil and cherishing the good. I also throw out of the account the manifold differences of education and custom, whereby the same act which expresses ill feeling and hate in one man may express goodness and love in another man. All this, I presume, is so well understood between himself and my opponent, that it needs only to be named, and not argued.

The whole subject of human character is a vast one, and it is all involved in the question if there be radically bad men. I can only pretend to make a few points of the general argument,—suggestions only, where demonstration,—in a matter so prejudiced by manifold dispute—would require a volume.

This mystery of sin, which seems to be involved in the very idea of moral character, has been recognized by various eminent writers, ever since the time of Plato. I will quote but one, and that one doubtless a Universalist. I mean Neander, whose labors in Church History have such signal merit because he was not a mere compiler of facts, but a philosopher, profoundly versed in the causes of human action. He says: "According to my conviction, the origin of evil can only be understood as a fact—a fact possible by virtue of the freedom belonging to a human being, but not to be otherwise deduced or explained. It lies in the idea of evil that it is an utterly inexplicable thing; and whoever would explain it nullifies the very idea of it. It is not the limits of our knowledge which make the origin of sin something inexplicable to us, but it follows from the essential nature of sin as an act of free will that it must remain to all eternity an inexplicable fact. It can only be understood emphatically by means of the moral self-consciousness."—Planting and Training of the Church, bk. 6, chap. 1, note.

1. The first point to be insisted on is the essential and responsible freedom of the human will. I believe—it is almost a proverb—that the common consciousness of man asserts his freedom. Without this there could be no merit, either good or ill. Without this, whatever right or wrong there might be in the nature of things, there could be neither in actions, or in men. There could be neither praise nor blame, there could be no character, worthy of the name. Without freedom, the native dispositions and original feelings of men might be more complex than those of the brute, and more interesting for study; they might be more agreeable or disagreeable, more fortunate or unfortunate; still they would be the inevitable result of forces within the man and of circumstances without him, for which he would be as thankless and as blameless as the revolutions of the windmill.

But this practical consciousness of freedom,—which excuses or condemns ourselves if it be real, and makes God an imposter if it be unreal—has been often denied for the sake of a theory. I believe it has often been denied by men troubled with a sense of guilt, of which they wished to be rid. Still more unfortunately has it been deemed by divines, to save their views of a divine sovereignty and efficiency, or to save a false theory respecting God's fore-knowledge. Supposing that God could foreknow only as a natural philosopher does, or as an astronomer predicts an eclipse,—by calculations of cause and effect,—they have ignored all actions that could not be determined by such calculation. The same class of divines have also been prejudiced by a false theory of freedom; one which divorced the will utterly from moral considerations, and reduced it to a sheer caprice. At an earlier date—in the Reformation—the notion of free will was supposed to make man independent of the gratuitous help of God. This explains that remarkable book of Luther's, on the Bondage of the Will, (De Servo Arbitrio.) The other causes culminated in the no less remarkable and more famous work of Edwards on the Freedom of the Will.

Those who have opposed the Calvinistic scheme have often said that Universalism is its legitimate fruit. I think, for the theoretic denial of free will I have just named, that this is true. The Calvinists, by a happy inconsistency, have maintained a deep sense of the evil and wickedness of sin. But when they had, by a method ["more honored in the breach than in th' observance,"] made the Author of man's nature and surroundings responsible for all men's doings, it was natural that men should infer that God's fairness required the salvation of one as well as another. The principle, or rather the lack of principle, by which God elected one man, appeared equally good for the election of all men. Hence we need not wonder that the Universalism of eighty years ago was offered as a "Calvinism Improved"—a title given by Dr. Joseph Huntington to his Universalist book. Here another cause of Universalism is worthy of note. The Old School doctrine of the nature of the Atonement made it a legal satisfaction for the sins of the saved. The New School doctrine of the extent of the Atonement makes it sufficient for all men. Combine the two, and all are saved at a stroke of logic. Some of the Universalists have employed this logic, and the result of their reasoning abides, though the old and false view of the Atonement is discarded. But the Calvinistic views of the human will, I think, prevail now more among Universalists than among the Orthodox. I may have misjudged the thinkers of Universalism on this point, and if so I shall cheerfully stand corrected. But such is my strong impression.

Now I admit that the freedom of the human will, as [illegible] by any [illegible] power of motives, [illegible] of man no more traceable by any philosophy of cause and effect. We shall then have what Dr. Bushnell calls the "supernatural" in the will itself. And when the will does not follow the motives, or reasons which it ought to follow, there is a wild lawlessness that perplexes us, [illegible] disorder and ruin, limited only by the power of the perverse free agent. But this lawlessness is precisely what I understand to be the essence of sin. Sin is the transgression of law; and sin is guilty, and not unfortunate merely, just because it is not compelled by motive, or passion, or any cause out of the free will itself. And this, too, is the mystery of sin. It is that for which there is no valid reason,—an act which the person knows to be equally wrong and imprudent, and so an act of unreason; [illegible] admitting no excuse save those worthless pleas by which the selfish or malicious guilt was first palliated or instigated. Such are the excuses which the stammering tongue fails to utter when one is confronted with the conscience, suppressed for a while but again accusing. And by this final verdict of the conscience the guilty man is rendered—like him in the parable of the wedding garment—speechless.

I have thought it is important thus to insist on the freedom of the will and the reasonless nature of guilt, to show that man may be really guilty and bad. This alone, of course, does not prove any man radically bad, since one may, perhaps, repent of little sins, and reform himself into entire goodness. Yet the reasonless nature of guilt shows that it may not so be. He who acts foolishly, lawlessly, madly in a small matter, may do the same in things of weightier moment. He that is unjust in that which is least may also be unjust in much.—Nay, as physical disorder tends to further and utter derangement, so the human will forsaking the law of reason may gain fresh impulse away from the true good, and end in final and utter abandonment, in the darkness of un-reason which it has freely entered.

I will here remark that while I am glad to hear my Universalist friends speak of charity and forgiveness, and doubt not they cherish a real feeling of good will toward all, yet a very common theory pressed to its consistent results would destroy the very idea of charity and forgiveness. If no man acts against known duty or interest, if all are doing precisely according to their best light and knowledge, then what place for charity or pardon? One who is conscious of having done the best he knew or could, does not ask forgiveness, nor thank one for the offer of it. And if it is further said that men do wrong only under the influence of strong temptation, the question recurs, Do they not, with good conscience? and, Can they not resist and conquer their foes, the evil passions? If they can not, they need no pardon, for they are simply victims. If they can do better, their guilt remains; and while we should forgive until the seventy times seven, it should be with some fear that the actual and, in its measure, reasonless and causeless guilt may continue and subvert the soul. But let us never speak of forgiveness under a theory that leaves nothing to be forgiven.

2. The nature of genuine moral virtue is such that we should not hastily conclude that all men possess it, even in slight measure.—Virtue is something more than prudence, or a regard for one's interest. It is true that duty and interest ever coincide; neither can properly interfere with the other. Honesty is ever the best policy. Yet it has been well said that he who is honest from policy is not an honest man. To do a certain act because it is prudent and profitable, and to do the same act because it is right, generous and noble, are two very different things. Though all that is really virtuous is also really prudent, still here are two kinds of motive totally different. The two planes are indeed exactly parallel, and the figures are equal and similar; yet he who moves in one plane may have no sympathy whatever with him that moves in the other.—The two persons are of different aims, and may therefore reach different moral [illegible].

The Simplicity of Christ.

"But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ."—2 Cor. 11: 3.

The Corinthian church seems to be compounded of the two elements, excellence and folly. The evil of contention had appeared among its members, and they had broken up into several parties, one calling itself after Paul, another after Apollos, another after Cephas, and doubtless becoming somewhat warm, they had carried their debate to such a length as to threaten destruction to the entire body. The great apostle, apprised of this by letter, wrote his two epistles, containing wholesome advice, together with an excellent code of laws for their government, which, if followed, would serve to restore them to that unanimity which ran so much danger of being annihilated. The numerous points of disputes were analyzed, and reduced to their proper bearing; and rules of conduct laid down by Paul for their future government.

The primary cause of all was, that the church had departed from its original symplicity, become factious and discordant, proud of its knowledge and privileges, and consequently fell away from that virtue which appears so lovely among those who, sinking every idea of self, are wholly swallowed up in the love of God through Jesus Christ, and hourly striving to demean themselves to the standard prescribed.

The character of our Lord, as set forth in the Scriptures, is of the most unblemished excellence that can be imagined; and even those who profess to deny his very existence, admit that, although it is as immaterial as the gorgeous rainbow which throws its aerial arch from cloud to cloud, it is a sublime conception of all the cardinal virtues embodied. To us, whose faith in his divine reality is our only hope, he is the chief of all the works of God, a merciful Savior and a mighty King; and our hearts bound with rapturous gratitude when we contemplate from what an exalted station he descended, and what he endured, and all for love to fallen man. His humility, in his choice of birth and companions, and in his submission to a cruel and ignominious death; his patience under temptation, insult, buffetings and stripes; his gentleness, when led like a lamb to the slaughter; his freedom from malice and revenge when, suffering the most acute agony, he exclaimed—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" (How different, such a spirit from that of too many professing christians when suffering under wrong!") his charity, going about doing good, feeding the hungry, healing the sick, raising the dead, and offering to all a free salvation; his long-suffering, in bearing with the waywardness of his ungrateful people, who like swine trampled under foot the inestimable pearl, and turned rending upon the giver. How his tender heart dissolved into tears, when from the mountain he looked upon and wept over the doomed city of David—"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not." Thus every attribute, which makes a being amiable and good, was embraced in that which the apostle calls the "simplicity of Christ."

His childlike simplicity is essentially necessary to salvation; for, says Jesus—"Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdom of heaven." Matt. 18: 3. This was spoken as a warning to those of his disciples who evinced a disposition to covet honor and an exalted station above their fellows, and plainly showed them that "the way to "the mount above" was through the low valley of humility.

This simplicity is always opposed to worldly wisdom, now, even as when the [illegible] Jew stumbled over it, and the polished Greek treated it with scorn. The Grecian philosophers, with Plato at their head, with all the learning which could possibly be acquired by man, independent of Divine revelation, would never by their industry have found out God, or formed a just estimate of his Divine Nature. They peopled the mountains with Jupiter and inferior deities, and the earth with demi-gods and goddesses; and all their ideas of heavenly beatitude were such as tallied with the indulgence of their lusts and passions. Neither have the Pagan sages and philosophers, with all their investigations, handed down to us discoveries which have really been useful to us, this being reserved for men who loved and feared the Lord, as Newton, Boyle, Pascal, and many others.

This simplicity should be manifested in preaching. How very many ministers entirely destroy the simple beauty of the text, by endeavoring to heighten the effect by the miserable daubing of their bombast, which they mistake for eloquence. Earth, water, fire and air are ransacked for metaphors to illustrate the subject, and the speaker, like an exhausted gobbler, works himself up to the very verge of apoplexy; and so violent has been the effervescence that nothing remains but froth! Thunder, lightning and cataracts are favorite similies used by these sublime orators; yet Christ, in his simplicity, says—"Consider the lillies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Matt. 6: 28, 29; Luke 12: 27.

Christian simplicity, as shown in acts of benevolence, is not proceeded by sound of trump or self-applauding clamor. Christ inculcates this unostentatious philanthropy, by exhorting them not to let their right hand know what their left hand doeth. And Paul, writing to the Romans, says, "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity." Rom. 12 8. Thousands upon thousands of dollars might be placed under the caption of some great man's benevolence, and yet the donor be as utterly devoid of charity or merit in the gift, as those who never gave a shilling to the poor, for the "searcher of hearts" might discover that the motive was personal aggrandizement, and not the glory of God and love for his fellow man.

This simplicity is shown in the christian's conduct. Paul rejoices that he and his coworkers have, through grace, been circumspect. "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world." 2 Cor. 1: 12 "We have had our conversation" should be translated—"We have conducted ourselves;" for such is the signification of the Greek word Anestraphemen; and properly refers to the whole course of a man's life, its aim and object. "The verb anastrepho, is compounded of ana, again, and stepho, to turn, a continual coming back again to the point from which he set out; a circulation, beginning, continuing, and ending everything to the glory of God." See Clarke on this text. Influenced by the Spirit of God, as the planets by the sun, held in their spheres by his attraction, and warmed and enlightened by the effulgence of his glory; or, like the blood thrown from the heart, after traversing every artery and vein in the human body, returns to its source for strength, purity and vitality.

Simplicity is shown in self-depreciation. There were some in the church at Corinth, like some at the present day, who had a much higher opinion of themselves than was seemly among christians. This spirit is the source of much trouble in a church, and unless brought under subjection will work much evil. This arrogance is always demonstrated in those who really know the least; for the truly wise man, like a branch heavily laden with fruit, bows lowest to the earth. The great apostle aims at such a disturber of the harmony which should exist, thus: "If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world," that is, affecteth a superiority over his brethren—"let him become a fool that he may be wise." Let him throw overboard that self-sufficiency which inflateth to vanity, and be satisfied to be considered a fool by those who pride themselves in worldly wisdom, and being thus emptied of self, is fit to receive the wisdom of God abundantly, receiving as babes that divine revelation which God thought fit to hide from the wise and prudent. See Matt. 11: 25; Ps. 19: 7; 119: 130.

The simple have the spirit to be profited by the correction of others, and thus be led to bow low their head to escape that stroke which overturns all who set up their philosophy in opposition to the word of God. "Smite the scorner, and the simple will beware: and reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge." Prov. 19: 25. "When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise."—Prov. 21: 11. [illegible]

This simplicity is exemplified in David: "Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of its mother: my soul is even as a weaned child."—Ps. 131: 1, 2. Also in Jeremiah 1: 6. "Then said I, ah, Lord God! behold I cannot speak; for I am a child."

If we be permitted to call God our father, we must humble ourselves to his will, with the simple confidence of loving and obedient children, without calling in question his right to command, or his power to execute his promises or threatenings. It is not necessary for a dutiful child to understand the purposes of his father, to insure his obedience; he is convinced that he is secure in the superior wisdom and might of his parent, and, yielding implicitly to his desire, he fearlessly ventures upon his father's word. Thus it should be with the christian—thus it was with Christ. With power to avoid suffering, he bowed to his Father's will; and while the bloody sweat fell from his sacred body, he cried, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me! nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt."

Let us therefore cultivate the simplicity of Christ, and whatever trials, sorrows or temptations may assail, we shall be able in the heaviest hour of trouble to echo the words of our dear Lord and Saviour—"Not my will, but thine be done!"

Awake and Sing!

BY H. L. H.

Awake ye! awake ye! Break forth into singing—
Ye who in the dust have been dwelling so long!
Soon heaven's broad expanse shall with praises be ringing,
When ye shall unite in the victor's glad song.
Within death's damp prison ye long have been sleeping,
And round its dark portals the pilgrims are weeping;
But Jesus is mighty—"the keys" he is keeping,
He's coming in glory to wake you ere long

Soon, soon shall the bonds of corruption be riven,
By Christ, the Redeemer, Deliverer and King,
Then praises unceasing to him shall be given,
By glorified saints, who in Zion shall sing.
Then through Time's dark valley, while night shades are o'er me,
I'll sing, for the Mount and the Morn are before me—
The mountain of song, and the mountain of glory,
Where all of the ransomed immortal shall sing.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 23.

My Dear Sister.—There is one more failing, another easily besetting sin, of which I would speak, and then close this series of letters, already protracted far beyond my intentions. It is this—an impatience of spirit towards the faults and errors of others. We are prone to be hasty—ofttimes to censure our brethren and sisters for their deviation from the strict path of rectitude. Forgetful of our own infirmities, our own deficiencies, we regard with impatience the errors of others. With a beam projecting from our own eye, we would fain extract the mote from a brother's eye.

I believe it to be true that those who have had the most clear discovery of their own nature—the corruption of their own heart—are the most ready to offer an excuse for an erring brother or sister. Oppressed with a sense of their own weakness, their own short comings, their own struggles to overcome selfish nature, and repel temptation, they are prepared to sympathise with others in their failures—in their struggles. As they kneel at the mercy-seat, scarcely daring to look heavenward, so weighed down in spirit with a consciousness of imperfections, of short comings, how sweetly does the whisper of the angel of the covenant fall upon the heart, bringing to remembrance the words of Holy Writ, "Who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities."

How faith now wings her way to heaven, and rests on the bosom of that "Advocate with the Father." Once he was a "man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." He was a man of "like passions with us"—he suffered, being tempted; he hungered, he thirsted, he was weary, he was sad, he was persecuted—forsaken—betrayed: and all this that he might be qualified to become a merciful and compassionate High Priest—that he might be touched with the very feelings that our infirmities awaken within us. We remember how patiently he bore with the errors of his disciples—with what compassionate sympathy he addressed the woman brought before him, for whom her accusers clamored for accusation.

We remember a Peter, who with oaths denied his Lord, but who was by him forgiven. We are cheered with the thought that he received the accusation brought against him by self-righteous Pharisees, viz., "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." What though there were apparently no tokens of love—no sweet manifestations of sympathy towards those hypocritical Scribes and Pharisees, who, wrapped up in a garment of their own righteousness, deemed themselves perfectly whole, and in no need of a physician? What though his withering rebukes and denunciations fell harshly upon their ears? Towards the erring ones—the "lost sheep of the house of Israel," and the despised Gentile, his arms of love were opened wide—for them he had words of kindness, and a large place in his heart of love. Hear him as he teaches his disciples a lesson on forgiveness. He limits it not to a transgression seven times repeated, but until seventy times seven!—Well might the apostles ask, "Lord, increase our faith!" Long time has he borne with our transgressions—oft-repeated have been the pardons received, and shall we condemn an erring brother and sister for occasional errors?

What says the inspired apostle? "Charity," or love, "covereth a multitude of faults." Notice also the advice given in respect to the faults of our brethren and sisters. "If any man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted."

Spiritual ones are required to restore, not condemn—not crush—not injure; and they are to do it in meekness, mildly, gently, not upbraidingly, considering themselves that they are liable to be tempted and overcome, and they ought to exercise the same spirit toward their erring brother, that they would like to have exercised toward them. O how many, who might have been recalled to the path of virtue—who might have been reclaimed from their sin by meekness and love, have been driven further and further from God, and his church, by a denunciatory spirit and harsh dealing.

The exercise of a compassionate spirit—the winning words of love—the fair and honorable dealing with the transgressor, accomplish more towards their rescue, than the severe denunciation—the telling abroad the fault—the look of scorn and cold shoulder. Too often there appears at first view, to outward observation, a deviation, when, if the matter were fully examined—if all the motives and causes could be ascertained there might be less cause for censure, and perhaps none at all In some cases, disease induces a restlessness of spirit, an irritability of the nervous system, which exhibits itself in petulancy, little things irritate, sometimes pain in the head distracts the mind—a morbid state of the liver produces melancholy, listlessness, etc These are too lightly regarded by those unqualified to sympathize, and many a devoted christian, whose whole soul is in the work of God, whose will is in harmony with his, is the subject of censure, when "pity ought to be shewn for his friend." From the infirmities induced by a diseased body, there is no salvation provided in the gospel—the resurrection to immortality alone can effect a cure, unless there be first a removal of the disease, therefore such infirmities ought not to be classed with other sins.

"Forbearing one another in love." How important this command, and how blessed the results if obeyed. To meekly bear the coldness, the condemnation of others, for those errors or imperfections which are not the fruit of an unsanctified nature, but of a diseased body, requires much patience and love. Sweet is the thought—Jesus knows all about us. Our Father in heaven pities us, for he knoweth our frame—he remembereth that we are dust. Prayer should be our solace. Submission to these painful trials ought ever to be exercised. Every thing will be adjusted and made right at the judgment.

May God bestow upon us that grace which shall wholly sanctify our natures—impart to us holy principles—give us the spirit of forgiveness toward our enemies—patience with the infirmities of others—victory over every temptation, and bring us safely to the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen. Farewell.

☞ For every one life has some blessing—some cup that is not mixed with bitterness. At every heart there is some fountain of pure water, and all men at some time taste its sweetness. Who is he that has not found in his path of life some fragrant rosebush, scenting all the air with its sweet perfume, and cheering the heart of the weary traveler with its beauty?

"Hail! sacred truth, whose piercing rays
Dispel the shades of night;
Diffusing o'er a ruined world
The healing beams of light."

☞ It ill becomes us to be rash and hasty in our censures of others, and to be forward to believe people guilty of bad things, while either the matter of fact on which the censure is grounded is doubtful and uncertain or is capable of a good construction. Charity commands us to hope the best concerning all, and forbids censoriousness.

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER II.

ARE THERE RADICALLY BAD MEN?

By radically bad men, I do not mean persons who are born of badness and unto badness, as if character were a thing of parentage or race. But, are there human beings in whom evil feelings, purposes and habits so predominate that they mark and determine the character? And I use the popular phrase "bad men," rather than the Scriptural phrase "the wicked," because I think the former best represents the latter in its original and proper sense. But Scriptural expressions are apt to be used in a technical and conventional sense; "the righteous" and "the wicked" may come to signify men who are such according to an arbitrary and false standard. This is a great evil, and it needs to be corrected by substituting for the technical phrases such homely but hearty Saxon words as scarcely need defining.

And by the question, Are there radically bad men?—I do not mean to intimate that there are no traces of good nature even in the worst men. The real question will be, Is the "good in all," upon which the Universalist so much relies, a genuine goodness, a real virtue, a moral principle? Is it an element so substantial and a germ so vital, that it must by a natural law of character grow and develop into a prevailing goodness and a final salvation? If this question is answered in the negative, then the question remains, Will God, by methods higher than the native elements of character, secure in all men a final holiness and blessedness? This question will be considered in the closing chapter.

Here, at the outset, I should discard a host of rash and conventional judgments that are wont to be pronounced upon human character. Men are too often judged good or bad according to outward appearance. This is the way of men as compared with the judgment of Him who looketh upon the heart. Precisely this is meant by the "respect of persons" which the Scriptures so much rebuke. Human nature, fallen desperately in love with happiness, is apt to think that those who are "well off" must be good people, and that those who are badly off must be bad folks. This was the great mistake of Job's friends, and it has been made thousands of times since his day. God is no such "respecter of persons," or of outward advantages, but in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, in whatever condition, is accepted of him.

This principle cuts off all hasty condemnation of the heathen in the mass, as if they must inevitably perish. If they cherish true goodness and virtue, neither their ignorance nor their unscriptural methods of worship will exclude them from God's kingdom But as ignorance is a very great evil, and the gospel is worth preaching to every body, the question remains, Whether a heathen, with his false views of God, may not lose confidence in the supremacy of goodness, take the side of an evil divinity because the evil divinity is supposed to be the more powerful, and thus debauch the conscience and allow vice to become a settled policy and ruling principle of the character? How else shall we understand Paul's account, in which, after giving a long catalogue of heathen sins, he says: "Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them?"

In judging of character, I also throw out of account all considerations of natural temper or disposition, as amiable or otherwise The brutes, in their measure, may have these as well as men. We are responsible, not for the nature we are born with, but for the use we make of native temper and capacity, in repressing the evil and cherishing the good. I also throw out of the account the manifold differences of education and custom, whereby the same act which expresses ill feeling and hate in one man may express goodness and love in another man. All this, I presume, is so well understood between himself and my opponent, that it needs only to be named, and not argued.

The whole subject of human character is a vast one, and it is all involved in the question if there be radically bad men. I can only pretend to make a few points of the general argument,—suggestions only, where demonstration,—in a matter so prejudiced by manifold dispute—would require a volume.

This mystery of sin, which seems to be involved in the very idea of moral character, has been recognized by various eminent writers, ever since the time of Plato. I will quote but one, and that one doubtless a Universalist. I mean Neander, whose labors in Church History have such signal merit because he was not a mere compiler of facts, but a philosopher, profoundly versed in the causes of human action. He says: "According to my conviction, the origin of evil can only be understood as a fact—a fact possible by virtue of the freedom belonging to a human being, but not to be otherwise deduced or explained. It lies in the idea of evil that it is an utterly inexplicable thing; and whoever would explain it nullifies the very idea of it. It is not the limits of our knowledge which make the origin of sin something inexplicable to us, but it follows from the essential nature of sin as an act of free will that it must remain to all eternity an inexplicable fact. It can only be understood emphatically by means of the moral self-consciousness."—Planting and Training of the Church, bk. 6, chap. 1, note.

1. The first point to be insisted on is the essential and responsible freedom of the human will. I believe—it is almost a proverb—that the common consciousness of man asserts his freedom. Without this there could be no merit, either good or ill. Without this, whatever right or wrong there might be in the nature of things, there could be neither in actions, or in men. There could be neither praise nor blame, there could be no character, worthy of the name. Without freedom, the native dispositions and original feelings of men might be more complex than those of the brute, and more interesting for study; they might be more agreeable or disagreeable, more fortunate or unfortunate, still they would be the inevitable result of forces within the man and of circumstances without him, for which he would be as thankless and as blameless as the revolutions of the windmill.

But this practical consciousness of freedom,—which excuses or condemns ourselves if it be real, and makes God an imposter if it be unreal—has been often denied for the sake of a theory. I believe it has often been denied by men troubled with a sense of guilt, of which they wished to be rid. Still more unfortunately has it been deemed by divines, to save their views of a divine sovereignty and efficiency, or to save a false theory respecting God's fore-knowledge. Supposing that God could foreknow only as a natural philosopher does, or as an astronomer predicts an eclipse,—by calculations of cause and effect,—they have ignored all actions that could not be determined by such calculation. The same class of divines have also been prejudiced by a false theory of freedom; one which divorced the will utterly from moral considerations, and reduced it to a sheer caprice. At an earlier date—in the Reformation—the notion of free will was supposed to make man independent of the gratuitous help of God. This explains that remarkable book of Luther's, on the Bondage of the Will, (De Servo Arbitrio.) The other causes culminated in the no less remarkable and more famous work of Edwards on the Freedom of the Will.

Those who have opposed the Calvinistic scheme have often said that Universalism is its legitimate fruit. I think, for the theoretic denial of free will I have just named, that this is true. The Calvinists, by a happy inconsistency, have maintained a deep sense of the evil and wickedness of sin. But when they had, by a method ["more honored in the breach than in th' observance,"] made the Author of man's nature and surroundings responsible for all men's doings, it was natural that men should infer that God's fairness required the salvation of one as well as another. The principle, or rather the lack of principle, by which God elected one man, appeared equally good for the election of all men. Hence we need not wonder that the Universalism of eighty years ago was offered as a "Calvinism Improved"—a title given by Dr. Joseph Huntington to his Universalist book. Here another cause of Universalism is worthy of note. The Old School doctrine of the nature of the Atonement made it a legal satisfaction for the sins of the saved. The New School doctrine of the extent of the Atonement makes it sufficient for all men. Combine the two, and all are saved at a stroke of logic. Some of the Universalists have employed this logic, and the result of their reasoning abides, though the old false view of the Atonement is [illegible]. But the Calvinistic views of the [illegible] I think, prevail more among Universalists than among the Orthodox. I [illegible]

Now I admit that the freedom of the human will, [illegible] the [illegible] power of [illegible] of cause and effect. We don't then have what Dr. Bushnell calls the "supernatural" in the will itself. And when the will does not follow the motive, [illegible] which it ought to follow, there it is still lawlessness that perplexes us, and therefore disorder and ruin, limited only by the power of the perverse free agent. But this lawlessness is precisely what I understand to be the essence of sin. Sin is the transgression of law; and sin is guilty, and not unfortunate merely, just because it is not compelled by motive, or passion, or any cause out of the free will itself. And this, too, is the mystery of sin. It is that for which there is no valid reason,—an act which the person knows to be equally wrong and imprudent, and so an act of unreason; an act admitting no excuse save those worthless pleas by which the selfish or malicious guilt was first palliated or instigated. Such are the excuses which the stammering tongue fails to utter when one is confronted with the conscience, suppressed for a while but again accusing. And by this final verdict of the conscience the guilty man is confound—like him in the parable of the wedding garment—speechless.

I have thought it is important thus to insist on the freedom of the will and the reasonless nature of guilt, to show that men may be really guilty and bad. This alone, of course, does not prove any man radically bad, since one may, perhaps, repent of little sins, and reform himself into entire goodness. Yet the reasonless nature of guilt shows that it may not so be. He who acts foolishly, lawlessly, madly in a small matter, may do the same in things of weightier moment. He that is unjust in that which is least may also be unjust in much.—Nay, as physical disorder tends to further and utter derangement, so the human will forsaking the law of reason may gain fresh impulse away from the true good, and end in final and utter abandonment, in the darkness of un-reason which it has freely entered.

I will here remark that while I am glad to hear my Universalist friends speak of charity and forgiveness, and doubt not they cherish a real feeling of good will toward all, yet a very common theory pressed to its consistent results would destroy the very idea of charity and forgiveness. If no man acts against known duty or interest, if all are doing precisely according to their best light and knowledge, then what place for charity or pardon? One who is conscious of having done the best he knew or could, does not ask forgiveness, nor thank one for the offer of it. And if it is further said that men do wrong only under the influence of strong temptation, the question recurs, Do they act with good conscience? and, Can they not resist and conquer their foes, the evil passions? If they can not, they need no pardon, for they are simply victims. If they can do better, their guilt remains; and while we should forgive until the seventy times seven, it should be with some fear that the actual and, in its measure, reasonless and excuseless guilt may continue and subvert the soul. But let us never speak of forgiveness under a theory that leaves nothing to be forgiven.

2. The nature of genuine moral virtue is such that we should not hastily conclude that all men possess it, even in slight measure.—Virtue is something more than prudence, or a regard for one's interest. It is true that duty and interest ever coincide; neither can properly interfere with the other. Honesty is ever the best policy. Yet it has been well said that he who is honest from policy is not an honest man. To do a certain act because it is prudent and profitable, and to do the same act because it is right, generous and noble, are two very different things. Though all that is really virtuous is also really prudent, still here are two kinds of motive totally different. The two planes are indeed exactly parallel, and the figures are equal and similar; yet he who moves in one plane may have no sympathy whatever with him that moves in the other.—The two planes are of different sizes, they may therefore reach different moral [illegible]

The nature of virtue is something more than prudence [illegible]

[illegible]—they love those that l[illegible], as publicans and sinners do; [illegible] make all men their neighbors, and give not expecting to receive again. The former are almost sure to fall before [illegible], because selfishness is ever short-sighted and blind and weak; the latter endure trial because they are settled in principles of duty, as upon a rock.

Here we may urge that the Scripture doctrine of conversion contains an important principle, and that the change from selfishness to benevolence is most radical, and beyond the power of any prudential consideration. "He that saveth his life shall lose it." "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his life also, he cannot be my disciple." Self-denial, or the foregoing of pleasure and love of the favor of friends and kindred, out of regard for Him who was "full of grace and truth,"—is made the condition of acceptance with God. Such is the high style of virtue which he requires. But self-denial is, in the very idea of it, beyond the power of self-love. No self-seeking can help in this matter of self-forgetting. If this is not the sole work of a higher power, lifting man up and out of his selfishness with his free consent, it is at least the work of a higher nature than any mere regard, however far-seeing, to one's own interest. And this seems to me to cut off one very common argument of the Universalist, i. e., that the vicious and abandoned will and must become virtuous when they find that this is for their interest. I answer, the habit of self-interestedness is just what makes the case of many so helpless and hopeless. They are slaves to self, "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God." This is their bondage, and they cannot be emancipated by any proclamation how they may serve themselves better.—Prudential maxims may lengthen their chain, but they cannot break it; a wiser policy may let out their tether, and give them a wider range of self-service, but it cannot make them truly free. It cannot make them unselfish, or give them a generous and hearty interest in the well-being of others, or a self-sacrificing joy in that which is noble and true.—Such a freedom comes from the Deliverer, the Jesus who came to save his people from their sins.

But to break away from this self-love requires some struggle and effort, and it may be refused as an intolerable hardship. Here is a most alluring bondage from which we are not sure that all will escape. Sure it is that only when one is devoted from self to the general good, he has an interest in that wherein he takes an interest, so that "all things are his," and he has gained the true riches, the unsearchable and inexhaustible wealth of God's domain. But no self-love can grasp that priceless pearl. And because the neglected duty of regard for others brings an accusing conscience, the duty itself may be hated. I cannot otherwise explain the dislike which Alcibiades had for Socrates, when he "wished that he were no longer to be seen among men," apparently because, while Socrates was doubtless his true friend and well-wisher, he wished to dissuade him from low demagogism, and make him a nobler and truer man. I cannot otherwise explain the conduct of the man who ostracized the Athenian whom no man could accuse, because he could not bear to hear him perpetually called "Aristides the just." I cannot otherwise explain the open scoffing at the idea of moral principle, of which we heard a little a few years since in political life, when many whose sincerity was not questioned, were reproached as "conscience men." I cannot otherwise explain the feeling of the Scribes and Pharisees, of whom Christ said, "Ye have both seen and hated both me and my Father;" a signal instance of infuriated malignity, which seems to preclude the notion that all sin grows out of ignorance or misconception, or that all will do better when they know better.

For some further suggestions under this and the following heads, I will refer to Dr. Bushnell's argument on "The Fact of sin," in his work on "Nature and the Supernatural."

3. The extended history of wickedness among men, often in most flagrant forms, gives some reason to fear that there may be radically bad individuals, finally unsaved. I wish here not to be misunderstood. I am not of the croaking school of philosophers, who say deliberately and habitually what David said in haste, that "all men are liars." It is indeed a significant fact that multitudes have doubted whether there be any disinterested benevolence or virtue in the world. The famous maxims of Rochefoucault are based on this denial. And we know how many have reasserted that of the British statesman: "Every man has his price." Almost in the same tone has Jeremiah said, "The heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked," (Heb. [illegible]) i. e., our hopes of human nature are often woefully disappointed. But, while I doubt the conversion of the world into a church, I am not given to [illegible]. I do not believe that the history of the world has been mainly a catalogue of hatreds, vices, and crimes. I doubt not the vast majority of all men's outward acts have been good rather than bad. This [illegible] be so. Society could not subsist for [illegible] if it were otherwise. Fallen [illegible] [illegible] though they may be, they [illegible] [illegible] still [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] principles [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] are not discussed in this book. The object of the writer is, if possible, to kill the spirit of sect. This he [illegible] [illegible], there are many natural sentiments of the human heart that produce much agreeable and amiable deportment and feeling. But it still remains true that man shows too bad a history for an unfallen race—a race of which every individual has retained the remnant of saving virtue, as a "good in all." For argument's sake we may regard as hyperbole the strong language in Gen.: "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of his thoughts was only evil continually." And we may say the same of Paul's account in the first chapter of Romans: "And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient; being filled with all unrighteousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful; who knowing the judgment of God, that they who commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." But if this be hyperbole, it is not confined to inspired men, writing in the interest of a humbling doctrine of man's nature. A heathen writer of the first century says of Rome: "All is full of criminality and vice; indeed, much more of these is committed than could be remedied by force. A monstrous contest of abandoned wickedness is carried on. The lust of sin increases daily, and shame is daily more and more extinguished. Discarding respect for all that is good and sacred, lust rushes on wherever it will. Vice no longer hides itself. It stalks forth before all eyes. So public has abandoned wickedness become and so openly does it flame up in the minds of all, that innocence is not only a rare thing, but has wholly ceased to exist."* Add to this dark picture of an age of corruption and vice the woes of aggression in all ages, and of conquest without even the paltry pretence of "extending the cause of freedom"—too often for a French or Napoleonic love of "glory," add the intrigues, lusts, rapines, and murders of all times, including the finest portions and palmiest days of Christendom; the revival of the slave-trade in the noon of the nineteenth century, uncondemned by the courts of "the land of the free and the brave," and with the augmented horrors of a "middle passage" under the vigilance of a frowning world; add the developments of border-ruffianism, in Congress and out of it, scorning reason and truth to carry a purpose of oppressive and lustful conquest; add the recklessness of a perverse nature that so often utters the maxims "rule or ruin," and "after us the deluge;" and from such historic data what shall we infer? Shall we say that all this badness is only a lowering of the general tone of morals, which yet spares the inmost integrity of each individual of the race? Shall we say that the evil infests society, and pervades the mass, injuring fatally no single member of society? The wide differences of character that have been ever observed, oppose this view. The distinctions of good men and bad man have not been regarded as mere differences in degree, but distinctions radical; and though they may have been sometimes made by false tests and standards, yet wherever there has been enough of moral truth for a true and just standard, the same distinctions have been made none the less. Here is a very strong presumption that, as many seem far more bad than good, so as to be commonly reckoned on the whole bad, the badness which is so large in the aggregate may in some individuals be more concentrated, so as radically to effect and determine the character.

For the Crisis.

"Christian Brotherhood."

Bro. Grant:—As I am a constant reader of the Crisis, will you accept of an humble expression of the satisfaction which its new dress gives me—the sheet itself is fair and clean, its typography of the first order of the art, and its contents varied, rich and lively. I trust it will be a vehicle of living truth to the household of faith.

But what I took my pen in hand for was to apprise you and your readers of an excellent little work of 200 pages, on "Christian Brotherhood," by Rev. Baron Stow, D. D., of your city, and which, with a large quantity of Theological and Sabbath School Books, may be had of Wm. Heath, 79 Cornhill. The perusal of this book will find a hearty response in the bosom of every Christian who has mourned over the divisions and alienations which have so long dishonored the professed church of Christ. If the sentiments of this book had prevailed long since, you and I, and the many who have professed to believe that Christ is at the door, would have been treated with as much kindness and love by such christians as dissented from our views as if we had never broached such an idea. The benediction of the apostle is the spirit which breathes from every page of the "Christian Brotherhood"—"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all them that love him in sincerity."

The [illegible] principles of [illegible] institutions, are not discussed in this book. The object of the writer is, if possible, to kill the spirit of sect. This he wishes to see slain and buried, and then he suggests some excellent directions for attaining such an end.

No class of christians, it seems to me, will read this work with more sincere pleasure than such as have had our experience for the few years past. Yours truly,

F. G. Brown.

The Spirit.—No. 7.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Having examined the various uses of the word ruakh, we now pass to give all the passages where the word occurs, when it is not rendered spirit. The word occurs in the Hebrew text four hundred times, and is rendered spirit two hundred and forty times. The word is rendered in twenty-two different ways.

1. Ruakh is rendered blast four times. "With the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered." Ex. 15 : 8. "I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumor and shall return to his own land." 2 Kin. 19 : 7. "Thou hast been a strength to the poor . . . . when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall." Isa. 25 : 4. "I will send a blast upon him; and he shall hear a rumor and return to his own land." Isa. 37 : 7.

2. Ruakh is rendered quarters once. "In four quarters were the porters, toward the east, west, north, and south." 1 Chron. 9 : 24.

3. Ruakh is rendered anger once. "Their anger was abated towards him, when he said that." Judges 8 : 3.

4. Ruakh is rendered mind six times. "Which were a grief of mind unto Isaac and Rebekah." Gen. 26 : 35. "A fool uttereth all his mind, but a wise man keepeth it in till afterwards. Prov. 29 : 11. "I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them." Ezk. 11 : 5. "That which cometh into your mind." Ezk. 20 : 32. "When his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne." Dan. 5 : 20. "Then shall his mind change, and he shall pass over." Hab. 1 : 11.

5. Ruakh is rendered courage once. "As soon as we heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man." Josh. 2 : 11.

6. Ruakh is rendered vain once. "Shall vain words have an end?" Job. 16 : 3.

7. Ruakh is rendered side six times. "And there were ninety and six pomegranates on a side." Jer. 52 : 23. "He measured the east side with the measuring reed, five hundred reeds." Ezk. 42 : 16. He measured the north side five hundred reeds." Ver. 17. "He measured the south side five hundred reeds." Ver. 18. "He turned about to the west side, and measured five hundred reeds." Ver. 19. "He measured it by the four sides." Ver. 20.

8. Ruakh is rendered breath twenty-eight times. "And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven, and every thing that is in the earth shall die." Gen. 6 : 17. "And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life." Gen. 7 : 15. "All in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land died." Gen. 7 : 22. "The blast of the breath of his nostrils." 2 Sam. 22 : 16. "By the breath of his nostrils are they consumed." Job 4 : 9. "He will not suffer me to take my breath, but filleth me with bitterness." Job 9 : 18. "My breath is corrupt." Job 17 : 1. "My breath is strange to my wife, though I entreated for the children's sake." Job 19 : 17. "The blast of the breath of thy nostrils." Ps. 18 : 15. "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust." Ps. 104 : 29. "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." Isa. 11 : 4. "And his breath, as an overflowing stream shall reach to the midst of the neck, to sift the nations with the seive of vanity." Isa. 30 : 28. "Ye shall bring forth stubble; your breath, as fire, shall devour you." Isa. 33 : 11. His molten image is falsehood and there is no breath in them." Jer. 10 : 14. Ezk. 37 : 10. "Behold, it is laid over with gold and silver, and there is no breath at all in the midst of it." Hab. 2 : 19.

9. Ruakh is rendered in the cool once. "And they heard the voice of the Lord God, walking in the garden in the cool of the day." Gen. 3 : 8.

10. Ruakh is rendered tempest once. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible "tempest." Ps. 11 : 6.

11. Ruakh is rendered spiritual once. "The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad, for the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred." Hosea 9 : 7.

"I will not smell the savor of your sweet odors." Lev. 26 : 31. "Neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell." Deut. 4 : 28. "They have ears, but they hear not; noses have they, but they smell not." Ps. 115 : 6. "I despise your feast days, and I will not smell in your solemn assemblies." Amos 5 : 21.

In our next, we purpose to complete our examination of the Old Testament on this subject. We have found no intimation yet, that any part of man thinks when his physical organism is dead. A belief in consciousness between death and the resurrection seems to be founded on sheer assertion, unsupported by the Scriptures of divine truth, science or reason; and hence unworthy of the support of any lover of truth, but deserving the reprobation of all the followers of Christ.

"If the dead rise not . . . then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."—Paul.

Rome.

Says the New Bedford Mercury:—"Recent letters from Rome show the state of things there is becoming intolerable . . . The priesthood has become such a nuisance that one of that body was lately shot at the altar while performing mass, for his interference in the family affairs of the murderer . . . The Roman States are ripe for a revolution of the most dreadful character . . . One can hardly foresee where the blaze would stop, if the fire of revolt was once kindled among the down-trodden people."

It seems the time has come for "the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus," to receive her portion. Her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities. "Reward her even as she rewarded you, and double unto her double according to her works; in the cup which she hath filled, fill to her double. . . . Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine, and she shall be utterly burned with fire." Rev 18. We may look for the fulfillment of the foregoing Scripture at an early date. The war seems to have begun at the right point this time to complete the prophecies. Rome must drink the bitter draught, and abide the consequences. The blood of the enemies of Christ is about to flow where his faithful children were slaughtered. They have exterminated the saints from the vallies of Piedmont, trampling their bones and ashes with fiendish contempt for many long years, and the bold persecutor has boastingly said, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." Now the marching of her foes may be seen in the vallies of Piedmont, determined to bear her oppression no more. During the dark ages, in mid winter, the followers of Jesus were driven by the Roman Pontiff from their quiet homes in those pleasant vallies, to the icy caves of the Alpine mountains, there to perish with cold and hunger! Upwards of eighteen hundred years since, the [illegible] Roman government, in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, killed the "Prince of Life" and spent his life upon the cross. From that day to the present, Rome has been in open hostility against the King of kings and all his faithful subjects. Shall the right never be vindicated? Shall those sleeping martyrs be forever kept from their promised inheritance? Nay, verily. All things indicate that they will soon "awake and sing" the song of eternal triumph. O Lord, let them come, let them come from icy caves, and verdant vales, from waters deep, from plains and mountain side, and wake the song of jubilee, sounding afar, like "the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth;" "amen, alleluia."

Dear reader, let us be ready to echo, alleluia, glory, ALLELUIA, the martyrs live, they live to die no more,—Christ has come, our lovely friend, to reign forever more. Amen and amen.

European War.

The bloody war clouds hang with the most threatening aspect over the eastern continent. We apprehend, we shall soon know the meaning of the expression, "distress of nations with perplexity." We know of no figure that will illustrate the apparent coming struggle, better than the one used by the prophet:—"The nations shall rush like the rushing of many waters." The thought of the bloody onset is enough to make the joints weak, and prostrate the physical strength. It looks as though earth's last grand drama is about opening upon an astonished world. If, as we have believed, the Napoleonic Dynasty is symbolized by the eighth and last head of the scarlet colored beast, mentioned in Rev. 17 : 11, then we have reason to conclude that the last scene is about to be acted, and the harlot power receive her merited doom. We cannot tell how long before the curtain will rise, and reveal to our enraptured vision the glory of the coming King of kings, but we may expect him to come soon and close the war of nations, now begun, and commence his reign of peace with all the faithful. We anticipate that the tares and wheat will ripen fast, till the time arrives for the angels to reap the harvest of the earth. At the time of the harvest, the prophet says, "their wickedness is great." How like the days of Noah and Lot are the present times. How bold and daring are the hosts of Satan, and shall we, who love the Savior, cower down and sneak away through fear of the Lord's enemies? Shall we not rather grow bolder as the contest increases, and gird our armor more closely on, and fight the good fight of faith with unwavering courage? Righteousness and truth must prevail. Error and wickedness must come to an end,—a perpetual end. Let us, then, not be faint-hearted in the last great struggle. If the nations of the wicked one can afford to pass through such deep waters of distress and bloodshed to obtain the baubles of honor from this world, how much more willing should we be to suffer with Christ our few trials to obtain "immortality," "honor," and an "eternal weight of glory," in the coming kingdom.

Let every follower of Christ gird on the christian armor anew, stand upon his watch tower, ready to obey all the orders of his heavenly Commander. Sublime scenes are about to open upon a guilty world. The time is at hand for the dead to be raised from the very fields where the hostile armies are now marching. The martyrs of Jesus are soon to "awake and sing." The right has been trampled by wrong till the cup of iniquity seems to be full,—running over. Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

Reply to L. Beach's Questions.

BY J. HEMENWAY.

"If regeneration is the reproduction of the man, and that is the new birth, do not the wicked, if raised from the dead, experience a new birth? If so, by what principle is it to be accomplished?"

I understand the new birth, or to be born again, is to be raised up from the dead to eternal life; or, in other words, to be changed from mortal to immortality, and in order to experience that change, we must have that Spirit, that raised up Christ, dwelling in us.—Rom. 8 : 11. We are to sow to the Spirit, and then we reap of that Spirit everlasting life. The wicked do not experience the new birth for the following reasons:

1. In order to have a birth there must be a begetting by the word of truth.

2. The wicked reject the word, the "incorruptible seed," and sow to the flesh: hence they reap corruption; which is not the case with those that are born of the Spirit.

I perceive that you ask if the wicked do not experience "a birth," are not born again—born from the dead—if raised from the dead.

The Scriptures declare in plain language that the dead shall come forth from the grave, just and unjust. But I do not think we are there taught that the wicked are to be born again; or, in other words, we should not call the resurrection of the wicked a birth. To be born presupposes a begetting, and that which is begotten is brought forth to life. It seems that Jesus has used the term to illustrate the change from nature to grace, and the result of that change. To be begotten is to receive the incorruptible seed, the word of God. (Equivalent to conversion.) To be born of the Spirit is to experience the change, brought about by that word, that is, to receive the incorruptible nature. As the figure is used by Christ, and applied to the righteous only, we are not warranted in applying it to any other.

If the wicked are raised, "by what principle is it to be accomplished?"

I will state my views of the resurrection of the wicked as briefly as possible, perhaps at another time I may say more. I understand that all die, in consequence of the fall of man. To make the subject plain, let me speak in a familiar way. Adam by sin contracted a debt that involves the whole family in death; the innocent child must die, the same as the hardened sinner. The second Adam (Christ) "was rich" (2 Cor. 8 : 9); he comes and pays the debt contracted by the first Adam, and redeems all that was lost by Adam's transgression; consequently, the race of Adam are entitled to a resurrection from the grave, just and unjust. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."—1 Cor. 15 : 22. It would be injustice were man to die for the sin of Adam, and remain in death; from the fact that he had no hand in the sin that brings the first death upon man. Christ has atoned for the sin of Adam; hence we have no sin to answer for but our own; and a future eternal life depends on our being justified, by obeying the Gospel. Now as ALL die in Adam, ALL are made alive at the last day, through the atonement of Christ, those that have sown to the Spirit reap everlasting life. This is the class that have followed the Spirit, "begotten by the word." Then there are the wicked, how are they raised? By justice. They were shut up in prison, not for their own debts, but for the debt of their father Adam, and that being paid by the second Adam, justice says, let them out of prison. But they are found guilty before the court of Heaven, of other sins, a debt contracted by themselves, that is not paid, from the fact they would not accept of the riches of Christ; and being found guilty, justice remands them back to prison, or rather executes the penalty of the law, which is the second death.

We see then that it is by the atonement that the wicked are raised, and this view places us on probation for eternal life, just as Adam was. If we obey God's law we can have eternal life; if we transgress, the penalty is death.

Correspondence.

From B. G. Getchell.

Bro. Grant:—I am glad you have taken such a bold stand for the truth, in these last days; and I doubt not the God of Israel will be with you. Perhaps the few lines I may write may do some honest-hearted brother or sister some good who has been long looking and waiting for the blessed hope.

I believe that the power which has sustained the Papacy since 1815 is about to be dried up, to prepare the way of those kings in Italy to receive power as kings one hour with France, to destroy the whore, which has corrupted the whole earth with her fornications, and has made the kings of the earth mad. How faithful is the Lord to keep his word, that we may have consolation as well as strong faith, who have fled to the refuge, and laid hold on eternal life, which is set before us. We have a hard time getting along now, but when the evidences brighten so much, of so soon getting through, my heart leaps for joy.

Why is it that our brethren are so indifferent on this point? Is it because we have been disappointed so many times, and have not realized what we were looking for? If we are honest at heart, before our Heavenly Father, that ought not to keep us back from giving the evidences which we can so plainly see. The wicked cannot see them, they do not know what these things mean; but we know what they mean, and where they belong. Our Father is speaking loudly to us now, to lift up our heads and rejoice, for our redemption is at hand.

When we look back upon the millions of God's dear children that this whore has been the means of slaying, while she rode on the scarlet-colored beast, and what she is now, and what she soon will be, can any of us doubt our position now? Soon she will sink, like a mighty millstone cast into the sea, and not be found any more: then the saints are called to rejoice over her, because God hath judged her; and if we have our lamps trimmed and burning we shall rejoice with them.

☞ Long prayers and long speeches eat out and kill out a prayer meeting. They are death, double death—who can bear them? Chilly? It curdles the life blood of spirituality, to hear a brother spin out and spin out—hold on and hold on, repeat and re-repeat, pray all over the world and back again three or four times—then rise, make a long speech with no soul in it. O what a dagger! what a dagger! Awful!—awful!!

☞ Religion should begin in the family. The holiest sanctuary is home. The family altar is more venerable than that of the Cathedral. The education of the soul should begin and be carried on at the fireside.

Death!

HOW DOES PUNISHMENT DESTROY?

The living man should never die—never is dead till God destroys him. I hold that the human being, once having come into the divine purpose, by creation, and especially by the redemptive energy which it was intended should secure perpetuity [illegible], can never be excluded from the embrace of that purpose—the purpose of life—by any possible process, or agency, save [illegible] power which, from an infinite conception of causes, results, relations, possibilities, adaptations, proceeded to the exhibition of a living being independent of all law in nature—pronounced "good" as living and adapted by the laws which rise with time; they being forced into being around and within him, and hence forcing or controlling his life—to maintain the position provided by the infinite apprehension of him, and infinite application upon him.

It may be stated as an axiom, that creative will and force are essential to the actual existence of a being within the divine purpose. Man is such an entity, whether he be a sinner or not, he cannot destroy himself out of existence. No man can take another man out of abstract existence. That is the reason why Christ has said of some, "NO man can pluck them out of my hand,"—and the reason, again, why he said, "Fear not them which kill the body, and have no more that they can do." Moreover, we discover the propriety of the grand and distinct Gospel principle—"Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life," or shall not taste of death.

But "God [and he only] can destroy both soul and body in hell,"—no force of curse, as it did not prevent existence, can absorb it. I refer to the purpose and power of God. He only could bring man into being, he only can take him out of being; so that it should require a special act of the Almighty to dispossess any man, however guilty, of his position and birthright of being—in the universe.

But I hear it objected, that man is unconscious in death! So he had being before he was conscious; also, his earliest consciousness was no knowledge. Farther, he is often unconscious before death. It may be, indeed, that in this more latent being, he exists only in the divine purpose. Be it so. Once having lived in the divine purpose, once having been redeemed, we cannot conclude that he can pass out of the infinite enclosure by his own choice,—not by his abuse of natural law,—for that would make him independent of his Maker, on the point of purpose,—nor yet by the transgression of a representative being. This does not ignore the judgment and moral obligation of man; it does show that God, having, in wisdom, issued a life, which was considered in all its reduplication, or even in its capable procreative existence, and by the energy and enactment of divinity established,—cannot allow himself to be defrauded of his right to control, or dispose of it, by a depraved and vitiated humanity; or by rebellious and insurrectionary diabolism. He should rather have so firm a hold upon that life—it being intended as a poorer version or dimmer image of the divine life-source—that, if possible, it may be restored to the principal relations, by which its true elements of improvement can operate, its proper heaven-born impulses spring forth.

The Godhead in Christ secures to man's exaltation and enlargement, and is more to man than man lost. Suppose, then, that the man slumbers in death; the divine will in due time brings this being,—his own imaged divine product, at least an emanation of his power, by the action of divinity upon itself,—back to himself, certainly, in that relation which individualized him.

But will not God punish the wicked? Will he not cleanse humanity? Shall not the punishment of sinners be the cleansing of the nature from sin? But thus cleansed, will it not have been restored to perfect and indissoluble union with the divine? 'Twill be free from every plague spot! And what is sin but a leprous plague, moral taint, as well as physical corruption upon otherwise fair humanity? Every sinner, a pustule upon the human side of the Divine? What will he do? Will he not remove the gangrenous excrescence? Apply the caustic or the scalpel? Each one having become so individualized that the suffering shall be in the tumor, and not upon the body from which it is removed—while the whole of our nature—humanity in its concrete—all its harmonious oneness—all its individualisms left—shall rejoice to be free; and the foolish, darkened heart of an obstinate unbelief never trouble, with objection or difficulty, the worship of the God of our being, who has infused so much of divinity into manhood, that he cannot leave it to wander upon the desolate regions of annihilation, even by persistent rebellion, without his decision and constant notice!

The arm of God brought salvation.—Reaching to the forlorn pit of human apostasy, it touched a race—grasped a dying species. Unconscious of individualisms, the nature clings to the divine hand! By the facts of creation and grace this is true. Man may relinquish his grasp at will—God never! There is a point to which the infinite effort, put forth with the forces of the Godhead, must drag or carry, if necessary, [illegible]

the manhood? Man may die first; die in sin, even. God does not let go! He is still counted, till, by direction of the same divine will which caused his appearance in the life of the universe, he disappears—a star lost from the galaxy of existence.

God's prerogative, it was, to give man his being; his province, alone, to destroy it! Man dies the death, which is the penalty of his transgression—he is dying—he ceases to live, in the entire sense, when the purpose of God recognizes him no more, and by the same hand which made him live; not to neutralize his position, or change its mode, but by direct edict of infinite authority,—which to him is no less infinite condescension, blot him, being and name, from the multitudinous existence before God, that no knowledge or action of the universal life in all after eternity should, by the slightest recognition, intimate to itself that he had ever been.

More awful conception of future punishment is impossible! To suppose non-existence, and by direct action of the Omnipotent Ruler of the world, is to suppose darkness, night, death, in the most intense degree. It would lead to the prayer for life, though life were a constant agony!

We are under no obligation to conclude that the perishing sinner may behold the interference of the divine power turning wrath to love, to put him out of being and so end his torture! Far from it; but with a conviction of ultimate annihilation, which he would avoid,—and labors by all reasoning, arguments and prayers, to escape, he is hurled by Omnific sentence further down the declivity of destruction. Doubtless every sinner will awake to the importance of life, and pour his agonized plaint on the deafened ear of mercy, that destiny may not devour him, soul and body, never looking upon the fearful, final effect of his sins and God's active wrath as a blessing, even in a negative power of good.

The sense of suffering from loss must be proportionate to a view of the blessing forfeited, as seen in the possession of others, and which was just as fully within our reach."

Allow me to remark, that it seems to be but a limited and incongruous view of the divine plan, and inharmonious with the spoken authority, to suppose that a life or being which it required the divine functions to secure, and the divine nature in manhood to restore, should become an incidental or accidental matter; that no right inheres with the author of it to control forever! Though from the constitution of man he might go back to the elements from which he was taken; yet we must urge unhappy limitations of the power and position of Deity, to suppose that his creature can, by any combinations or derangements, pass from his notice and control. No; depend upon it. We are in being by the Omnipotent effort and eternal will. We must stay in the purpose and account of God till he shall dispossess the unworthy of all connection with himself by destroying them.

I conclude with the following extract from Prof. Hudson:

"The doctrine of the resurrection of the unjust may here be relieved of another objection, viz.: that God is not bound to punish the wicked in the precise measure of their misdeeds, and their resurrection would seem designed only for the purpose of such retribution. This objection was felt by some of the Socinians, who early protested against the notion that God must inflict penal suffering; and it led a few then as now to deny that the unjust would at all live again.

We reply that as God is not bound to resent the puny shaking of the sinner's fist, or the rude swagger of his tongue, but might forget him into eternal silence, so in fact he does not raise him up from death for the sake of punishing him. God never lifts a finger for the recovery of a right of his justice, or to save that attribute from fraud. He is not so poor that he should suffer for the lack of a deserved pang anywhere in his universe. 'If thou sinnest what dost thou against him?' He condescends to treat with men in the offer of mercy; never in the prosecution of justice. All sensible punishment is probably the ebbing away of life—the vanishing of infinitely desirable blessings. By a law of his being, the pangs of the second death may be commensurate with the sins of life.

The second death, then, we regard as not the object of the resurrection of the unjust, but the result. The Scriptural statements of their resurrection do not represent it as designed for the satisfaction of justice. It is unto condemnation, but not in order to condemnation. As life is not for the sake of death, and no man is born into this world in order that he may die—so the brief reviving of the spent life in the dawn of the world to come is not in order to the second death. Every form of man's death comes from the rejection of life, and every pang marks its progress thither, or its retreat from thence." W. S. C.

Brief Expositions.

NO. 10.—UNBELIEF.

"He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar."—1 John 5: 10.

"He that receiveth his testimony, hath set to his seal that God is true."—1 John 3: 33.

In these verses there is presented to us a clear view of faith and of unbelief. Faith is looking upon the gospel testimony as true—it is regarding God as not a liar when he delivers it. This is true in reference to all testimonies from Heaven. He who does not believe any of them, makes God—rather holds him to be—a liar; he who receives or credits the divine message, whatever may be its subject, sets his seal to this proposition, God has in delivering the said message spoken the truth—God is a God of truth.

Many are under the impression that what is called "saving faith," is something very different from all other kinds of faith, hence they are ever discoursing, and perplexing themselves, about the importance of having the right kind of faith, as if it were the all in all in the matter of the soul's salvation. Concern yourself about the right kind of faith no longer; the only thing to be considered is THE RIGHT TESTIMONY—that is, the right thing to be believed with a view to everlasting life. When the Israelite was in mortal agonies by the bite of the serpent, his concern was not with his eyes—or with the proper mode of using them, but with the brazen serpent, the thing, and the only saving thing, to be looked at. It is insane theology that sets a dying sinner to examine his faith; it is Heaven's mercy that urges him to "behold the Lamb." While he looks at his faith he expires; with his eyes fixed on Jesus—the Savior, the immortalizer—he lives. While anatomizing his faith—drawing the lines of a subtle analysis,—he is sucked into the womb of eternal night. God pity those who are exercised about faith, and not about its object—the life-giving Immanuel!

I would submit to the inquiring reader's attention that the testimony referred to, in both of the verses under review, is the object—as a testimony—of saving faith, or the testimony which if a man believes it he is saved; and hence the belief of it may be denominated saving faith, in the same manner as the profitable look at the brazen serpent might have been styled a saving look, whereas, in fact, it was not the look that saved, but the thing looked at. In connection with the first passage, "He that believeth not God," etc., read the eleventh verse of the same chapter, "And this is the record"—the thing to be believed—"that God hath given"—or gifted "to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." The eternal life is in Jesus, not in us; but it is there for our use; we may live forever by him. We may be branches of this immortal vine. Think you this is true? It rejoices me to show the reader that though he has no life—no immortality—in himself, God, in love for him, has appointed Jesus to give him life eternal. We are mortal—the Adamic life is doomed and must soon expire; but behold Him who has been made a quickening spirit—who rose from the grave with life-giving power for all. "He that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life." Turn your eye up toward Jesus, and thus meditate by the Divine authority:—"Yonder is my life-giving Redeemer; he died that I might have life everlasting; if I perish now, I perish even after God has made a gift of life to me,—O Jesus, thou art my life—I take thee as my only hope for time and eterniy."

It cannot be too strongly impressed on an inquirer's mind, that he does not need to ask God for life; the life is gifted already to him; and this is true, whether he believes it or no. In gifting Jesus to you, he made a gift—a free grant, to you of everlasting life. Say this is not true, and you make the Father "a liar," as the Scripture testifies so plainly. What a desperate crime unbelief is! How inexpressibly wicked virtually to proclaim God who cannot lie,—a liar. See, O unbeliever! your awful guilt. Are you resolved to cherish your impiety, even though you should finally perish without mercy?

How awful the doctrine, too widely taught, that men are unable to believe God—that they cannot cease to regard him as a liar; and that he is pleased to retain myriads in this condition by withholding a mysterious special influence, which, we are informed, is necessary to the production of faith in the human soul! The dogma is superlatively revolting and God-dishonoring. What! shall men find it easy to believe Satanic lies, and be taught that they are unable to believe God's truths? The prophets appear to be smitten with lunacy, and the people are groping in darkness.

Let every unconverted man know, that he is without excuse. He can roll his sins, or his misfortunes, should he prefer the word, nor on God, nor on the Devil, nor on his neighbor. Thou art the man! You are questioning God's love; you are suspecting his testimony. Though he cannot lie, you are acting towards him as if he had no moral character to be depended upon. How would you feel if one should treat you thus? The message is apparently too good to be true, that Jesus is already your life,—he died for your sins, and rose again. [illegible] are the tidings, certainly, but they are not too good to be true, because they are from Him whose [illegible] is higher than [illegible]

The Voice of the Church.

"It will be perfectly easy to establish the affirmation, that the original Protestant faith, in respect to the general subject of the coming of Christ, and its relations to the millennium, has become nearly or quite as obsolete and unpopular, as was the case respecting the primitive christian faith, in about the same length of time after its formal establishment in the church. . . . .

In pursuing this branch of our general subject, the writer gladly acknowledges his obligations to a work entitled, "THE VOICE OF THE CHURCH ON THE REIGN OF CHRIST, BY D. T. TAYLOR. This book the writer would earnestly recommend to all who seek for information on this general subject, as a very important and convenient compendium of knowledge in respect to the succession of christian testimony concerning the millennial views of the church from the time of the Apostles to the present day. The book has been published by H. L. Hastings, Rochester, N. Y."—Rev. D. D. Buck, M. E. Church. "Avenging of the Elect," p. 69.

"Comfort One Another."

We have the precious word of God
To cheer us on our way;
With such a light upon the road,
Why do we ever stray?
Why? why?

When we our dearest Friend forsake,
And walk the path of sin,
The cov'nant with our Savior break,
Sad are our hearts within—
Sad, sad.

Sin ever brings its sighs and pangs;
A fearful cloud of wrath,
Whene'er we stray, impending, hangs
Dark o'er our guilty path—
Dark, dark.

Shall we from Jesus e'er depart?
To live in sin's dark shade?
Grieve his kind Spirit from our heart?
No, never, by his aid—
No, no.

A friend so constant, kind and pure,
We'll thankfully adore;
Believe his promises, ever sure,
Yes, we will love him more—
Yes, yes.

And when in glory he shall come
To give the weary rest,
We'll have a happy, peaceful home,
Home with the ransomed blest—
Home, home. D. P. W.

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in Jesus, at Northampton, Mass., May 4th, 1859, Sister R. L. BUXTON, wife of Dr. H. W. Buxton of Worcester, aged forty-three years and four months.

Sister B. embraced Christ in her eighteenth year, and joined the Congregational Church. Subsequently she embraced the faith of the second, personal advent of Christ, and immortality only in Christ. She has, by precept and example, through her life, exemplified the religion of the blessed Savior. Her health had been failing for some time, and now she is numbered with the dead.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

Our Bro. and his two sons are left to mourn the departure of a most devoted wife and mother.

The funeral occasion was improved by a deeply interesting sermon from Bro. O. R. Fassett, of Westboro, on the christian's only hope—the literal resurrection of the dead.

H. W. B.

Died, in Lowell, April 19th, 1859, of cancerous tumor in the stomach, Sister HANNAH, wife of Dr. George Pierce, aged sixty-three years.

The subject of this notice, when but a child, gave her heart to God, from which time she has endeavored to maintain a christian character. In 1840 she became interested in the speedy advent of Christ, by reading the lectures of Wm. Miller, in which faith she continued until the day of her death. Her last sickness was distressing, but borne with christian fortitude, and when her strength could no longer bear up under the weight of disease, she quietly resigned all into the hands of God, and fell asleep in hope of a better resurrection.

Sr. P.'s remains were taken to Worthen St. Baptist church, where an appropriate discourse was delivered by Rev. Mr. Bonbam. The scene at the church was truly affecting, while numbers of like precious faith gathered around to bestow the last farewell tear. May this dispensation of Providence be sanctified to the good of our dear Bro. Pierce and family. A. ROSS.

THE WAR NEWS.

It is reported that there was a sharp action at the Bridge Buffalora, on Thursday, the 28th ult., and that the Austrians, after considerable loss, took it at the point of the bayonet.

It is reported that Mortara was taken, and that the Sardinians retreated before the Austrians near the Lago Maggiore.

The telegraph to Switzerland had been cut by the Austrians.

The Austrians were concentrating at Placenza in great masses.

Forty thousand French were in Genoa at present.

The King of Sardinia, accompanied by Generals Canrobert and Niel, had visited the line on the river Dora.

The Austrians had seized the Sardinian vessels on the Lago-Maggiore.

Austria is in the market for a loan of £20,000,000.

The French Emperor was expected to join the army on the 3d inst.

The Prussian government had resolved to put the army in readiness to march.

The English naval dockyards and arsenals are in a great state of excitement. Preparations for war are being made on an extensive scale.

Admiralty instructions were on Saturday, April 30, received at Woolwich dockyard, directing the acting master shipwright to [illegible] one of the various new class steam frigates in progress of construction; 200 additional hands were taken on forthwith.

A dispatch was received on Friday, at Sheerness, to send the Royal George to Devonport, and the Colossus to Portsmouth. The Edgar, Queen and Trafalgar are to be got ready immediately. The Osborne, steam yacht, is ordered to be got ready for immediate service, it is reported, for the Mediterranean, to be placed at the disposal of the Prince of Wales.

THE WAR IN ITALY.

The Times of the 2d has the following: "In our long list of telegrams, the public have, we fear, an earnest of what must be expected for some time to come. From among all these items, upon which no absolute reliance can be placed, one grand fact is evolved—Europe has entered into a state of war. War is going forth in his usual guise, and is making himself known by his ordinary deeds."

Vienna, 29. The Austrian Correspondence says, that Austria had accepted the proposed mediation of England, but France refused it. The article concludes thus: "Austria, faithful to her mission in the political world, has drawn the sword to defend the rights which treaties have given her, and to maintain the independence of the European States."

The Vienna correspondent of the Times says that the Porte is preparing for war, and Omar Pasha is on his way from Bagdad to Constantinople.

France has made another appeal to German forbearance, if not to German support, and this time in a tone relieved of the threats by which the former notes were characterised.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The Galway Vindicator, of the afternoon of April 30, in addition to the official dispatch received via St Johns, stating that the Austrians had crossed the Ticino, contains a Paris dispatch containing the announcement that France had declined the last offer of mediation tendered by Great Britain. The reason assigned for declining this offer is, that to have accepted it after the proposal of Russia for a Congress, agreed to by France, Prussia and England, had failed, it would be an insult to Russia to entertain the proposal of of England alone.

The Washington correspondent says Count Sartiges has let drop the expression "that the United States would also be drawn into it—that the Emperor had a sure scheme for that. There is but one scheme of the Emperor's by which this result could be brought about, and it is this—to induce Spain to sell us Cuba at a time when the hundred millions that she would get for it would virtually flow into his own exchequer, and when he felt certain that some other power would attempt to prevent us taking possession of the purchase."

Steamship Persia, from Liverool 30th.

The Austrian correspondence, official journal, of the 29th, after detailing the progress of affairs, says, Austria must draw the sword to maintain European order.

The following are the provisions of the Russo French treaties, as given by the Times.

By the 1st treaty, Russia binds herself, in the event of France being at war with Austria, to assist France with the co-operation of her fleets in the Baltic and Mediterranean, and to place an army of 50,000 men on the Austrian frontier. This, the Times says, is directed obviously against England, and its existence is a proof that the enterprises which are thus to be protected, are such as it would be impossible for England to allow to pass unchallenged. The Russian army of observation, the Times concludes, is to excite insurrection among the Hungarians and Sclavonians.

The second article provided that, in case Austria shall invade Sardinia, Russia shall declare war against her within fifteen days of her violation of the Piedmontese soil.

The Times maintains that England need take no active part so long as war is confined to Italy; but if France or Russia attack Austria in Germany, Russia seeking perchance indemnity in the east of it, or if Prussia should be laid under a contribution of territory, then the design of the treaties would become no less than a partition of Europe, and the first principle of preservation would compel us to consider whether we can better defend ourselves on the continent or at our own homesteads.

However much we may desire to keep clear of these complications, the existence of a great German Power is essential to our safety.

The following is a summary of the King of Sardinia's Proclamation to his Army. The King regards the demand to disarm as an outrage on himself and the nation, and therefore repelled the demand with disdain and scorn.

The King calls to mind Italy's cry of anguish, and says "I will be your captain, I have proved your valor on the field of battle by the side of my illustrious father. This time you will have for your comrades the gallant French soldiers, your companions on the Tchernaya, whom the Emperor has sent to support and defend our just and civilizing cause. Forward! to Victory! Let our banners announce to you that our object, like our war cry, is Independence of Italy!!

Prince Carguan had been appointed Lieut-General of Piedmont during the war.

The Universities of Piedmont had been closed by Royal decree.

The Sardinians had retired from Calaza to the west bank of the Sesia.

The great mass of the army, 75,000 strong, was condensed around the fortresses of Alessandria and Casale, with a second line at the foot of the Appennines, between Novo and Tortona.

ITALY.

The most intelligent writers of Italian affairs generally agree, that the time has come at which a revision of the existing arrangements on the Peninsula is absolutely requisite if the great Powers would avoid the advent, after a few years more of the troubled and precarious peace they have enjoyed for ten years past, of a crisis as terrible as the great French Revolution. Every year of fresh endurance and increased enlightenment adds strength to the passion whose object is "Italy for the Italians." The last ten years have been prolific in lessons of freedom to the people of Italy. They have learned the value of manly moderation and the folly of sentimental extravagance. The middle classes of the country have been taught the value of industrial labor and the power of individual energy. Sardinia has been their model of a well governed community and Cavour their idea of an enlightened and liberal statesman.

It will be remembered that the Ministers of England, France and Sardinia in 1856 represented to the assembled powers of Europe at the Conferences at Paris that "the state of Italy is a standing menace to the peace of Europe." Since that time the disaffection and discontent have been greatly increased, so that the present condition of Italy has been forcibly sketched by a foreign writer in the following language:

It is the state of a territory which aspires to be a country, and is in fact but "a geographical expression." It is the state of twenty-five millions of men speaking a common literature, inheritors of an unrivalled renown, who feel with equal bitterness the grandeur of the past and the nothingness of the present. It is a state of a race who, eager for disunion, see nothing but disintegration; who, desiring a federation of States flourishing side by side in one common motherland under native rulers and equal laws, look abroad upon a confused medley of provinces whose governments (with one glorious exception) are uniformly arbitrary and frequently alien. To hate strangers, and to be the vassals of strangers; to despise [illegible] and to be the slaves of [illegible]; to love freedom passionately, and to have it denied persistently; this is, and for generations this has been the fate of the best and most intelligent among the inhabitants of the Peninsula. As long as this is so—as long as a vast and populous territory in the very centre of the European State-system is inhabited by a race thus justly and incurably alienated from their rulers—the elements of local insurrection can never be wanting. The smoldering fire may burst forth at any moment; nor can it be confined within the territorial limits of its origin. In the present electric state of European feeling, a mere spark may suffice to set the continent in a blaze. The armed resistance of a single Italian province may wrap the world in the conflagration of a general war.—Transcript.

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS FROM FRANCE.—The Paris correspondent of the New York Times writes that—

"Much of the traveling from Paris takes place at night. All night long the eternal whistle of the train is in one's ear, and the government doubtless prefers, in the critical state of events, a time for much of of its transports when the good citizens of Paris are snug in their beds.

The manner in which the French troops have been despatched to the Alps since Good Friday is a model for the study of our officers. The very act of entering a railway carriage and disposing of his knapsack and his musket has been taught the soldier as part of his drill.

At a review held at Florence, the troops, the people, and a number of volunteers from Romagna who were passing through, shouted out: "Down with Austria!" "Piedmont for ever!" The whole mass then wanted to proceed to Leghorn, but were persuaded to wait for the signal from Piedmont.

The Paris correspondent of the London Globe, writing on the 24th ult., says —

If the bulk of the French nation had been adverse or even indifferent to a war against the Austrians for the rescue of Italy, any doubt on the nature of public feeling is now impossible in face of the enthusiasm that pervades Paris and all France. Since Friday night I have been in the faubourgs and in the workmen's quarters; most of the factories stop work this season, and the people were in groups (which no policemen now disperse) discussing the war and venting their indignation against l'Autrichien. All along from the Bastille through Rue St. Antoine the sound of war songs from various wine shops betokened how the wind blows, and the departing regiments, knapsacked and joyous, were followed by crowds cheering even during the night and early dawn, to the Lyons railway. The proprietors of the circus will reap a harvest, having announced a grand spectacle of the battle of Marengo. At Rhodes, the bishop presented himself in the barrack square, and harangued the 23d regiment of the line departing for Lyons. There is not a peasant family all over France that does not dream of some kinsman rising from the ranks to be marechal, as in the old times, and "Vive l'Italie" alternates now with "Vive l'Empereur," both cordially vociferated. The announced participation of Napoleon III, personally in the perils of the campaign was all that was wanted to identify him in the mind of the masses with the memories of the great uncle.

Discussion.

We have received and accepted a challenge from Mrs. C. M. Tuttle, to discuss the following resolutions, in West Winsted, Ct., at Camp's Hall, commencing Tuesday evening, June 7th, at 7 o'clock, and continuing three evenings.

1. Resolved, "That man is naturally immortal, possessing the capacity to communicate with minds of this earth after his departure therefrom."

2. Resolved, "That the material body, called Christ, was not raised from the dead; consequently, the resurrection of man is also spiritual."

3. Resolved, "That Christ's kingdom is a spiritual one, and now it is being made manifest that Christ has already come."

"The argument to be based upon the Bible, reason, and facts."

Mrs. Tuttle is to speak in the trance state.

☞ The following [illegible] had of J. R. [illegible]

the manhood? Man may die first; die in sin, even. God does not let go! He is still counted, till, by direction of the same divine will which caused his appearance in the life of the universe, [illegible] — a star lost from the galaxy of existence.

God's prerogative, it was, to give man his being; his province, alone, to destroy it! Man dies the death, which is the penalty of his transgressions — he is dying — he ceases to live, in the entire sense, when the purpose of God recognizes him no more, and by the same hand which made him live; not to neutralize his position, or change its mode, but by direct edict of infinite authority, — which to him is no less infinite condescension, blot him, being and name, from the multitudinous existence before God, that no knowledge or action of the universal life in all after eternity should, by the slightest recognition, intimate to itself that he had ever been.

More awful conception of future punishment is impossible! To suppose non-existence, and by direct action of the Omnipotent Ruler of the world, is to suppose darkness, night, death, in the most intense degree. It would lead to the prayer for life, though life were a constant agony!

We are under no obligation to conclude that the perishing sinner may behold the interference of the divine power turning wrath to love, to put him out of being and so end his torture! Far from it; but with a conviction of ultimate annihilation, which he would avoid, — and labors by all reasoning, arguments and prayers, to escape, he is hurled by Omnific sentence further down the declivity of destruction. Doubtless every sinner will awake to the importance of life, and pour his agonized plaint on the deafened ear of mercy, that destiny may not devour him, soul and body, never looking upon the fearful, final effect of his sins and God's active wrath as a blessing, even in a negative power of good.

The sense of suffering from loss must be proportionate to a view of the blessing forfeited, as seen in the possession of others, and which was just as fully within our reach."

Allow me to remark, that it seems to be but a limited and incongruous view of the divine plan, and inharmonious with the spoken authority, to suppose that a life or being which it required the divine functions to secure, and the divine nature in manhood to restore, should become an incidental or accidental matter; that no right inheres with the author of it to control forever! Though from the constitution of man he might go back to the elements from which he was taken; yet we must urge unhappy limitations of the power and position of Deity, to suppose that his creature can, by any combinations or derangements, pass from his notice and control. No; depend upon it. We are in being by the Omnipotent effort and eternal will. We must stay in the purpose and account of God till he shall dispossess the unworthy of all connection with himself by destroying them.

I conclude with the following extract from Prof. Hudson:

"The doctrine of the resurrection of the unjust may here be relieved of another objection, viz.: that God is not bound to punish the wicked in the precise measure of their misdeeds, and their resurrection would seem designed only for the purpose of such retribution. This objection was felt by some of the Socinians, who early protested against the notion that God must inflict penal suffering; and it led a few then as now to deny that the unjust would at all live again.

We reply that as God is not bound to resent the puny shaking of the sinner's fist, or the rude swagger of his tongue, but might forget him into eternal silence, so in fact he does not raise him up from death for the sake of punishing him. God never lifts a finger for the recovery of a right of his justice, or to save that attribute from fraud. He is not so poor that he should suffer for the lack of a deserved pang anywhere in his universe. 'If thou sinnest what dost thou against him?' He condescends to treat with men in the offer of mercy; never in the prosecution of justice. All sensible punishment is probably the ebbing away of life — the vanishing of infinitely desirable blessings. By a law of his being, the pangs of the second death may be commensurate with the sins of life.

The second death, then, we regard as not the object of the resurrection of the unjust, but the result. The Scriptural statements of their resurrection do not represent it as designed for the satisfaction of justice. It is unto condemnation, but not in order to condemnation. As life is not for the sake of death, and no man is born into this world in order that he may die — so the brief reviving of the spent life in the dawn of the world to come is not in order to the second death. Every form of man's death comes from the rejection of life, and every pang marks its progress thither, or its retreat from thence." W. A. C.

"The battle field is everywhere,
Our foes lie close about our way,
Temptation, riches, want or care,
[illegible] the contest day by day.
And he who in the [illegible] fight
[illegible]
Who keeps his armor pure and bright,
Shall win the victor's crown ere long."

Brief Expositions.

NO. 10. — UNBELIEF.

"He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar." — 1 John 5: 10.
"He that receiveth his testimony, hath set to his seal that God is true." — 1 John 3: 33.

In these verses there is presented to us a clear view of faith and of unbelief. Faith is looking upon the gospel testimony as true — it is regarding God as not a liar when he delivers it. This is true in reference to all testimonies from Heaven. He who does not believe any of them, makes God — rather holds him to be — a liar; he who receives or credits the divine message, whatever may be its subject, sets his seal to this proposition, God has in delivering the said message spoken the truth — God is a God of truth.

Many are under the impression that what is called "saving faith," is something very different from all other kinds of faith, hence they are ever discoursing, and perplexing themselves, about the importance of having the right kind of faith, as if it were the all in all in the matter of the soul's salvation. Concern yourself about the right kind of faith no longer; the only thing to be considered is THE RIGHT TESTIMONY — that is, the right thing to be believed with a view to everlasting life. When the Israelite was in mortal agonies by the bite of the serpent, his concern was not with his eyes — or with the proper mode of using them, but with the brazen serpent, the thing, and the only saving thing, to be looked at. It is insane theology that sets a dying sinner to examine his faith; it is Heaven's mercy that urges him to "behold the Lamb." While he looks at his faith he expires; with his eyes fixed on Jesus — the Savior, the immortalizer — he lives. While anatomizing his faith — drawing the lines of a subtle analysis, — he is sucked into the womb of eternal night. God pity those who are exercised about faith, and not about its object — the life-giving Immanuel!

I would submit to the inquiring reader's attention that the testimony referred to, in both of the verses under review, is the object — as a testimony — of saving faith, or the testimony which if a man believes it he is saved; and hence the belief of it may be denominated saving faith, in the same manner as the profitable look at the brazen serpent might have been styled a saving look, whereas, in fact, it was not the look that saved, but the thing looked at. In connection with the first passage, "He that believeth not God," etc., read the eleventh verse of the same chapter, "And this is the record" — the thing to be believed — "that God hath given" — or gifted "to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." The eternal life is in Jesus, not in us; but it is there for our use; we may live forever by him. We may be branches of this immortal vine. Think you this is true? It rejoices me to show the reader that though he has no life — no immortality — in himself, God, in love for him, has appointed Jesus to give him life eternal. We are mortal — the Adamic life is doomed and must soon expire; but behold Him who has been made a quickening spirit — who rose from the grave with life-giving power for all. "He that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life." Turn your eye up toward Jesus, and thus meditate by the Divine authority — "Yonder is my life-giving Redeemer; he died that I might have life everlasting; if I perish now, I perish even after God has made a gift of life to me, — O Jesus, thou art my life — I take thee as my only hope for time and etertiny."

It cannot be too strongly impressed on an inquirer's mind, that he does not need to ask God for life; the life is gifted already to him; and this is true, whether he believes it or no. In gifting Jesus to you, he made a gift — a free grant, to you of everlasting life. Say this is not true, and you make the Father "a liar," as the Scripture testifies so plainly. What a desperate crime unbelief is! How inexpressibly wicked virtually to proclaim God who cannot lie, — a liar. See, O unbeliever! your awful guilt. Are you resolved to cherish your impiety, even though you should finally perish without mercy?

How awful the doctrine, too widely taught, that men are unable to believe God — that they cannot cease to regard him as a liar; and that he is pleased to retain myriads in this condition by withholding a mysterious special influence, which, we are informed, is necessary to the production of faith in the human soul! The dogma is superlatively revolting and God-dishonoring. What! shall men find it easy to believe Satanic lies, and be taught that they are unable to believe God's truths? The prophets appear to be smitten with lunacy, and the people are groping in darkness.

Let every unconverted man know, that he is without excuse. He can roll his sins, or his misfortunes, should he prefer the word, nor on God, nor on the Devil, nor on his neighbor. Thou art the man! You are questioning God's love; you are suspecting his testimony. Though he cannot lie, you are acting towards him as if he had no moral character to be depended upon. How would you feel if one should treat you thus? The message is apparently too good to be true, that Jesus is already your life, — he died for your sins, and rose again. Joyful are the tidings certainly, but they are not too good to be true, because they are from Him whose "mercy is higher than the heavens." WM. GRANT MONCRIEFF.

The Welfare of Our Church.

"It will be perfectly easy to establish the affirmation, that the original Protestant faith, in respect to the general subject of the coming of Christ, and its relations to the millennium, has become nearly or quite as obsolete and unpopular, as was the case respecting the primitive christian faith, in about the same length of time after its general establishment in the church. . . . .

In pursuing this branch of our general subject, the writer gladly acknowledges his obligations to a work entitled, "THE VOICE OF THE CHURCH ON THE REIGN OF CHRIST, BY D. T. TAYLOR. This book the writer would earnestly recommend to all who seek for information on this general subject, as a very important and convenient compendium of knowledge in respect to the succession of christian testimony concerning the millennial views of the church from the time of the Apostles to the present day. The book has been published by H. L. Hastings, Rochester, N. Y." — Rev. D. D. Buck, M. E. Church. "Avenging of the Elect," p. 69.

For the Crisis.

"Comfort One Another."

We have the precious word of God
To cheer us on our way;
With such a light upon the road,
Why do we ever stray?
Why? why?

When we our dearest Friend forsake,
And walk the path of sin,
The cov'nant with our Savior break,
Sad are our hearts within —
Sad, sad.

Sin ever brings its sighs and pangs;
A fearful cloud of wrath,
Whene'er we stray, impending, hangs
Dark o'er our guilty path —
Dark, dark.

Shall we from Jesus e'er depart?
To live in sin's dark shade?
Grieve his kind Spirit from our heart?
No, never, by his aid —
No, no.

A friend so constant, kind and pure,
We'll thankfully adore;
Believe his promise, ever sure,
Yes, we will love him more —
Yes, yes.

And when in glory he shall come
To give the weary rest,
We'll have a happy, peaceful home,
Home with the ransomed blest —
Home, home. D. F. W.

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in Jesus, at Northampton, Mass., May 4th, 1859, Sister R. L. BUXTON, wife of Dr. H. W. Buxton of Worcester, aged forty-three years and four months.

Sister B. embraced Christ in her eighteenth year, and joined the Congregational Church. Subsequently she embraced the faith of the second, personal advent of Christ, and immortality only in Christ. She has, by precept and example, through her life, exemplified the religion of the blessed Savior. Her health had been failing for some time, and now she is numbered with the dead.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

Our Bro. and his two sons are left to mourn the departure of a most devoted wife and mother.

The funeral occasion was improved by a deeply interesting sermon from Bro. O. R. Fassett, of Westboro, on the christian's only hope — the literal resurrection of the dead. H. W. B.

Died, in Lowell, April 19th, 1859, of cancerous tumor in the stomach, Sister HANNAH, wife of Dr. George Pierce, aged sixty-three years.

The subject of this notice, when but a child, gave her heart to God, from which time she has endeavored to maintain a christian character. In 1840 she became interested in the speedy advent of Christ, by reading the lectures of Wm. Miller, in which faith she continued until the day of her death. Her last sickness was distressing, but borne with christian fortitude, and when her strength could no longer bear up under the weight of disease, she quietly resigned all into the hands of God, and fell asleep in hope of a better resurrection.

Sr. P.'s remains were taken to Worthen St. Baptist church, where an appropriate discourse was delivered by Rev. Mr. Bonham. The scene at the church was truly affecting, while numbers of like precious faith gathered around to bestow the last farewell tear. May this dispensation of Providence be sanctified to the good of our dear Bro. Pierce and family. A. ROSE.

THE WAR NEWS.

It is reported that there was a sharp action at the Bridge Buffalora, on Thursday, the 28th ult., and that the Austrians, after considerable loss, took it at the point of the bayonet.

It is reported that Mortara was taken, and that the Sardinians retreated before the Austrians near the Lago Maggiore.

The telegraph to Switzerland had been cut by the Austrians.

The Austrians were concentrating at Placenza in great masses.

Forty thousand French were in Genoa at present.

The King of Sardinia, accompanied by Generals Canrobert and Niel, had visited the line on the river Dora.

The Austrians had seized the Sardinian vessels on the Lago-Maggiore.

Austria is in the market for a loan of £20,000,000.

The French Emperor was expected to join the army on the 3d inst.

The Prussian government had resolved to put the army in readiness to march.

The English naval dockyards and arsenals are in a great state of excitement. Preparations for war are being made on an extensive scale.

Admiralty instructions were on Saturday, April 30, received at Woolwich dockyard, directing the acting master shipwright to hasten with all possible dispatch the completion of the various new class steam frigates in progress of construction; 300 additional hands were taken on forthwith.

A dispatch was received on Friday, at Sheerness, to send the Royal George to Devonport, and the Colossus to Portsmouth. The Edgar, Queen and Trafalgar are to be got ready immediately. The Osborne, steam yacht, is ordered to be got ready for immediate service, it is reported, for the Mediterranean, to be placed at the disposal of the Prince of Wales.

THE WAR IN ITALY.

The Times of the 2d has the following: "In our long list of telegrams, the public have, we fear, an earnest of what must be expected for some time to come. From among all these items, upon which no absolute reliance can be placed, one grand fact is evolved — Europe has entered into a state of war. War is going forth in his usual guise, and is making himself known by his ordinary deeds."

Vienna, 29. The Austrian Correspondence says, that Austria had accepted the proposed mediation of England, but France refused it. The article concludes thus: "Austria, faithful to her mission in the political world, has drawn the sword to defend the rights which treaties have given her, and to maintain the independence of the European States."

The Vienna correspondent of the Times says that the Porte is preparing for war, and Omar Pasha is on his way from Bagdad to Constantinople.

France has made another appeal to German forbearance, if not to German support, and this time in a tone relieved of the threats by which the former notes were characterized.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The Galway Vindicator, of the afternoon of April 30, in addition to the official dispatch received via St Johns, stating that the Austrians had crossed the Ticino, contains a Paris dispatch containing the announcement that France had declined the last offer of mediation tendered by Great Britain. The reason assigned for declining this offer is, that to have accepted it after the proposal of Russia for a Congress, agreed to by France, Prussia and England, had failed, it would be an insult to Russia to entertain the proposal of of England alone.

The Washington correspondent says Count Sartiges has let drop the expression "that the United States would also be drawn into it — that the Emperor had a sure scheme for that. There is but one scheme of the Emperor's by which this result could be brought about, and it is this — to induce Spain to sell us Cuba at a time when the hundred millions that she would get for it would virtually flow into his own exchequer, and when he felt certain that some other power would attempt to prevent us taking possession of the purchase."

Steamship Persia, from Liverool 30th.

The Austrian correspondence, official journal, of the 29th, after detailing the program of affairs, says, Austria must draw the sword to maintain European order.

The following are the provisions of the Russo French treaties, as given by the Times.

By the 1st treaty, Russia binds herself, in the event of France being at war with Austria, to assist France with the co-operation of her fleets in the Baltic and Mediterranean, and to place an army of 50,000 men on the Austrian frontier. This, the Times says, is directed obviously against England, and its existence is a proof that the enterprises which are thus to be protected, are such as it would be impossible for England to allow to pass unchallenged. The Russian army of observation, the Times concludes, is to excite insurrection among the Hungarians and Sclavonians.

The second article provided that, in case Austria shall invade Sardinia, Russia shall declare war against her within fifteen days of her violation of the Piedmontese soil.

The Times maintains that England need take no active part so long as war is confined to Italy, but if France or Russia attack Austria in Germany, Russia seeking perchance indemnity in the east of it, or if Prussia should be laid under a contribution of territory, then the design of the treaties would become no less than a partition of Europe, and the first principle of preservation would compel us to consider whether we can better defend ourselves on the continent or at our own homesteads.

However much we may desire to keep clear of these complications, the existence of a great German Power is essential to our safety.

The following is a summary of the King of Sardinia's Proclamation to his Army. The King regards the demand to disarm as an outrage on himself and the nation, and therefore repelled the demand with disdain and scorn.

The King calls to mind Italy's cry of anguish, and says "I will be your captain. I have proved your valor on the field of battle by the side of my illustrious father. This time you will have for your comrades the gallant French soldiers, your companions on the Tchernaya, whom the Emperor has sent to support and defend our just and civilizing cause. Forward! to Victory! Let our banners announce to you that our object, like our war cry, is Independence of Italy!!

Prince Carignan had been appointed Lieut. General of Piedmont during the war.

The Universities of Piedmont had been closed by Royal decree.

The Sardinians had retired from Calaza to the west bank of the Sesia.

The great mass of the army, 75,000 strong, was condensed around the fortresses of Alessandria and Casale, with a second line at the foot of the Appennines, between Novo and Tortona.

ITALY.

The most intelligent writers of Italian affairs generally agree, that the time has come at which a revision of the existing arrangements on the Peninsula is absolutely requisite if the great Powers would avoid the advent, after a few years more of the troubled and precarious peace they have enjoyed for ten years past, of a crisis as terrible as the great French Revolution. Every year of fresh endurance and increased enlightenment adds strength to the passion whose object is "Italy for the Italians." The last ten years have been prolific in lessons of freedom to the people of Italy. They have learned the value of manly moderation and the folly of sentimental extravagance. The middle classes of the country have been taught the value of industrial labor and the power of individual energy. Sardinia has been their model of a well governed community and Cavour their idea of an enlightened and liberal statesman.

It will be remembered that the Ministers of England, France and Sardinia in 1856 represented to the assembled powers of Europe at the Conferences at Paris that "the state of Italy is a standing menace to the peace of Europe." Since that time the disaffection and discontent have been greatly increased, so that the present condition of Italy has been forcibly sketched by a foreign writer in the following language:

It is the state of a territory which aspires to be a country, and is in fact but "a geographical expression." It is the state of twenty-five millions of men speaking a common literature, inheritors of an unrivalled renown; who feel with equal bitterness the grandeur of the past and the nothingness of the present. It is a state of a race who, eager for dissension, see nothing but disintegration; who, desiring a federation of States flourishing side by side in one common motherland under native rulers [illegible] look abroad upon a confused medley of provinces whose governments (with one glorious exception) are uniformly arbitrary and frequently alien. To hate strangers, and to be the vassals of strangers; to despise priests, and to be the slaves of priests; to love freedom passionately, and to have it denied persistently; this is, and for generations this has been the fate of the best and most intelligent among the inhabitants of the Peninsula. As long as this is so — so long as a vast and populous territory in the very centre of the European State-system is inhabited by a race thus justly and incurably alienated from their rulers — the elements of local insurrection can never be wanting. The smouldering fire may burst forth at any moment; nor can it be confined within the territorial limits of its origin. In the present electric state of European feeling, a mere spark may suffice to set the continent in a blaze. The armed resistance of a single Italian province may wrap the world in the conflagration of a general war. — Transcript.

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS FROM FRANCE. — The Paris correspondent of the New York Times writes that —

"Much of the traveling from Paris takes place at night. All night long the eternal whistle of the train is in one's ear, and the government doubtless prefers, in the critical state of events, a time for much of of its transports when the good citizens of Paris are snug in their beds.

The manner in which the French troops have been despatched to the Alps since Good Friday is a model for the study of our officers. The very act of entering a railway carriage and disposing of his knapsack and his musket has been taught the soldier as part of his drill.

At a review held at Florence, the troops, the people, and a number of volunteers from Romagna who were passing through, shouted out: "Down with Austria!" "Piedmont for ever!" The whole mass then wanted to proceed to Leghorn, but were persuaded to wait for the signal from Piedmont.

The Paris correspondent of the London Globe, writing on the 24th ult., says —

If the bulk of the French nation had been adverse or even indifferent to a war against the Austrians for the rescue of Italy, any doubt on the nature of public feeling is now impossible in face of the enthusiasm that pervades Paris and all France. Since Friday night I have been in the faubourgs and in the workmen's quarters, most of the factories stop work this season, and the people were in groups (which no policemen now disperse) discussing the war and venting their indignation against l'Autrichien. All along from the Bastille through Rue St. Antoine the sound of war songs from various wine shops betokened how the wind blows, and the departing regiments, knapsacked and joyous, were followed by crowds cheering even during the night and early dawn, to the Lyons railway. The proprietors of the circus will reap a harvest, having announced a grand spectacle of the battle of Marengo. At Rhodes, the bishop presented himself in the barrack square, and harangued the 23d regiment of the line departing for Lyons. There is not a peasant family all over France that does not dream of some kinsman rising from the ranks to be marechal, as in the old times, and "Vive l'Italie" alternates now with "Vive l'Empereur," both cordially vociferated. The announced participation of Napoleon III, personally in the perils of the campaign was all that was wanted to identify him in the mind of the masses with the memories of the great uncle.

2. Resolved, "That the material body, called Christ, was not raised from the dead, consequently, the resurrection of man is also spiritual."

3. Resolved, "That Christ's kingdom is a spiritual one, and now it is being made manifest that Christ has already come."

"The argument to be based upon the Bible, reason, and facts."

Mrs. Tuttle is to speak in the trance state.

For the Crisis.

The Land of Rest.

For thee I sigh, O land of rest,
When oft by cares and grief oppressed;
When waves of anguish o'er me roll,
Thou art the refuge of my soul.

Though through time's kaleidoscope
To thee, my journey's end and hope;
When morning dawns, and evening gloams,
With those I loved my spirit roams,

When night her mantle round me throws,
And woos me to her soft repose,
Thou art with choicest musings fraught,
The dearest theme of wildering thought.

For thee I sigh, O land of rest!
The pilgrim's home when sore oppressed;
His watchword 'mid the storms of life,
His triumph in its closing strife.

For the Crisis.

"Passing Away."

The above heading was suggested by a dear sister in Christ,—her frail frame tottering, ready to be deposited beneath the clods of the valley—her hope bright with immortality, her faith taking hold on Him who has said, "I am the Life." To all who are in Him it little matters when the final heart's pulsation ceases; hope in this case tells not "a flattering tale," it buoys up amid the surging billows of adversity; it carries the mind forward to the consummation of the blessed hope, it says man shall live again.

Passing away! It is not the language of the hypochondriac; it is not the sentiment of poetry; it is the stern reality of every day's experience. Brevity is the marked characteristic of all that is, of all that has been; and unless God has revealed a different state of things yet to have existence, we are shut up to the belief that change for the better will never come; but, thanks be to God, life and incorruptibility are brought to light through the Gospel, and by it the question is settled whether man, made after the likeness of God, shall live again.

Passing away! What a fullness of meaning in those words! Who is there that has seen the setting sun, at the close of a bright, calm, autumnal eve, and has not been led to look upon it as one of the most glorious exhibitions of God's works? They have looked and looked until the god of day has gone—gone to lighten other lands,—to us he has passed away; and upon many, many of us ne'er again to rise, finding us the beholders of his majesty, death, in the still small hours of night, came,—we passed away and were not.

Let us for a moment fancy ourselves aboard a mighty ship, in the midst of the broad ocean. Let us go to the hinder part of the noble vessel as she ploughs through mid ocean; a foam is seen some distance behind, but soon we have outstripped this, and that which was, is not. So of man, his course is forward, his name lives a short time after him, but soon that is forgotten; he has passed away, and the question is again asked, "where is he?" So let us live that our names may be written as with a "pen of iron" in the book of God's remembrance, that though earth-worms destroy this body, we may in our flesh see God, even our God, when He shall again manifest Him who is said to be "the express image of His Father's person."

Seeing that the days in which we live are days of peril, we are exhorted to improve the time; improve it by all the means in our power. We are not our own, we are bought with a price; we are redeemed not with corruptible things, as gold and silver, which in the using perish, but by the precious blood of Christ, who died that we might live,—live again. Of what account is this passing state of affairs if all things are ours? The grave cannot hold dominion over us; for Jesus has died, he has indeed risen, and lives forevermore, and as he lives we also shall live. He was raised with the power of an endless life. Mark the relationship he bears to us; not only that of elder brother, but Father of the everlasting age.

"There will be no more sorrow."

We are passing away; and with us passeth the fashion of this world; but he that doeth the will of God, abideth forever. And is it a small thing to abide forever? Is it a mean thing to sit on thrones in the times of the restitution? Remember there is a promise to this effect. No; 'tis neither small nor mean to be a partaker of God's munificence, though we are appointed door-keepers in the house of our God. So thought the king of Israel, when he sung his sweet psalm; he would rather live a day in God's courts, than dwell forever in the tents of the wicked.

In conclusion, let me exhort you, who have been led to take refuge beneath the Almighty power, to see to it that your life is truly hid with Christ in God; that when He who is our life shall appear, ye may appear with him in glory. Remember that God desires his people shall inherit substance with abiding glory. G. W. T.

Home Missions.—No. 3.

May I not state a few more items in regard to this subject? As I have already stated, there are means to do more work in the vineyard of God than is done. The day of mercy is just closing. A world of sinners, in the church and out of it, is on the verge of eternal destruction. What is done to save them, or "some of them," must be done quickly. Our ministers have labored, and sacrificed their time, their labors, their property, (and the prospects of getting more to sustain their families,) in the cause of our coming Lord and King. Many of them have been obliged to turn their attention and energies in another direction to live and be honest; and others have never received enough to enable them to leave business. While these things are so, the calls come from every direction for the word of life. The way is opening, as it never has before, for this last message of the gospel. The question often arises, Can we not raise a mission fund to be properly expended in supporting one, two, or more evangelists in Maine, whose labors in the vineyard are much needed, but prevented for reasons before stated?

I lately received a letter from one of our able and faithful ministers, whose labors have been blessed in the conversion of many, and the upbuilding of the cause. In that letter, while speaking of the difficulties of maintaining meetings, I learned that it cost him $60 the last year, out of his own pocket, to defray expenses for meetings, besides preaching constantly on Sundays, and working diligently six days in the week, while he is poor in this world.

Another says, "I have labored about here seven weeks with a prospect of reformation, some are converted; the cause of God seems to be rising, and yet I have only received 94 cents to aid in the support of my family."

How many of our lay brethren are willing to spend fifty, or sixty dollars each, yearly, or the earnings of one or two months, to aid God's ministers in doing the work to which he has called them? Shall we come to our next annual Conference with a mind to discuss this missionary question, and to act as God would have us upon it?

Yours in behalf of Christ,
I. C. Wellcome.

Power of Faith.

Bro. Grant:—The following was handed me by a brother, and I send it to the Crisis, thinking it might encourage some to pray.
J. Hemenway

Extract from the journal of Rev. T. Smith, Philadelphia Conference, Burlington Circuit, March 25, 1806.

Quarterly meeting was held at New Mills. The Rev. T. Ware presided. It began well, progressed well, ended well. On Sunday night, Bro. Hutchinson preached, and mighty power from on high was among the people. I saw a young man sallying around in the crowd on the left of the pulpit. I made my way to him and inquired into the state of his mind. He told me he was distressed on account of his sins.

While conversing with him, three gentlemen came up and insisted on his going away with them. I inquired if they were his guardians—they said they were not. I desired them to be quiet until I was done talking with the young man. They said there was no need of my talking with him. "Perhaps, gentlemen," said I, "you don't believe in the christian religion?" They said, "No, we don't." I said, "Gentlemen, will you suffer us to gather around you and pray for you thirty minutes, after which, if there is no change in your minds on the subject of the christian religion, I will agree to give it up myself." They replied, "Well, sir, we will take you at your proposal, you shall pray for us thirty minutes, and we will stand our ground until the time expires; and if there be any change wrought in our minds, by any supernatural power, we will as honest men confess it, but if there be no change in our minds, as to the truth of the Christian religion, you shall on your part, renounce it before this congregation." My answer was, "Gentlemen, I most solemnly promise to do so."

I then called the attention of the congregation to this awful contract. Many faces turned pale, others trembled with fear lest I should be a ruined man. I then requested the friends to clear the seats near the pulpit. "Infidelity and christianity are fairly at issue, and may the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, hear and answer by fire." I then called all the official members of the church, and all that could pray in faith, to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. In one minute there were scores around us. But before we kneeled, I delivered them this charge:

"Brethren, you are not to offer one single prayer for the conversion of these men, if you do, those prayers will be lost; but send your petitions to the throne of grace, that God may convict them of the error of their ways, as he did Saul of Tarsus on his way to Damascus." This being understood, I cried, "Let us pray!" In that moment, I reckon there were twenty watches out to mark the time. If I ever saw a time of prayer it was that night. The whole congregation were as one mouth and one breath; the foundation of the house seemed to tremble. I held my watch and proclaimed the time. "Five minutes of the time are gone!" "Ten minutes of the time are gone!" and down comes a Saul of Tarsus to the floor. And was there not a shout? It was like tumbling down the walls of Jericho. "Twenty minutes of the time are gone!" And down comes the second. Oh the prayers! the house did shake. "Twenty-five minutes of the time are gone," and the third gentleman took his seat.

After the time allotted for prayers had expired, two gentlemen were on the floor, the third on the seat. I requested the congregation to be seated and quiet, for the spirit of the prophets is subject to the prophets. I then called on those gentlemen to tell the congregation if any change had taken place in their minds, and whether they then believed in the christian religion. So many as could, arose, and most solemnly declared that their minds had changed, and that they then believed Jesus Christ was the Son of God. Christianity did at that time triumph over infidelity. To God be all the glory.

A Letter in Verse.

My Pilgrim Bro. Ross:—

To Exeter I found my way,
And now I have few words to say,
To one commissioned from above
To bear the tidings of His dying love
To the poor fallen, human race,
To teach them how we're saved by grace.
'Tis a great work, and surely we
Ought to be clean, and from sin free,
Of wisdom, learning, cannot boast,
But with "the faith" we'll meet the host.
The fishermen were surely brought
Into the field, and battles fought,
Unlettered and unlearned were they,
But with their Lord did gain the day
They were meek and strong, and also bold,
The people marvelled at the truth they told.
With Jesus Christ they'd been to college,
And here is where they got their knowledge.
A Paul may plant, and we may sow,
But our Lord alone must make it grow.
Albion, look up, and do keep hold,
The story soon will all be told,
Be good and faithful, don't look back,
But keep upon the narrow track
At Exeter there's an ear to hear,
The coming day of God they fear;
Some have been reach'd, and the new song
Of praise to God does help along
They want to see you down this way;
Come down, with them the Sabbath stay
The church are not but half awake.
They sure must die for Jesus' sake;
The converts, they are yet alive,
I hope in truth they still will thrive.
By day and night I preach and pray,
My work is hard for every day,
A weary pilgrim, homeward bound,
Rest surely here cannot be found,
A missionary, the world my field,
The Spirit's sword I have to wield,
Few sympathize, or with us go,
They know not what we undergo,
We start right out, no scrip nor purse,
Sometimes no friends, and this is worse,
Sometimes I feel as though I'd die,
And then unto the Lord I cry,
With all the good I must sit down,
And with my Savior wear a crown.
My wife and children, home and all,
I have to leave at Master's call
Sixteen years I've run the round,
And still upon this earth I'm found,
Beseeching men to turn and run
To Christ, and pray "thy Kingdom come!"
No salary promised, only bread
And water sure, we shall be fed.
A bitter cup we have to drink,
'Tis a hard life, I sometimes think;
I look to Christ, and then I see
One who was rich, made poor for me,
I hear him say, the birds have nests,
And foxes holes in which to rest;
The Son of Man, I hear him say,
No where his sacred head can lay
My murmuring now is hushed and fled,
I'll follow Christ, my living Head!
We'll suffer on, and will not fear,
The better day is drawing near.
Pilgrims and strangers we must be,
If we would live and reign with thee.
I've spun you out my pilgrim song,
For Monday, sure, it's quite too long

From Fables of Infidelity

Daylight before Sunrise.

2. To the second objection—That astronomers have discovered stars whose light must have been millions of years traveling to this earth, and that consequently these stars must have existed millions of years ago, and therefore the Bible makes a false declaration when it says that the universe was created only some six or seven thousand years ago—I reply by asking, Where does the Bible say so?

"What," says our objector, "is not that the good old orthodox doctrine of christians and commentators? Do they not unanimously denounce geologists and astronomers as heretics, for asserting the vast antiquity of the earth?"

We shall see presently that no such unanimity of denunciation has ever existed, and that some of the most ancient and learned christian commentators taught the antiquity of the earth, from the Bible, before geology was born. But that is not the question before us just now. We are not asking what the good old orthodox doctrine of christians, or the unanimous opinion of commentators may have been, but what is the reading of the Bible—What does this book say?—not, "What does somebody think?"

"Well," replies our objector, "does not the Bible say, in the first of Genesis, that God created the heavens and the earth in six days, and Adam on the sixth; and are not chronologists agreed that that was not more than seven thousand years ago, at the very utmost?"

If the Bible had said that God created the heavens and the earth in six days, and that the end of that period was only seven thousand years ago, it would by no means follow that the beginning of it was only a few hours before that; for every Bible reader knows, that the most common use of the word day, in Scripture, is to denote, not a period of twenty-four hours, but a period of time which may be of various lengths.* In this very narrative, (Gen. 2: 5) it is used to denote the whole period of the six days' work: "In the day the Lord God made the earth and the heavens." Does it mean just twenty-four hours there? In the first of Genesis, its duration is defined to consist of "the evening and the morning." Before our infidel chronologist finds out the Bible date of creation, he must be able to tell us of what length was the evening which preceded the first morning, and with it constituted the first day? God has of set purpose placed stumbling blocks for scoffers at the entrance and the exit of the Bible, as a rebuke to pride and vain curiosity. Dan. 12: 10; Job, 38: 4; Col. 2: 18. He nowhere says that the first of the six days of Genesis was the first day, absolutely, of the earth's existence. And lest any one should think so, from the use of the ordinal adjective first, he does not use that word; but while each of the other days is called "day second," "day third," etc., the first of the series is distinguished by the cardinal numeral, as "day one;" literally, "And evening was and morning was day one." The first day and the last day are hidden from man.

But if our objector had read the Bible attentively, he would have seen that it does not say that God created the heavens and the earth in six days. Before it begins to give any account of the six days' work, it tells us of a previous state of disorder; and going back beyond that again, it says, "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth." It is as self-evident that this beginning was before the six days' work, as that the world must have existed before it could be adjusted to its present form. How long before, the Bible does not say, nor does the objector pretend to know. It may have been as many millions of years as he assigns to the stars, or twice as many, for any thing he knows to the contrary. He must have overlookd the first two verses of the Bible, else he had never made this objection; which is simply a blunder, arising from incapacity to read a few verses of Scripture correctly.

But it is replied, "Does not the Bible say, in the fourth commandment, "In six days the Lord made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is," etc.? True. But we are speaking just now of a very different work: the work of creation. If any one does not know the difference between create and make, let him turn to his dictionary, and Webster will inform him that the primary literal meaning of create is, "To produce; to bring into being, from nothing; to cause to exist." The example he gives to illustrate his definition is this verse, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." But the primary meaning of make is, "To compel: to constrain;" thence, "to form of materials," and he illustrates the generic difference between these two words by a quotation from Dwight: "God not only made but created: he not only made the work, but the materials." Both words are as good translations of the Hebrew originals, bra, oshe, as can be given.

If any of my readers has not a dictionary, he can satisfy himself thoroughly as to the different meanings of these two words, and of their equivalents in the original Hebrew, by looking at their use in his Bible. Thus, he will find create applied to the creation of the heavens and the earth, in the beginning, when there could have been no pre-existent materials to make them from, unless we adopt the Atheistic absurdity, of the eternity of matter—that is to say, that the paving stones make themselves. Then it is applied to the production of animal life—v. 21—which is not a product or combination of any lifeless matter, but a direct and constant resistance to the chemical and mechanical laws which govern lifeless matter: "God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth." Gen. 1: 21. Next it is applied to the production of the human race, as a species distinct from all other living creatures, and not derived from any of them. "God created man in his own image." Gen. 1: 27. It is in like manner applied to all God's subsequent bestowals of animal life and rational souls, which are directly bestowed by God, and are not in the power of any creature to give. "Thou sendest forth thy spirit: they are created." "Remember now thy Creator, in the days of thy youth." Psalm 104: 30. Eccl. 12: 1. In all these instances, the use of the word determines its literal meaning to be what Webster defines it: "To bring into being from nothing."

The metaphorical use of the word is equally expressive of its literal meaning, for it is applied to the production of new dispositions of mind and soul utterly opposite to those previously existing. "Create in me a clean heart;" which God thus explains: "A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh." Psalm 51: 10. Ezekiel 36: 26. The Hebrew word bra has as many derivative meanings as our English word create; as we speak of "creating a peer," "the abstinence creating uneasiness," etc.; but these no more change the primitive idea in the one case than in the other.

From this word create, the Bible very plainly distinguishes the words make and form, using them as the complement of the former, in many passages which speak of both creation and making. Thus, man was both created and made. His life and soul are spoken of as a creation; his body as a formation from the dust; his deputed authority over the earth also implies a primal creation, and subsequent investiture; and so both terms are applied to it. So the words make and form are applied to the production of the bodies of animals from pre-existing materials, while animal life is ever spoken of as a product of creative power. But, that we may see that these processes are distinct, and that the words which express them have distinctive meanings, the Author of the Bible takes care to use them both in reference to this very work, in such a way that we cannot fail to perceive he intends some distinction, unless we suppose that he fills the Bible with useless tautologies. For instance, "On the seventh day, God rested from all his work, which God created and made." "These are the generations of the heavens and the earth, when they were created; in the day the Lord God made the earth and the heavens." "But now thus saith the Lord that created thee, Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel." "For thus saith the Lord, that created the heavens, God himself, that formed the earth, and made it, He hath established it; He created it not in confusion; he formed it to be inhabited." Gen. 2: 1–5. Isa. 43: 1–7; 45: 1, 2. In all these passages creation is clearly distinguished from formation and making, if the Bible is not a mass of senseless repetitions. If create, and make, and form, have all the same meaning, why use them all in the same verse? These, and many similar passages, show that the Bible teaches the work of creation—calling things into being—to be previous to and distinct from the work of making—forming of materials already created.

Between these two widely different processes—of the original creation of the universe, and the subsequent preparation of the habitable earth, by the six days' work—two intervening periods are indicated by Scripture, both of indefinite length. The first of these is that which intervened between the original creation and the period of disorder indicated in the second verse. The second is that disordered period during which the earth continued without form and void.

That original chaos which some would find in the second verse, never had any existence, save in the brains of atheistic philosophers. It is purely absurd. God never created a chaos. Man never saw it. The crystals of the smallest grain of sand, the sporules of the humblest fungus on the rotten tree, the animalculæ in the filthiest pool of mud, are as orderly in their arrangements, as perfect after their kind, and as wisely adapted to their station, as the angels before the throne of God. And as man never saw, so he has no language to describe, a state of original disorder; for every word he can use implies a previous state of regularity; as, disorder tells of order dissolved, confusion of previous forms melted together. So the poets who have tried to describe a chaos have been obliged to represent it as the wreck of a former state.

Both the Bible language and the Bible narrative correspond to the philosophy and philology of the case; for, by the use of the substantive verb, in the past tense, implying progressive being, according to the usual force of the word in Hebrew, we are told literally, "the earth became without form and void." God did not create it so, but after it was created, and by a series of revolutions not recorded, it became disordered and empty. The Holy Spirit takes care to explain this verse, by quoting it in Jer. 4: 23, as the appropriate symbolical description of the state of a previously existing and regularly constituted body politic, reduced to confusion by the calamities of war. Again, he explains both the terms used in it in Isa. 34: 11, by using them to describe, not the rude and undigested mass of the heathen poet, but the wilderness condition of a ravaged country, and the desolate ruins of once beautiful and populous cities: "He will stretch out upon it the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness." In both these cases the previous existence of an orderly and populous state is implied. And finally, we are expressly assured, that the state of disorder mentioned in the 2d verse of Gen. 1, was not the original condition of the earth—Isa. 45: 18—where the very same word is used as in Gen. 1: 2, "He created it not, teu, disordered, in confusion." The period of the earth's previous existence in an orderly state, or that occupied by the revolutions and catastrophes which disordered its surface, is not recorded in Scripture.

The second period is that of disorder, which must have been of some duration, more or less, and is plainly implied to have been of considerable length, in the declaration that "the Spirit of the Lord moved"—literally was brooding (a figure taken from the incubation of fowls)—"upon the waters." But no portion of Scripture gives any intimation of the length of this period.

If, then, astronomers and geologists assert that the earth was millions, or hundreds of millions of years in process of preparation for its present state, by a long series of successive destructions and renovations, and gradual formations, there is not one word in the Bible to contradict that opinion; but, on the contrary, very many texts which fully and unequivocally imply its truth. But, as the knowledge of the exact age of the earth is by no means necessary to any man's present happiness, or the salvation of his soul, it is no-where taught in the Bible. God has given us the stars to teach us Astronomy, the Earth to teach us Geology, and the Bible to teach us Religion, and neither contradicts the other.

For the Crisis.

Fever and Ague, and its Cure.

None save those who have experienced the enervating effects of this disease, can fully sympathise with its victims. Its icy hand, which seems to chill the blood as it passes over the shrinking pores; and its hot breath, thawing the frozen veins, and seeming to fill them suddenly with molten fire. The creeping sensation all up the spine, the aching temples, the livid lip, the ghastly cheek, the sunken eye and the utter prostration which pervades the entire frame, make it one of the most distressing ills that flesh is heir to.

For eight or nine months, with very few respites, I was afflicted with its debilitating influence. Each alternate day, between nine and ten o'clock, A. M., the chills came on. I tried every nostrum which I heard of, in hopes of obtaining relief; but temporary alleviation was the best which the very best achieved.

At length, a negro woman prescribed the following, which, under Providence, completely eradicated the disease. What I paid for it I would at any time have quadrupled for an hundredth part of the blessing which I have seen it accomplish, not only in my own case, but in those of four other individuals, who were dragging out a miserable existence under the dreadful burden of Chagres fever. Here it is, simple and easily obtained.

Take about one ounce of ground coffee, put into a pint of water, boil down to half, strain off, and into it squeeze a lemon. Take this, without sweetening, at a draft, every morning on which you expect an attack, or even when it has commenced, and I have every confidence, if persevered in for a short time, that a permanent cure will be effected.

The ingredients are perfectly innoxious to the patient; and I hope all who read this recipe will communicate it freely to others, and I pray God it may become a blessing to many. Jno. F. Cotton.

Sleeping Together.

If a man were to see a quarter of an inch of worm put in his cup of coffee, he could not drink it, because he knows that the whole cup would be impregnated. If a very small amount of some virulent poison be introduced into a glass of water, the drinking of it might not produce instant death, but that would not prove that it was not hurtful, only that there was not enough of it to cause a destructive result immediately.

We sicken at the thought of taking the breath of another the moment it leaves the mouth, but that breath mingles with the air about the bed in which two persons lie, and it is re-breathed, but not the less offensive is it in reality, on account of the dilution, except that it is not taken in its concentrated form, but each breath makes it more concentrated. One sleeper corrupts the atmosphere of the room by his own breathing, but when two persons are breathing at the same time, twelve or fourteen times in each minute, in each minute extracting all the nutriment from a gallon of air, the deterioration must be rapid indeed, especially in a small and close room. A bird cannot live without a large supply of pure air. A canary bird hung up in a curtained bedstead where two persons slept, died before the morning.

Many infants are found dead in bed, and it is attributed to having been overlaid by the parents, but the idea that any person could lie still for a moment on a baby or any thing else of the same size, is absurd. Death was caused by the want of pure air.

Besides, emanations aerial and more or less solid, are thrown out from every person, thrown out by the processes of nature, because no longer fit for life purposes, because they are dead and corrupt; but if breathed into another living body, it is just as abhorrent as if we took into our mouths the matter of a sore or any other excretion.

The most destructive typhoid and putrid fevers are known to arise directly from a number of persons living in the same small room.

Those who can afford it, should therefore arrange to have each member of the family sleep in a separate bed. If persons must sleep in the same bed, they should be about the same age, and in good health. If the health be much unequal, both will suffer, but the healthier one the most, the invalid suffering for want of an entirely pure air.

So many cases are mentioned in standard medical works, where healthy, robust infants and larger children have dwindled away, and died in a few months from sleeping with grandparents, or other old persons, that it is useless to cite special instances in proof.

It would be a constitutional and moral good for married persons to sleep in adjoining rooms, as a general habit. It would be a certain means of physical invigoration, and of advantages in other directions, which will readily occur to the reflective reader. Kings and queens, and the highest personages of courts, have separate apartments. It is the bodily emanations collecting and concentrating under the same cover, which are most destructive of health, more destructive than the simple contamination of an atmosphere breathed in common.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Dangers of Spring.

About one-fifth more persons die in New York city in May, than in November. After being pent up in the winter, it might be supposed that the ability to go out and exercise in the luscious air of spring time, would be productive of increased vigor and health of body, but this is simply not the case, as evidenced by the ably prepared and valuable reports of City Inspector Morton. This difference of mortality between the last month of spring and the last month of fall, arises from causes which are under the control of the people or beyond; two of each will be mentioned. The natural causes are, 1st—The increased dampness of the atmosphere, proven by the fact that doors which shut easily in winter, do not do so in summer. 2d—Nature takes away the appetite for meats, for heat giving food, in order to prepare the body for the increased temperature of summer. But two errors in practice at this time, interfere with wise nature's arrangements, and induce many painful and dangerous diseases. First, the amount of clothing is diminished too soon. Second, the conveniences of fire in our dwellings are removed too early. All persons, especially children, old people, and those in delicate health, should not remove the thickest woolen flannel of mid-winter, until sometime in May, and then it should be merely a change to a little thinner material.

Furnaces should not be removed, nor fire-places and grates cleaned for the summer, until the first of June; for a brisk fire in the grate is sometimes very comfortable in the last week in May; that may be a rare occurrence, but as it does sometimes take place, it is better to be prepared for it than to sit shivering for half a day, with the risk to ourselves and children of some violent attack of spring disease. By inattention to these things, four causes are in operation to chill the body and induce colds and fevers.

First, the dampness of the atmosphere in May.

Second, the striking falling off in appetite for meats and other "heating" food.

Third, the premature diminution of clothing.

Fourth, the too early removal of the conveniences of fire.

And when the very changing condition of the weather of May is taken into account, it is no wonder that, under the influence of so many causes of diminution of the temperature of the body, many fall victims to disease.

In November, the healthiest month in the year, we have put on our warmest clothing, we have kindled our daily fires, we have found a keen relish for substantial food, while the dampness of the atmosphere has been removed by the condensation of increasing cold. The wise will remember these things for a lifetime, and teach them to their children.—Hall's Jour. of Health.

Object of Eating.

Taking food into the body is called eating, passing it from the body is called defecation.

Three-fourths of all our ailments occur, or are kept in continuance, by preventing the daily food which is eaten from passing out of the body, after its substance has been extracted by the living machinery, for the purpose of renovation and growth. A healthy laboring man will eat daily two pounds of solid food, of meat, bread, vegetables and fruit; these two pounds, if brought together in one heap, would fill to overflowing the largest sized dinner plate, and yet there are myriads of grown-up men and women to whom the idea has never occurred, that if this mass is retained in the body, day by day, inevitable harm must accrue. If a man eats two pounds daily, near two pounds daily must, in some way or other, pass from his body, or disease and premature death is a speedy and inevitable result.

The object of passing food through the body is threefold in youth; in maturity, two; for growth, sustenance and repair in the one, in the latter for support and repair only, that is, nutrition; and the process by which the system separates the nutriment from the food, is called digestion; the distribution of this digested material to the different parts of the body where needed, for the purpose of being incorporated into bone, flesh, nerve and tendon, is termed assimilation.—Health and Disease.

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER II.—(Concluded.)

ARE THERE RADICALLY BAD MEN?

4. Various examples, I think, confirm our fears that some men are hopelessly bad. And I shall not seek my examples among the lower classes of men, so often given over as past saving, by the elite of society. Here is one of the great corruptions that Christ came to rebuke,—the "respect of persons" or of outward appearances and advantages, which often make men really worse instead of better. Akin to this is the common condemnation of men because ignorant, sceptical, or unorthodox. So the Pharisees said—"This people, that know not the law are accursed." And in modern times the term "miscreant" has grown out of the same feeling that no man could be worse than a misbeliever; for that is the meaning of the reproachful word.—The mission of Christ, who made himself the "friend of publicans and sinners," was in part to condemn this false and pernicious method of judgment.

Here it may be urged that Christ extended his charity to all classes. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," was his dying prayer. But it may be fairly questioned whether the prime instigators and contrivers of his death were included in this petition of mercy. The account occurs in Luke 23: 33, 34: "And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors; one on the right hand, and the other on the left. Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." This condemnation may apply only to the Romans, who were the instruments employed by those who plotted his death, and to others who might fairly plead some excuse of ignorance. Luke tells us in the next verse, with two intervening statements, that "the rulers derided him;" and though Christ felt no resentment or revenge, we cannot, in a strict interpretation of the passage, make the act of pardon cover the argument of my opponent.—Especially is this view discouraged by what Christ had before said to the class in question, "Ye have both seen and hated both me and my Father;" and on another occasion, "If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth." With which agrees that of John, "There is a sin unto death; I say not that ye shall pray for it."

For examples of apparently bad men, then, I will name,

(1.) Balaam. This man, who had very important gifts of prophecy, seems after all to have had none of that charity or holy love without which one is nothing. He is pre-eminently an instance, and as such Bp. Butler has wisely selected him, of the power of man to act wickedly against the fullest conviction both of duty and of interest. He was well persuaded that Jehovah was the true God, and that one's highest welfare, if not the only salvation, was in his favor. "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel." (Num. 23: 23.) "There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth." (24: 17.) "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." (23: 10.) Such were his utterances in the rapture of the prophetic spirit. Yet this same man, for filthy lucre's sake, contrived a plan by which he should seduce the Israelites into idolatry, with its usual vices, so he might feel warranted in pronouncing upon them the curse which Balak wanted. If it be said that he did this, in the confidence that nothing could harm the Israelites,—as some have excused the treason of Judas against Jesus,—then we must consider that after the seduction was accomplished and the curse pronounced, and 24,000 of the Israelites had perished, he joined the army of Balak to meet their attack. If he expected Balak would conquer, he accepted the bribe and repeated the guilt which procured it. If he expected the Israelites to conquer, he gave up all hope of dying the death of a righteous people, or of interest in their inheritance. In either case we do not wonder that the Jews regarded him as a thoroughly bad man, and that the early Christians called the sin of simony after his odious name.

(2.) Nero. This emperor of Rome, in the earlier part of his government, was restrained by the counsels of Seneca, and seemed likely to disappoint the gloomy expectations of the people. But he soon entered upon a career of infamous lust and crime. His mother, wife, and many other relatives, were put to death by him. Seneca was sacrificed to his jealousy.—Tacitus remarks that, after the murder of many illustrious personages, he manifested a desire of extirpating virtue itself.

Suetonius asserts positively that the burning of Rome that occurred in his reign was by his command. Tacitus thinks it uncertain whether this was by his order, or by accident; he says, however, that all Nero's efforts failed to quiet the general suspicion that he fired the city, and for this reason he charged the crime upon the Christians. There is no doubt that during the conflagration he sung the Fall of Troy to the music of the lyre, looking upon the scene from a tower.

Niebuhr regards this as simply showing that Nero was mad, though he says that after the murder of Aggrippina he "abandoned himself more and more to bloodshed, and delighted in it." Admitting that he was insane, the question still remains whether moral causes did not mainly produce his insanity; for all his derangement was apparently moral rather than mental. And if so, what proof have we that such a morbid and deeply seated disease of the soul might not end in its proper death?

I have met another solution of the rational difficulties in the way of Nero's salvation. A Universalist to whom I mentioned his playing while Rome was burning, thought that was rather a hopeful feature of the case. For Shakspeare has it,—

> "The man that hath no music in himself,
> Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
> Is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils."

But Nero evidently was not such a man, for he could sing. "So much the worse," said I, "for the common opinion is that he played the lyre just because Rome was burning." My friend was not so sure of that, and thought that as we all need charity we should have a little for Nero. This seemed to me like stretching the veil of charity to meet a case and cover a theory—until it was rent. The question remains: Was Nero so unmoved by the calamities of half the people, that he could enjoy the poetry of their blazing homes? If so, was he radically good or bad?

(3.) Cæsar Borgia. Ranke says of this ambitious son of Pope Alexander VI., "He had caused his brother, who stood in his way, to be murdered and thrown into the Tiber. His brother was attacked and stabbed on the steps of the palace by his orders. The wounded man was nursed by his wife and sisters; the sister cooked his food, in order to secure him from poison, and the Pope set a guard before his house to protect his son-in-law from his son: precautions which Cæsar derided. He said, 'What is not done by noon, may be done by evening.' When the prince was recovering from his wounds, Cæsar burst into his chamber, drove out the wife and sister, called an executioner, and ordered the unfortunate prince to be strangled . . . . He killed Peroto, Alexander's favorite, while clinging to his patron and sheltered by the pontifical mantle. The Pope's face was sprinkled with blood . . . . . Rome trembled at his name. Cæsar wanted money and had enemies; every night murdered bodies were found in the streets. Men lived in seclusion and silence; there was none who did not fear that his turn would come. Those whom force could not reach were taken off by poison."

There were, if possible, "greater abominations than these." The record of them is cited by Gordon in his Lives of the father and the son, in modest Latin, which may satiate the curious.

(4.) Colonel Francis Chartres. "Of immense wealth and of aristocratic connection, every effort was turned to the gratification of animal passion. Even in his old age, his body burned to a cinder, the fire of passion continued unabated. Utterly impotent in body, he pursued the shadow of the same lusts with the same energy with which he had pursued their substance." He was executed in the year 1730, at the age of seventy, for an attempt at rape. The following epitaph was written by Dr. Arbuthnot:

"Here continueth to rot the body of Francis Chartres, who, with an inflexible constancy and inimitable uniformity of life, persisted, in spite of age and infirmities, in the practice of every human vice, excepting prodigality and hypocrisy. His insatiable avarice exempted him from the first, his matchless impudence from the second. . . . He was the only person of his time who could cheat without the mark of honesty, retain his primeval meanness when possessed of ten thousand a year; and, having deserved the gibbet for what he did, was at last condemned to die for what he could not do."

Along with Chartres I may allude to Count Cenci, so abandoned to lust as to attempt the ravishment of his own daughter. The account of him may be found in a tale recently translated, "Beatrice Cenci." It is doubted by some whether so over true a story should be read.

(5.) Bertrand Bariere. This man is known to many of your readers from the account of him by Macaulay. Those who have read that account, I think, will not say that the French Revolution, with its Reign of Terror, made him what he was; but that he more than any other man made them what they were. Let those who have read say whether Macaulay is rash in his opinion "that Bariere approached nearer than any person mentioned in history or fiction, whether man or devil, to the idea of consummate and universal depravity." In him the qualities which are proper objects of hatred, and the qualities which are the proper objects of contempt, preserve an exquisite and absolute harmony. In almost every particular sort of wickedness he has had rivals. His sensuality was immoderate, but this was a failing common to him with many great and amiable men. There have been many men as cowardly as he, some as cruel, and few as mean, a few as impudent. There may also have been as great liars, though we never met with them and read of them. But when we put every thing together, sensuality, poltroonery, baseness, effrontery, mendacity, barbarity, the result is something, which in a novel we should condemn as caricature, and to which, we venture to say, no parallel can be found in history.

(6.) The perpetrator of the Three Memorable Murders, of whom De Quincey says:

"To an epicure in murder such as Williams, it would be taking away the very sting of the enjoyment, if the poor child should be suffered to drink of the bitter cup of death without fully apprehending the misery of the situation. . . . . The logic of the case, in short, all rested on the ultra fiendishness of Williams. . . . Our present murderer is fastidiously finical in his executions—a sort of martinet in the scenical grouping and draping of the circumstances in his murders. . . . Let the reader, who is disposed to regard as exaggerated or romantic the pure fiendishness imputed to Williams, recollect that except for the luxurious purpose of basking and revelling in the anguish of dying despair, he had no motive at all, small or great, for attempting the murder of the young girl. She had seen nothing, heard nothing—was fast asleep, and her door was closed; so that as a witness against him, he knew that she was as useless as any of the three corpses. And yet he was making preparations for her murder, when the alarm in the street interrupted him." Note Book, pp. 53, 54.

The "three corpses" do not mark the three murders, but the third murder.

The reader should also peruse De Quincey's essay on "Murder as one of the Fine Arts," in his volume of "Miscellaneous Essays." I quote De Quincey the more willingly, because, taking the common view of man's immortal nature, he seems to be a Restorationist.

I mention these examples, not because I would assume the divine prerogative of judgment upon the cases; I do no such thing. I do not assert that all or any of these apparently quite bad men are lost. I simply cite the facts of history respecting them, to show what may be true of their radical characters, and to show that in a human, and even a humane judgment of character, we are not warranted in asserting their final regeneration and salvation, as heirs of an "eternal weight of glory."

I need not multiply examples, for the argument does not turn on numbers. If it did, I think almost any one might name instances of apparently utter abandonment, or of persons in whom the religious faculty, once excited, had afterwards apparently died out. I have known such persons; and in each case the apparent death of the spiritual capacity could be directly traced to a deliberate resolve to please one's self out of the way of manifest duty, and that resolution was considered final, and was made in view of all supposable consequences, here or hereafter. Some points here raised will be considered more fully in my closing chapter; but this class of cases gives some support to a strict interpretation of the parable of the Sower. Such are the seed falling on stony ground, or among thorns; it is as if the soul had but one germ of religious vitality; and when this is quickened and fails to take root, or to become a radical and ruling principle, the proper life of the soul is expired forever.

The Scripture speaks of a sin against the Holy Ghost. Whether that is strictly unpardonable will be considered in the next chapter. But I may here give my view of the nature of it, to meet an argument that will doubtless be offered by my opponent, from the many cases of conversion of very hardened and abandoned men. I think that in all such cases there had been no flagrant sin against conscientious conviction. Either the law or the love of God had never been fully understood. The sense of duty or of mercy in all such cases comes with an original and fresh power, upon a heart before blinded, or upon feelings blunted by bad or even vicious habit, reaching for the first time the inmost core and centre of the nature, and inspiring there a spiritual and immortal life. So it was with Paul; fierce persecutor as he was, he had never disowned the principle of duty, though sadly, and not without fault, mistaken in the details of it. So it was with John Newton carrying on an active traffic in the persons of his fellow men, "ignorantly, through unbelief." My Universalist friends are very familiar with such cases, and I am glad of it. I wish my Orthodox friends knew them as well. They relieve our hopes of the degraded and the outcast, and rightly interpreted, they give fresh zeal to our efforts for fallen humanity. But ten thousand such cases do not relieve one instance of contempt of duty, and of mercy, and of man, and of God, deliberately cherished under the full blaze of the Gospel's blessed light; and I do believe there are such instances.

Jesus Wept.

O my blessed Savior, while my eyes grow dim with tears, and my heart is heavy with sorrow, I recall thy love and remember thy sympathy for a fallen race. Thou didst weep, oh, Son of the Highest! thine eyes were formed for tears, and in companionship with mortals thy griefs became too great for thy soul to contain. Thou knowest bitterness of spirit even unto tears. The scalding tides of sorrow have rolled down thy cheeks,—thou hast seen with eyes dim with tears the afflictions and woes of those whom thou didst love.

O, great High Priest! thou, who didst weep by the grave of thy friend, and over the city of thy foes, dost thou see us, thy weeping ones, who wait with tears and sighs for thy salvation? Hast thou felt our daily sorrows and known our nightly tears? Hast thou heard our sighs that have broken in and overwhelmed our prayers? Dost thou remember the days of thy sadness? Do Bethany and Olivet come up in memory, sprinkled with thy tears? Do Gethsemane and Calvary rise in view, crimsoned with thy blood? Yes, Savior, thou hast wept. Blessed be God for the record of thy tears. Thou knowest the bitterness of sorrow. O Christ, have pity on our tears. Great High Priest, we look to thee. Merciful Savior, have pity on us. Minister to us "the oil of joy for mourning and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Let us rest in thy love. O keep us from the sins that have made us to go out and weep bitterly in secret places. Save us from being swallowed up of overmuch sorrow. Deliver us from the sorrow of this world, that worketh death. Let thy love make us smile even amid our weepings, and rejoice amid our woes.

Lord Jesus, come quickly! Let thy weeping church find rest in glory. O make thy royal feast on Zion's hights, and wipe away tears from all faces. Bring thine elect to shine forever amid the glories of their Father's tabernacle, when it is with men, and thou shalt wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Courage, my fainting soul. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." O Lord, make my heart strong and joyous, so that my soul may wait for thee, more than they that watch for the morning." O Savior, pity those whose sorrows are deeper far than ours. Let thy Spirit whisper for their consolation—"Jesus wept!" H. L. B.

For the Crisis.

The Christian's Life

Is a cross-bearing, praying, watchful, laboring, diligent, sober, trying, self-denying life; a life of (light) afflictions, which work out "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Blessed be God, christians have a fore-taste of that "glory" now; for they have that peace of mind which is like a river, consolation sweeter than honey, happiness which the world knows not of, and a hope, which the world can neither give nor take away. This hope is like "an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast;" and to have this hope is greater riches than all the world! "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

What can we compare with the "glory" of the eternal world? There are pleasures in this life innumerable, charming and fascinating, but they are "temporal," can only be enjoyed for a little "season,"—the "end" of which is "death." The glories and honors of this world, also, are "temporal;" they fade away, leaving the vain seeker disconsolate and dissatisfied. But not so with the christian; his glory is unspeakable, his happiness ETERNAL. Although in this life he is a despised pilgrim and stranger, in the life to come he will "know as he is known," and "all things" are his; "and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away."

In this life the christian must suffer, suffer all things; but he bears it patiently, knowing that if he suffers here, he shall "reign" hereafter.

The christian's life is a holy, upright, honest, and happy life. He has access to every thing (right), even to the throne of Grace! "All things" are his. He may be deprived of everything in this world, yet he is RICH. He may be hated and despised by the enemies of righteousness, but his heart glows with pitying love towards them, for he is filled with the love of Jesus. He counts all loss as dross, that he may win Christ. He is "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," and is filled with the Holy Spirit; enough to make any man happy.

The christian's life is eternal life. It is God's gift to them, "who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life." And how long is eternity? Let every letter stand for a million of years which has been printed since the Press was invented, and that multiplied by the leaves of trees and shrubbery, which have grown since the world was created, and we've

> "No less days to sing God's praise,
> Than when we first began!"

Boundless eternity! And when shall these things come to pass? Christian! it is near, even at the very door! Has not the tribulation of those days ended? And has not the "sun" been "darkened," the "moon" also? and have not the stars of heaven fallen unto the earth, even as a "fig tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind?" Yes, these things are true. History records it as a fact, and Jesus said, that "This generation (the one that saw those signs) shall not pass away, till all things be fulfilled." Reader, can you say, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly?"

☞ "A christian man's life is laid in the loom of time to a pattern which he does not see, but God does; and his heart is the shuttle. On one side of the loom is sorrow, and on the other is joy; and the shuttle, struck alternately by each, flies back and forth, carrying the thread, which is white or black, as the pattern needs; and in the end, when God shall lift up the finished garment, and all its changing hues shall glance out, it will then appear that the deep and dark colors were as needful to beauty as the bright and high ones."

The Thief on the Cross.

The penitent thief said to Jesus, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom," (or, "with thy kingly power." Margin.) And Jesus said to him, "Verily, I say unto thee to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."—Luke 23: 43.

I am aware that this conversation between Jesus and the penitent thief has been commented upon, and if it is not yet worn out, I wish to give the result of my analyzation of the subject. A correspondent in the Crisis, a few weeks ago, made some remarks upon it, and as he did not take in all the ground that belongs to it, I propose to do so, thinking that, perhaps some one may be made to understand the thing better than I did before I received the light which I have now.

It appears, judging from the words of the imploring criminal, that he knew what Jesus had been preaching about, which was the "kingdom of heaven at hand," in which he should reign, after choosing his people, the "tried," "faithful," etc., leaving the rest to be condemned; and he—the penitent thief—wished Jesus to remember him when he should come with his kingly power to judge the "quick and the dead," and receive his people to himself. The thief wished to be one of those people; and, of course, when Jesus answered him, he responded to the very request made, for he said, "Truly, I say to you to-day, thou shalt be with me in Paradise,"—and he might have added, "when I come in my kingdom," but Christ was not in the habit of repeating words after his interrogators, so he did not repeat the thief's words. He did not ask Jesus to let his "soul" or "spirit" "go to heaven," or to the "world of spirits," or "spirit land," of which the Bible says nothing, but of which we hear so much in the churches of the present day. And why the thief did not ask for any part of him to go to that aerial region was, because he did not think of such a thing, for he believed what Christ had taught, viz.: that "if he went away he would come again," and deliver his people, raise the dead, etc. And Christ said to his disciples, "As I said to the Jews, whither I go, ye cannot come, so now I say to you."

The thief did not say—"when thou goest into thy kingdom," but he said "when thou comest," and Jesus answered him to the effect that he should be remembered then, and in his kingdom, in which will be the Paradise. Can any one say that Christ has yet come into his kingdom? Turn to Rev. 11: 15, and we find that occurrence is yet in the future. Then I infer that the penitent thief will have part in the first resurrection, and until that glorious morn he will not have his request granted; but then he surely will. Did not that thief die well? had he not good hope?

But why did Jesus put in that word "to-day"? Had he not used that word, there never would have been so much controversy about the circumstance. Many understand by the expression, that Jesus, and of course the penitent thief, went to Paradise, or heaven, that very day. Now, as has been observed, there is no proof that Jesus did go to Paradise, or heaven, or any other place on high, that day, but we have proof that he did not ascend to such a place; for after he had risen and appeared to Mary, he said to her, "I am not yet ascended to my Father." He did not expect to ascend to his Father on the crucifixion day, for, according to Matthew 12: 40 we find he said these words, "As Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." These were his own words, and he had reference to his burial, after he should be "stricken;" and we find that he was in the earth, in Hades, in a tomb, for three days and three nights. That does not look much like his being in Paradise, does it? Was it his "soul" that went to the desirable place? Just read in Isaiah, where the life of Christ is foretold, chap. 53: 10.—"Thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin." Then his "soul" was "poured out unto death."

"Now, if it can be made out, any way, that his "soul" was in Paradise or any other place than Hades, on that day, then, of course, his "soul" was not "poured out unto death,"—or, in other words—it did not die at all. In such a case it would not be death, but life. In Ps. 16: 10, we read, —"Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; (sheol;)" and from that we conclude that Christ's soul was in sheol (underground) for those three days and nights previous to his resurrection. If God made his Son Jesus' soul die, then should we not "fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in sheol?"—Matt. 10: 28.

But you say, perhaps, that you do not understand why Jesus should use this word "to-day," in reply to the thief, when he could have given his meaning as well without it, for it is a well known fact that Jesus did not use any words that had no meaning in his sentences. I think that those in his hearing knew why he used it. It was because he should not have another opportunity of giving the thief such a hope, for he knew he was dying and the penitent thief, also, and they did come [illegible] in a few minutes.

There were two rich men, in one room, sick with an epidemic disease, and both expected to be in the arms of death in an hour or two. One said to the other, "I am not prepared to die; I fear the love of riches has kept me so far from the Savior that I shall not be saved; riches are nothing now, for I must leave them where I got them." The other replied, "Well, we are both dying now, but I can tell you truly to-day, our riches will not avail us anything when we come to the judgment."

Now, did not Jesus use the word "today" in the same sense that the dying man above mentioned used it? Is it not plain that he did?

Paradise is not where Jesus is now, for he is at the right hand of his Father in heaven,—consequently the Savior had the future Paradise in view, when he answered the thief—which will be in the renewed earth, after the curse is removed from it, where Jesus will reign personally with his redeemed people.

Paul saw the future Paradise when he was carried away in a vision to the "third heaven," as he tells us in his second letter to the Corinthians, chap. 12: 2–4; for it is undoubtedly of himself that he there writes. He saw it in vision, as did John on the Isle of Patmos. I mention this because some advance it to prove the existence of a Paradise somewhere above, where good folks go when they die. S. D. B.

David, the Beloved.

"David, my servant, shall be king over them."—Ezek. 37: 24; Luke 1: 32.

The name David is defined "beloved,—the son of Jesse, the king of Judah and Israel, who was a great type of Messiah. It is taken for Christ himself, who was descended from the family of David.—Jer. 30: 9; Ezek. 34: 23–24; 37: 24–25." Cruden's Con. Its root is Dvd, pronounced Duvd, (or with v silent, Dud, u long) to love. The primary noun is Dud, sounded Dovd (or v silent, Dud)—"one beloved, a friend, lover"—in Canticles it occurs seventeen times. One slight variation makes it an uncle.—Lev. 10: 4. With a feminine termination it denotes an aunt. With one point varied again, it signifies pot, kettle, or basket, (because of the good dinner and delightful cheer it might contain, I presume.) DAVID is the same Dvd, with only other points for the vowels a and i. It signifies "beloved." Gesenius. Heb. Lexicon.

The word David occurs in Scripture about 800 times. Prophetically, it is applied a few times to the future king who shall reign over Israel, in Zion, executing justice and judgment in the earth. As the context decides the precise import of this and other terms,—though it usually applies only to David, the son of Jesse,—yet it has no more of Popish mystery in it than other pope's names. David was the darling of Jesse, the pride of Israel, and the beloved servant of the Lord; but there is no "[illegible] of darkness" about it. There is no [illegible] in this name David, as the designation of the blessed King, but much of light, love and life!

The whole purpose of God's [illegible] centred in David, the mighty conqueror, and Solomon, the peaceful ruler; and hence there should be no wonder if these [illegible] both adopted by the future king. The purpose of God will then contain [illegible] put down all opposing [illegible] David, and be the "[illegible] the Prince of Peace" [illegible] son." The mystery [illegible] simple [illegible] graph towards [illegible] will [illegible]

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER II.—(Concluded.)

ARE THERE RADICALLY BAD MEN?

4. Various examples, I think, confirm our fears that some men are hopelessly bad. And I shall not seek my examples among the lower classes of men, so often given over as past saving, by the élite of society. Here is one of the great corruptions that Christ came to rebuke,—the "respect of persons" or of outward appearances and advantages, which often make men really worse instead of better. Akin to this is the common condemnation of men because ignorant, sceptical, or unorthodox. So the Pharisees said—"This people, that know not the law are accursed." And in modern times the term "miscreant" has grown out of the same feeling that no man could be worse than a misbeliever, for that is the meaning of the reproachful word.—The mission of Christ, who made himself the "friend of publicans and sinners," was in part to condemn this false and pernicious method of judgment.

Here it may be urged that Christ extended his charity to all classes. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," was his dying prayer. But it may be fairly questioned whether the prime instigators and contrivers of his death were included in this petition of mercy. The account occurs in Luke 23: 33, 34: "And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors; one on the right hand, and the other on the left. Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." This condemnation may apply only to the Romans, who were the instruments employed by those who plotted his death, and to others who might fairly plead some excuse of ignorance. Luke tells us in the next verse, with two intervening statements, that "the rulers derided him," and though Christ felt no resentment or revenge, we cannot, in a strict interpretation of the passage, make the act of pardon cover the argument of my opponent.—Especially is this view discouraged by what Christ had before said to the class in question, "Ye have both seen and hated both me and my Father," and on another occasion, "If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth." With which agrees that of John, "There is a sin unto death; I say not that ye shall pray for it."

For examples of apparently bad men, then, I will name,

(1.) Balaam. This man, who had very important gifts of prophecy, seems after all to have had none of that charity or holy love without which one is nothing. He is pre-eminently an instance, and as such Bp. Butler has wisely selected him, of the power of man to act wickedly against the fullest conviction both of duty and of interest. He was well persuaded that Jehovah was the true God, and that one's highest welfare, if not the only salvation, was in his favor. "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel." (Num. 23: 23.) "There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth." (24: 17.) "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." (23: 10.) Such were his utterances in the rapture of the prophetic spirit. Yet this same man, for filthy lucre's sake, contrived a plan by which he should seduce the Israelites into idolatry, with its usual vices, so he might feel warranted in pronouncing upon them the curse which Balak wanted. If it be said that he did this, in the confidence that nothing could harm the Israelites,—as some have [illegible] the treason of Judas against Jesus,—[illegible] after the [illegible] was accomplished, and the [illegible] perished, and 24,000 of the Israelites had perished, he joined the army of Balak to meet their attack. If he expected Balak would conquer, he accepted the bribe and repeated the guilt which procured it. If he expected the Israelites to conquer, he gave up all hope of dying the death of a righteous people, or of interest in their inheritance. In either case we do not wonder that the Jews regarded him as a thoroughly bad man, and that the early Christians called the sin of simony after his odious name.

(2.) Nero. This emperor of Rome, in the earlier part of his government, was restrained by the counsels of Seneca, and seemed likely to disappoint the gloomy expectations of the people. But he soon entered upon a career of infamous lust and crime. His mother, wife, and many other relatives, were put to death by him. Seneca was sacrificed to his jealousy.—Tacitus remarks that, after the murder of many illustrious personages, he manifested a desire of extirpating virtue itself.

Suetonius asserts positively that the burning of Rome that occurred in his reign was by his command. Tacitus thinks it uncertain whether this was by his order, or by accident; he says, however, that all Nero's efforts failed to quiet the general suspicion that he fired the city, and for this reason he charged the crime upon the Christians. There is no doubt that during the conflagration he sung the Fall of Troy to the music of the lyre, looking upon the scene from a tower.

Niebuhr regards this as simply showing that Nero was mad, though he says that after the murder of Aggrippina he "abandoned himself more and more to bloodshed, and delighted in it." Admitting that he was insane, the question still remains whether moral causes did not mainly produce his insanity; for all his derangement was apparently moral rather than mental. And if so, what proof have we that such a morbid and deeply seated disease of the soul might not end in its proper death?

I have met another solution of the rational difficulties in the way of Nero's salvation. A Universalist to whom I mentioned his playing while Rome was burning, thought that was rather a hopeful feature of the case. For Shakspeare has it,—

> "The man that hath no music in himself,
> Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
> Is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils."

But Nero evidently was not such a man, for he could sing. "So much the worse," said I, "for the common opinion is that he played the lyre just because Rome was burning." My friend was not so sure of that, and thought that as we all need charity we should have a little for Nero. This seemed to me like stretching the veil of charity to meet a case and cover a theory—until it was rent. The question remains, Was Nero so unmoved by the calamities of half the people, that he could enjoy the poetry of their blazing homes? If so, was he radically good or bad?

(3.) Cæsar Borgia. Ranke says of this ambitious son of Pope Alexander VI., "He had caused his brother, who stood in his way, to be murdered and thrown into the Tiber. His brother was attacked and stabbed on the steps of the palace by his orders. The wounded man was nursed by his wife and sisters, the sister cooked his food, in order to secure him from poison, and the Pope set a guard before his house to protect his son-in-law from his son: precautions which Cæsar derided. He said, 'What is not done by noon, may be done by evening.' When the prince was recovering from his wounds, Cæsar burst into his chamber, drove out the wife and sister, called an executioner, and ordered the unfortunate prince to be strangled. . . He killed Peroto, Alexander's favorite, while clinging to his patron and sheltered by the pontifical mantle. The Pope's face was sprinkled with blood. . . . Rome trembled at his name. Cæsar wanted money and had enemies; every night murdered bodies were found in the streets. Men lived in seclusion and silence; there was none who did not fear that his turn would come. Those whom force could not reach were taken off by poison."

There were, if possible, "greater abominations than these." The record of them is cited by Gordon in his Lives of the father and the son, in modest Latin, which may satiate the curious.

(4.) Colonel Francis Chartres. "Of immense wealth and of aristocratic connection, every effort was turned to the gratification of animal passion. Even in his old age, his body burned to a cinder, the fire of passion continued unabated. Utterly impotent in body, he pursued the shadow of the same lusts with the same energy with which he had pursued their substance." He was executed in the year 1730, at the age of seventy, for an attempt at rape. The following epitaph was written by Dr. Arbuthnot:

"Here continueth to rot the body of Francis Chartres, who, with an inflexible constancy and inimitable uniformity of life, persisted, in spite of age and infirmities, in the practice of every human vice, excepting prodigality and hypocrisy. His insatiable avarice exempted him from the first, his matchless impudence from the second. . . He was the only person of his time who could cheat without the mark of honesty, retain his primeval meanness when possessed of ten thousand a year; and, having deserved the gibbet for what he did, was at last condemned to die for what he could not do."

Along with Chartres I may allude to Count Cenci, so abandoned to lust as to attempt the ravishment of his own daughter. The account of him may be found in a tale recently translated, "Beatrice Cenci." It is doubted by some whether so over true a story should be read.

(5.) Bertrand Bariere. This man is known to many of your readers from the account of him by Macaulay. Those who have read that account, I think, will not say that the French Revolution, with its Reign of Terror, made him what he was, but that he more than any other man made them what they were. Let those who have read say whether Macaulay is rash in his opinion "that Bariere approached nearer than any person mentioned in history or fiction, whether man or devil, to the idea of consummate and universal depravity." In him the qualities which are proper objects of hatred, and the qualities which are the proper objects of contempt, preserve an exquisite and absolute harmony. In almost every particular sort of wickedness he has had rivals. His sensuality was immoderate, but this was a failing common to him with many great and amiable men. There have been many men as cowardly as he, some as cruel, and few as mean, a few as impudent. There may also have been as great liars, though we never met with them and read of them. But when we put every thing together, sensuality, poltroonery, baseness, effrontery, mendacity, barbarity, the result is something, which in a novel we should condemn as caricature, and to which, we venture to say, no parallel can be found in history.

(6.) The perpetrator of the Three Memorable Murders, of whom De Quincey says:

"To an epicure in murder such as Williams, it would be taking away the very sting of the enjoyment, if the poor child should be suffered to drink of the bitter cup of death without fully apprehending the misery of the situation. . . The logic of the case, in short, all rested on the ultra fiendishness of Williams. . . Our present murderer is fastidiously finical in his exactions—a sort of martinet in the scenical grouping and draping of the circumstances in his murders. . . Let the reader, who is disposed to regard as exaggerated or romantic the pure fiendishness imputed to Williams, recollect that except for the luxurious purpose of basking and revelling in the anguish of dying despair, he had no motive at all, small or great, for attempting the murder of the young girl. She had seen nothing, heard nothing—was fast asleep, and her door was closed; so that as a witness against him, he knew that she was as useless as any of the three corpses. And yet he was making preparations for her murder, when the alarm in the street interrupted him." Note Book, pp. 53, 54.

The "three corpses" do not mark the three murders, but the third murder.

The reader should also peruse De Quincey's essay on "Murder as one of the Fine Arts," in his volume of "Miscellaneous Essays." I quote De Quincey the more willingly, because, taking the common view of man's immortal nature, he seems to be a Restorationist.

I mention these examples, not because I would assume the divine prerogative of judgment upon the cases. I do no such thing. I do not assert that all or any of these apparently quite bad men are lost. I simply cite the facts of history respecting them, to show what may be true of their radical characters, and to show that in a human, and even a humane judgment of character, we are not warranted in asserting their final regeneration and salvation, as heirs of an "eternal weight of glory."

I need not multiply examples, for the argument does not turn on numbers. If it did, I think almost any one might name instances of apparently utter abandonment, or of persons in whom the religious faculty, once excited, had afterwards apparently died out. I have known such persons; and in each case the apparent death of the spiritual capacity could be directly traced to a deliberate resolve to please one's self out of the way of manifest duty, and that resolution was considered final, and was made in view of all supposable consequences, here or hereafter. Some points here raised will be considered more fully in my closing chapter; but this class of cases gives some support to a strict interpretation of the parable of the Sower. Such are the seed falling on stony ground, or among thorns; it is as if the soul had but one germ of religious vitality; and when this is quickened and fails to take root, or to become a radical and ruling principle, the proper life of the soul is expired forever.

The Scripture speaks of a sin against the Holy Ghost. Whether that is strictly unpardonable will be considered in the next chapter. But I may here give my view of the nature of it, to meet an argument that will doubtless be offered by my opponent, from the many cases of conversion of very hardened and abandoned men. I think that in all such cases there had been no flagrant sin against conscientious conviction. Either the law or the love of God had never been fully understood. The sense of duty or of mercy in all such cases comes with an original and fresh power, upon a heart before blinded, or upon feelings blunted by bad or even vicious habit, reaching for the first time the inmost core and centre of the nature, and inspiring there a spiritual and immortal life. So it was with Paul; fierce persecutor as he was, he had never disowned the principle of duty, though sadly, and not without fault, mistaken in the details of it. So it was with John Newton carrying on an active traffic in the persons of his fellow men, "ignorantly, through unbelief." My Universalist friends are very familiar with such cases, and I am glad of it. I wish my Orthodox friends knew them as well. They relieve our hopes of the degraded and the outcast, and rightly interpreted, they give fresh zeal to our efforts for fallen humanity. But ten thousand such cases do not relieve one instance of contempt of duty, and of mercy, and of man, and of God, deliberately cherished under the full blaze of the Gospel's blessed light; and I do believe there are such instances.

Jesus Wept.

O my blessed Savior, while my eyes grow dim with tears, and my heart is heavy with sorrow, I recall thy love and remember thy sympathy for a fallen race. Thou didst weep, oh, Son of the Highest! thine eyes were formed for tears, and in companionship with mortals thy griefs became too great for thy soul to contain. Thou knowest bitterness of spirit even unto tears. The scalding tides of sorrow have rolled down thy cheeks,—thou hast seen with eyes dim with tears the afflictions and woes of those whom thou didst love.

O, great High Priest! thou, who didst weep by the grave of thy friend, and over the city of thy foes, dost thou see us, thy weeping ones, who wait with tears and sighs for thy salvation? Hast thou felt our daily sorrows and known our nightly tears? Hast thou heard our sighs that have broken in and overwhelmed our prayers? Dost thou remember the days of thy sadness? Do Bethany and Olivet come up in memory sprinkled with thy tears? Do Gethsemane and Calvary rise in view, crimsoned with thy blood? Yes, Savior, thou hast wept. Blessed be God for the record of thy tears. Thou knowest the bitterness of sorrow. O Christ, have pity on our tears. Great High Priest, we look to thee. Merciful Savior have pity on us. Minister to us "the oil of joy for mourning and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Let us rest in thy love. O keep us from the sins that have made us to go out and weep bitterly in secret places. Save us from being swallowed up of overmuch sorrow. Deliver us from the sorrow of this world, that worketh death. Let thy love make us smile even amid our weepings, and rejoice amid our woes.

Lord Jesus, come quickly! Let thy weeping church find rest in glory. O make thy royal feast on Zion's hights, and wipe away tears from all faces. Bring thine elect to shine forever amid the glories of their Father's tabernacle, when it is with men, and thou shalt wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Courage, my fainting soul. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." O Lord, make my heart strong and joyous, so that my soul may wait for thee, more than they that watch for the morning." O Savior, pity those whose sorrows are deeper far than ours. Let thy Spirit whisper for their consolation—"Jesus wept!" E. L. B.

Is a cross-bearing, praying, watchful, laboring, diligent, sober, trying, self-denying life; a life of (light) afflictions, which work out "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Blessed be God, christians have a fore-taste of that "glory" now; for they have that peace of mind which is like a river, consolation sweeter than honey, happiness which the world knows not of, and a hope, which the world can neither give nor take away. This hope is like "an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast;" and to have this hope is greater riches than all the world! "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

What can we compare with the "glory" of the eternal world? There are pleasures in this life innumerable, charming and fascinating, but they are "temporal," can only be enjoyed for a little "season,"—the "end" of which is "death." The glories and honors of this world, also, are "temporal;" they fade away, leaving the vain seeker disconsolate and dissatisfied. But not so with the christian; his glory is unspeakable, his happiness ETERNAL. Although in this life he is a despised pilgrim and stranger, in the life to come he will "know as he is known," and "all things" are his; "and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away."

In this life the christian must suffer, suffer all things; but he bears it patiently, knowing that if he suffers here, he shall "reign" hereafter.

The christian's life is a holy, upright, honest, and happy life. He has access to every thing (right), even to the throne of Grace! "All things" are his. He may be deprived of everything in this world, yet he is rich. He may be hated and despised by the enemies of righteousness, but his heart glows with pitying love towards them, for he is filled with the love of Jesus. He counts all loss as dross, that he may win Christ. He is "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," and is filled with the Holy Spirit, enough to make any man happy.

The christian's life is eternal life. It is God's gift to them, "who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life." And how long is eternity? Let every letter stand for a million of years which has been printed since the Press was invented, and that multiplied by the leaves of trees and shrubbery, which have grown since the world was created, and we've

> "No less days to sing God's praise,
> Than when we first begun!"

Boundless eternity! And when shall these things come to pass? Christian! it is near, even at the very door! Has not the tribulation of those days ended? And has not the "sun" been "darkened," the "moon" also? and have not the stars of heaven fallen unto the earth, even as a "fig tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind?" Yes, these things are true. History records it as a fact, and Jesus said, that "This generation (the one that saw those signs) shall not pass away, till all things be fulfilled." Reader, can you say, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly?"

☞ "A christian man's life is laid in the loom of time to a pattern which he does not see, but God does; and his heart is the shuttle. On one side of the loom is sorrow, and on the other is joy; and the shuttle, struck alternately by each, flies back and forth, carrying the thread, which is white or black, as the pattern needs; and in the end, when God shall lift up the finished garment, and all its changing hues shall glance out, it will then appear that the deep and dark colors were as needful to beauty as the bright and high ones."

The Thief on the Cross.

The penitent thief said to Jesus, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom," (or, "with thy kingly power." Margin.) And Jesus said to him, "Verily, I say unto thee to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."—Luke 23: 43.

I am aware that this conversation between Jesus and the penitent thief has been commented upon, and if it is not yet worn out, I wish to give the result of my analyzation of the subject. A correspondent in the Crisis, a few weeks ago, made some remarks upon it, and as he did not take in all the ground that belongs to it, I propose to do so, thinking that, perhaps some one may be made to understand the thing better than I did before I received the light which I have now.

It appears, judging from the words of the imploring criminal, that he knew what Jesus had been preaching about, which was the "kingdom of heaven at hand," in which he should reign, after choosing his people, the "tried," "faithful," etc., leaving the rest to be condemned; and he—the penitent thief—wished Jesus to remember him when he should come with his kingly power to judge the "quick and the dead," and receive his people to himself. The thief wished to be one of those people; and, of course, when Jesus answered him, he responded to the very request made, for he said, "Truly, I say to you to-day, thou shalt be with me in Paradise,"—and he might have added, "when I come in my kingdom," but Christ was not in the habit of repeating words after his interrogators, so he did not repeat the thief's words. He did not ask Jesus to let his "soul" or "spirit" "go to heaven," or to the "world of spirits," or "spirit land," of which the Bible says nothing, but of which we hear so much in the churches of the present day. And why the thief did not ask for any part of him to go to that aerial region was, because he did not think of such a thing, for he believed what Christ had taught, viz. that "if he went away he would come again," and deliver his people, raise the dead, etc. And Christ said to his disciples, "As I said to the Jews, whither I go, ye cannot come, so now I say to you."

The thief did not say—"when thou goest into thy kingdom," but he said "when thou comest," and Jesus answered him to the effect that he should be remembered then, and in his kingdom, in which will be the Paradise. Can any one say that Christ has yet come into his kingdom? Turn to Rev. 11: 15, and we find that occurrence is yet in the future. Then I infer that the penitent thief will have part in the first resurrection, and until that glorious morn he will not have his request granted; but then he surely will. Did not that thief die well? had he not good hope?

But why did Jesus put in that word "to-day"? Had he not used that word, there never would have been so much controversy about the circumstance. Many understand by the expression, that Jesus, and of course the penitent thief, went to Paradise, or heaven, that very day. Now, as has been observed, there is no proof that Jesus did go to Paradise, or heaven, or any other place on high, that day, but we have proof that he did not ascend to such a place; for after he had risen and appeared to Mary, he said to her, "I am not yet ascended to my Father." He did not expect to ascend to his Father on the crucifixion day, for, according to Matthew 12: 40 we find he said these words, "As Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." These were his own words, and he had reference to his burial, after he should be "stricken;" and we find that he was in the earth, in Hades, in a tomb, for three days and three nights. That does not look much like his being in Paradise, does it? Was it his "soul" that went to the desirable place? Just read in Isaiah, where the life of Christ is foretold, chap. 53: 10.—"Thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin." Then his "soul" was "poured out unto death."

"Now, if it can be made out, any way, that his "soul" was in Paradise or any other place than Hades, on that day, then, of course, his "soul" was not "poured out unto death,"—or, in other words—it did not die at all. In such a case it would not be death, but life. In Ps. 16: 10, we read, —"Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; (sheol;)" and from that we conclude that Christ's soul was in sheol (underground) for those three days and nights previous to his resurrection. If God made his Son Jesus' soul die, then should we not "fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in sheol?"—Matt. 10: 28.

But you say, perhaps, that you do not understand why Jesus should use this word "to-day" in reply to the thief, when he could have given his answer [illegible] did not use any words that had no meaning, in his sentences. I think that those in his hearing knew why he used it. It was because he should not have another opportunity of giving the thief such a hope, for he knew he was dying and the penitent thief, also, and they did cease breathing in a few minutes.

There were two rich men, in one room, sick with an epidemic disease, and both expected to be in the arms of death in an hour or two. One said to the other, "I am not prepared to die; I fear the love of riches has kept me so far from the Savior that I shall not be saved; riches are nothing now, for I must leave them where I got them." The other replied, "Well, we are both dying now, but I can tell you truly to-day, our riches will not avail us anything when we come to the judgment."

Now, did not Jesus use the word "today" in the same sense that the dying man above mentioned used it? Is it not plain that he did?

Paradise is not where Jesus is now, for he is at the right hand of his Father in heaven,—consequently the Savior had the future Paradise in view, when he answered the thief—which will be in the renewed earth, after the curse is removed from it, where Jesus will reign personally with his redeemed people.

Paul saw the future Paradise when he was carried away in a vision to the "third heaven," as he tells us in his second letter to the Corinthians, chap. 12: 2-4: for it is undoubtedly of himself that he there writes. He saw it in vision, as did John on the Isle of Patmos. I mention this because some advance it to prove the existence of a Paradise somewhere above, where good folks go when they die. S. D. B.

David, the Beloved.

"David, my servant, shall be king over them."—Ezek. 37: 24; Luke 1: 32.

The name David is defined "beloved,—the son of Jesse, the king of Judah and Israel, who was a great type of Messiah. It is taken for Christ himself, who was descended from the family of David.—Jer. 30: 9; Ezek. 34: 23-24; 37: 24-25." Cruden's Con. Its root is Dvd, pronounced Duvd, (or with v silent, Dud, u long) to love. The primary noun is Dod, sounded Dovd (or v silent, Dod)—"one beloved, a friend, lover"—in Canticles it occurs seventeen times. One slight variation makes it an uncle.—Lev. 10: 4. With a feminine termination it denotes an aunt. With one point varied again, it signifies pot, kettle, or basket, (because of the good dinner and delightful cheer it might contain, I presume.) DAVID is the same Dvd, with only other points for the vowels a and i. It signifies "beloved." Gesenius. Heb. Lexicon.

The word David occurs in Scripture about 300 times. Prophetically, it applies a few times to the future king who shall reign over Israel, in Zion, executing justice and judgment in the earth. As the context decides the precise import of this and other terms,—though it usually applies only to David, the son of Jesse,—yet it has no more of Popish mystery in it than other pope's names. David was the darling of Jesse, the pride of Israel, and the beloved servant of the Lord; but there is no "taint of darkness" about it. There is no darkness in this name David, as the designation of the blessed King, but much of light, love and life!

The whole purpose of God's [illegible] centred in David, the mighty [illegible] and Solomon, the peaceful ruler; and hence there should be no wonder if these [illegible] both adopted by the future king. The purpose of God will then centre in him. He will put down all opposing rule [illegible] David, and be the "greater than Solomon," the Prince of Peace,—God's "beloved son." The mystery [illegible] simple name has suggested this feeble paragraph towards dispersing it—if the Lord will—in our humble sphere.

Honesty.

In serving God a man must be honest. And as serving God is a work to be done among men, man, to serve God acceptably, must be honest. [illegible] nothing else will avail in the place of this element of right doing. No mental raptures or rhapsodies,—no fervors nor flames of affection,—no trumpet-blowing pretenses,—no insane professions, can supply the lack of fundamental honesty of soul.

The creed that aims to split the difference between serving God and mammon, the worldly wisdom that excuses mean tricks by the goodness of the cause they serve,—that perpetrates pious frauds for the purpose of cheating Satan and enriching the Lord, that does business in a selfish, mangled sort of manner, and hides all its faults beneath the sacredness and importance of the work to be done, may succeed for a while in the eye of man, but before God it cannot prosper. Nor is its prosperity permanent among men. The veil will sometimes slip aside. The dupes will get a glimpse of their deceivers, the day of reckoning will come, and it will be most severe upon those who have provoked the suspicions of those who have trusted them most implicitly. "Look you out seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom, whom we may appoint over this matter." Acts 6: 3. This was the injunction of those apostles who had before been fleeced by one who had by some means so secured their confidence that they allowed him to carry the bag, and to bear what was put therein, but yet who was a thief, who cared not for the poor,—who grudged the very ointment that Mary poured on Jesus' head, and this only that he might steal from its price—who finally sold his Lord for thirty pieces of silver, and learned at last in his horror and despair, that there were things in this world more precious than ill-gotten gain. The apostles were wise in their selection of seven men of honest report for the work of distributing the bounty of the church.

Such men have been and are still needed in all the departments of church and of state. The ancient Grecian who walked at midday with his lantern, "looking for an honest man," would, if he were here now, pass by many who have places of trust and responsibility before he found what he sought.

The kind of honesty which is in demand is not a mere legal honesty, for many of the veriest rogues in the world have all that. They slip through the meshes of the law. They keep outside of jail, and yet in reality they have no honesty about them. What is needed is honesty of soul. Honesty that shines in the whole countenance and that shows in the whole life. Honesty that is not a question of "the best policy"—but which is a question of immutable right. Honesty that is not based upon ignorance and credulity, and which renders its possessor a mere tool and dupe for cunning and crafty wire-pullers behind the curtain, but an honesty that is vigilant, intelligent, bright-eyed, and active, and which not only maintains its own position, but guards against the selfish schemes of others who plot to do wrong.

God's work demands such men in all its branches. God's abused people demand such men as agents to do their collective work. Treasurers that will not steal, officers that will not swallow half they handle; men that dare make a full exhibit of their proceedings before sworn foes as well as gentle hearted friends; men whose acts will bear counting and are open to it, men who prize something else better than dollars and cents; men who "walk honestly as in the day"; men who pay their debts, and whose word is as good as their bond; men whose acts inspire rather than impair confidence—and whose highest aim is to please God; men that can labor and wait for God to reward them; men that follow "whatsoever things are honest and of good report", men who exercise themselves to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man.

With such men as these to carry "the bag" it will not get empty without some return. Its contents can be traced as the path of a river is traced by the verdure on its banks. But with a Judas stealing from the treasury all the time, good people soon get discouraged about trying to earn wages to put in a bag with holes. As well might one fulfill the task of filling a leaky tub with water drawn from a deep well in a mine, as to satiate the demands of those children of the horse-leech, that only cry, "give, give" that they may consume the greater part of their gifts; whose zeal and benevolence, and self-denial, and earnest begging for, and interest in, "the cause" which they represent, sooner or later turns the bulk of its results to those culminating points in all their courses, their bellies and their pockets.

God give us honest men! Men that we can rely on to do their appointed work, neither crafty nor imbecile, but honest before God and man. O, for more of them everywhere. [illegible] H. L. H.

What is Wrong?

"Judge not that ye be not judged."—Matt. 7: 1.

"Why don't our ministers preach faith and repentance to the people instead of harping forever on doctrinal points?" "Why do they give us so much of the letter of the word, without the Spirit?" "We want gospel sermons from spiritually minded men!" Yes, and would it not be well if they were possessed of spiritual bodies also, that would need neither food or raiment? and wings, that they might at will glide swiftly through the air above our heads, and gently drop down among us just when we needed them, without having to endure the wear and tear, and cost of traveling by car and stage? If they had none of these natural things to care for and endure, would not some of them come to us every Lord's day with the glowing eloquence of an angel from heaven? and should we not listen to their preaching with rapture, saying to ourselves,—

> "Our willing soul would stay
> In such a frame as this,
> And sit and sing herself away
> To everlasting bliss?"

All this would be very nice! But under the present dispensation, our ministering brethren have literal bodies that must be cared for, and natures like our own, whose yearnings must in some measure be supplied before they can preach to us the gospel in all its fullness, sweetness, purity and love! They need the necessaries of life (to say nothing of luxuries,) and they must have them! And not only these, they need your sympathies and your prayers, if you withhold them, you wrong your brother and cheat your own souls! It is not enough that we say we love Jesus and his message, we should love for Christ's sake the messenger also: it is not for him alone to comfort the people of God; the people must comfort him in return.

Murmur not, dear brother and sister, if the man of God who breaks to you the "bread of life," should sometimes fail to bring before you the truth in such a manner as your fancy or judgment might dictate. Judge him not hastily! First search out the hidden causes, there may be many, and perhaps you can easily remove some of them. Search thy heart diligently and thine eye also, before you attempt to pick out the flaws in thy brother's sermons.

Think not that you are too small and weak to help or hinder his work. The humblest child of grace has a mission to perform, and if they will, they may by faith and prayer have power to move in his behalf the arm that moves the world! Whatever thy hand finds to do, do it with thy might, remembering it is written, "The liberal soul shall be made fat and he that watereth shall be watered also himself." "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth, and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." "Give, and it shall be given unto you, good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withall it shall be measured to you again."

When you have done all you can find to do for your pastor, go to the house of God and see if the fountains of his heart are not broken up, and the healing streams of gospel truth ready to burst forth from his lips and flow sweetly over your soul.

John 3: 13.

"And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven."

George Campbell, in his translation of the four Gospels, translates the latter part of this passage "whose abode is heaven." This accords with the revealed fact, that our blessed Lord was with God in the beginning, John 1: 1, and enjoyed glory with him "before the world was." John 17: 5. Heaven was, and is, his permanent abode until he shall personally reign on the earth; although he sojourned here a brief period, to suffer and die for our salvation, in accordance with the wisdom of God, antecedent to the glory which shall follow.

Pool's Continuators remark on the passage, "The participle on is of the preterimperfect tense, as well as the present tense," and consider "who was in heaven" a correct translation.

We have now examined the various renderings and meanings of the word rendered spirit in the Old Testament, and submit them for the consideration of the candid reader. If we have succeeded in leading any to a better understanding of the Scriptures and an increased interest in their study, with love for the truth, we would praise the Lord for the privilege; and, although some honest and even good men may shun our society and consider us heretics, we would still thank the Lord that we are counted worthy to suffer for the truth's sake. We have no misgivings in relation to the truth of the points taken, and, hence, can afford to bear scorn and reproachful epithets with a smile, while the peace of God rules within the heart.

In all the Old Testament, we have found nothing to teach us that man has an immortal spirit that will be conscious when he is dead. Why are we called infidel for rejecting what we cannot find taught in the Bible? We have not yet been shown a chapter and verse that teaches the conscious existence of any part of man after "the breath of life" has returned to God, who gave it; but we have found it most plainly and positively declared, that, when man's (ruakh) "breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts PERISH."

In our next we purpose to commence the examination of the New Testament on this subject.

Adulteration of Food.

"Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived."—PAUL.

The following is from the Knickerbocker,—"We find bread, for instance, compounded of potatoes, alum, beans, chalk, carbonate of magnesia, silicia, pipe-clay, bone-dust, plaster of Paris, sulphate of copper, etc.

Coffee is adulterated with chickory, roasted wheat, and beans, mangel-wurzel, acorns, etc. Tea is mixed with leaves of the beech, elm, willow, poplar, sand, starch, etc., and the dangerous auxiliaries, Venetian red, chrome yellow, carbonate and arsenite of copper, chromate and bichromate of potash, etc., are subsidized to give the counterfeit the requisite color."

"That which is sold for sugar, contains sand and plaster of Paris. Milk . . . is diluted with water and thickened with chalk, and in some instances with sheep's brains!"

"Snuff is compounded with chromate of potash and lead, ferruginous earths, red and white lead, carbonate of ammonia, lime and powdered glass."

The N. Y. Independent has an article on cheating and deception. In the closing paragraphs, the writer says.—

"Thus, false weights are given for true, short measures are marked for full; foreign names are put on domestic goods; facsimiles of genuine labels are pasted on spurious packages; deceptive brands are marked on barrels; false dies are stamped on cutlery; lying dates are registered on casks; old vintages are inscribed on new wines; over-values are checked on various goods; wrong names are continually given to a thousand articles in every department of trade, by which those who buy are continually deceived by those who sell, and by which the general morals of the mercantile community, as well as the standards of honor among individual men, are insensibly yet not the less inevitably impaired."

When we consider the fact, that many are still declaring that the world is growing better, and that the conversion of the world is at hand, it seems as though the people were still worse deceived in theology than they are in food and drink. If it were not for the fabled idea of the world's conversion, no doubt, many more would see the clear evidence that the world is growing wicked very rapidly, and that Jesus will soon come to gather the waiting bride.

The following from the New Bedford Mercury, gives a faint idea of the kind of millennium we may expect till Christ comes in person to establish his kingdom, and destroy the wicked. The writer says:—

As if in view of some great struggle like that now approaching, there has been a vast improvement in the kind of missiles used in war. The old-fashioned horse-pistol, calculated to sacrifice the unoffending quadruped on which its discharger was carried, has been superseded by Colt's, or other equine revolver, and the Minnie rifle will despatch a body of troops almost before they have come into sight. Then, we have the Armstrong gun, the name of whose inventor is appropriate, as this strong arm will carry a ball five miles that will still dance through the enemy's lines at that distance. Though we have spoken of this from a pacific position rather lightly, it is no joke to feel that your enemy can pop you over long before you can see his weapons, unless you use a telescope. Dr. Lardner advertises in the London papers that with the metal arsenium he can poison the air of a camp so that people will die if they remain there, and somebody else proposes to fire balls loaded with assafœtida into the enemy's quarters, which will speedily empty any garrison of its troops, provided with the ordinary olfactory proportions.

Present prospects intimate that there will soon be abundant use for all the horrid weapons of war, that christian (?) nations have been inventing while preparing for the world's conversion—truly its destruction. Let the faithful watchman sound the alarm, for the sword is coming. Let the christian warrior gird up the loins of his mind, watch and be sober. Thrilling events seem just ready to burst upon an astonished world buried in wickedness. Most have forgotten God and his word, and many even of the professed followers of Jesus cower before his foes, and manifest shame in the presence of the Lord's enemies. No man has more reason to be bold than the real Christian. "Stand up for Jesus."

Write Plainly.

It sometimes happens that we find it difficult to read all that our correspondents write: not because any of them cannot write well enough, but for the reason that they write carelessly. Be very particular to write your own address and all names of persons and places so plainly that no one can mistake in reading them.

Those who write for the Crisis should use good black ink, write in a very coarse, plain style, as the compositor wishes to read the manuscript some distance from the eyes, and will be saved many painful perplexities if these points be observed. Dot the i's and cross the t's. We have the very best compositors, but they are frequently much troubled to read portions of some manuscript. Please remember to "write in a very coarse, plain" manner, with good, black ink, and much oblige your ED. and COMPOSITORS.

For the Crisis.

To the Friends in Western New York.

A proposition has been suggested and briefly considered by some as to the expediency of holding a general Tent or Grove meeting in Western New York, this season. Honeoye, Conesus, Canadice and Springwater have been suggested as appropriate places.

An inquiry has arisen, whether it is best to call the meeting for the express purpose of discussing the questions of the coming and kingdom of our Lord, and of life and salvation only through His name; or of extending the call to all christians, of all views, and let each present his own, not for the purpose of debate, but irrespective of others. These are all grave questions, and should be thoroughly considered.

It is desirable to know the general wish of all interested in the subject, so far as may be. In order to this, some one or more must be the means of ascertaining the facts in the case. I have heard the names of several brethren mentioned, and will venture to add one or two more, who, it is hoped will act as a voluntary committee, to correspond with themselves and others and be able to state, at an early day, their judgment as to the expediency of holding such meeting, as to its character, and time and place. If the following brethren will act as such committee, it is believed they will confer a favor:

Bro. Ira Allen, Jr., Honeoye, Ont. Co., N. Y., Noah Tibbals, Canadice, Ont. Co., N. Y., Elijah Wetmore, East Springwater, Liv. Co., N. Y.; A. Wiley, Springwater Valley, Liv. Co., N. Y.; William Brown, Danville, Liv. Co., N. Y.

Will the friends who are disposed, please correspond with these brethren and express their views fully, that in a multitude of counsellors they may arrive at a wise and safe judgment. If a meeting of the kind is held, it is desirable to know it at an early date, that the necessary arrangements may be made. We should hope to remain together not less than a week.

All of which is respectfully submitted, at the instance of some who wish to know the minds of more. L. P. JUDSON.

QUERY.—Matt. 13: 38 reads thus:—"The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one." Will some please tell me, through the Crisis, if the children of the wicked one can become the children of the kingdom? or, in other words, can they that are tares to-day, become wheat to-morrow?

"Born Again."

"Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.—John 3: 3.

Verse 5. Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

From this language of our Savior we properly infer that man has once been born, which birth referred to, or implied by the expression of again, is natural and past; the other is spiritual and future. Man must be born (not converted) again, otherwise he cannot see the kingdom of God, and in order to enter into the kingdom of God, he must also be born of water. Much has already been said on this subject, and yet it has not been exhausted. The nature of this second birth is the question at issue. Is it conversion? Truly, a man must be converted, for the command of the Lord is: "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted," and, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." But does this conversion, this faith and repentance constitute the second birth? As natural birth is essential to temporal life, so a spiritual birth is essential to eternal life; therefore, as that which is born of the flesh is flesh, that which is born of the spirit is spirit. Conception, according to the natural man, must precede the birth, so a spiritual conception must also precede the spiritual birth. Now, if conversion is the spiritual birth, where is the conception?

How are men to become the partakers of the divine nature? As every generative being begets his own likeness and nature, in order to become a spirit man, as Christ says he is who is born of the Spirit, he must first be begotten by the word of truth, Jas. 1: 18, and Paul says in one place, "I have begotten you by my Gospel." And how is this begetting brought about? See Jas. 1: 21. "And receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls."

Now the reception of the word is the conception of the Spirit, which is the incorruptible seed, which not only imparts to the children of God eternal life, but constitutes them heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, because they are legitimate children of God, being the children of the resurrection, begotten by one Spirit, born of one Father, all partakers of one nature, the divine nature; thus are all such as shall be born of the Spirit, born again, not of corruptible seed, by the word of God, which is the seed of God that liveth forever and abideth in all his children, preserving them from sin. And upon this subject John predicates the declaration, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his (God's) seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. In this (birth) the children of God are manifest and the children of the Devil."—1 John 3: 9–10. Again 1 John, 5: 18,—"Whosoever is born of God sinneth not, but he that is begotten (or converted to God) of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." Amen.

Correspondence.

From B. J. Spaulding.

BRO. GRANT:—I should like to give you a history of one of my visits on the Islands, as a specimen of many. I called at a house, where I found things looking very slack indeed,—found a young man at the door. I began conversation with him, soon his mother came out, I told her I was a colporteur, had religious tracts and children's papers to circulate. "Should you like to read some?" I inquired. "What is the price?" "O, I give them away." "Are you a minister?" "No, not exactly, yet I do the same things ministers do; I give lectures on Bible subjects." "You are licensed, I suppose?" "No, not by men, but I have a license from God." Should you like some of the tracts? "Yes." "Would your children like some of my little books, and children's papers?" "Yes, I guess so." "Well, we will go in and see them." "No, they are very bashful." "Well, I can get access to them." "They will not talk with you." "Let me try it?" "O, it is of no use; they don't want to see you. Give me some of your little books for them, and I will give them to them." "No, I never give books to those I can't see." And she went about her work, and I continued to talk with the young man; he was very talkative, yet very ignorant. He said he did not know whether he was born to be saved or to be damned, "for, said he, "some are born to be saved, and some to be damned." His mother believed the same, and had taught the same to her son.

After the mother went in, I overheard her telling the children, "that man has got little books to give children." I continued talking with the young man for half an hour, when the door opened, and she invited me to come in. I went in and found her children all seated in a row on a bench, in serious attitude, as though they expected some great personage. There was every appearance both of poverty and negligence. A chair was placed for me,—I think the only one in the house, for I saw the woman bring in a four-legged stool for herself. There were six children. "What a pretty row of children," said I; you don't need to be ashamed of such children;" and I had taken out my books and cards, showing them to the youngest one. "Should you not like one?" "Yes." "Can you keep it clean and nice?" said I. "Yes." I gave him a Scripture card. "What is this one's name?" "John." "Well, John shall have one too; and here is one for this girl, and another for that;" and when I had got through in this way, I went through again, giving them the "Well Spring," and the "Youth's Guide," etc., and gave the mother some tracts; then began to give them exhortations. I had to be very simple indeed; told them about the great God and the blessed Jesus who died for us, exhorting them to love and serve him, and the children to obedience, and the mother to train them up aright. I proposed to pray, and sang—"Whither goest thou, pilgrim stranger?" While I knelt, they all stood attentively. Perhaps those children had never heard a prayer in their lives.—The novelty kept them still, and I felt the spirit of prayer; my feelings choked my utterance; I had to make very long pauses to recover myself, they all seemed to hold their breath with intense feeling, and drew a very long breath as I closed. O, I felt that God was there, the Holy Spirit was there.

Give me these family meetings, even among dirt, rags and ignorance; these things don't grieve away the good Spirit. Give me the tear of sympathy, joined with the prayer of faith, and the most simple truths of the Gospel to effect hearts; these family meetings, where everything is in its natural state, and the most simple truth is held forth in the most simple language. These are the meetings for me. Let me go among these ignorant ones, if I do see dirt and rags, where the Spirit runs freely, where I have to adapt myself to small capacities, where there is no sectarianism, and minds are candid.

I retired, feeling God had been with me, and that seed had been sown which would spring up and bear fruit to the glory of God. That young man walked with me, without an invitation, to hear instruction, and I felt that the good Christ was moving upon his mind. When he left I could but cry like a child; the scene I had witnessed was melting; my heart was as soft as wax, Praise the Lord! Bless his holy name!

The papers which have been contributed for me, namely, the "World's Crisis," "Well Spring," "Youth's Guide," "Sabbath School Advocate," "Myrtle," "American Messengers," and others, are well adapted here. They are received and read just as though they had never been read before. I feel grateful to the donors. I feel it a privilege to do this good work. I hope our friends will still make an effort to supply me in future with these papers. They may be left at the "World's Crisis" Office, or with Moses Corliss, of Lowell, or with my family at home.

My health is good, my spirits also. Praise the Lord.

BRO. GRANT:—Through the providence of God a few of the brethren and sisters were permitted to meet this (Saturday) evening, at the quiet residence of Bro. D. A. Grant's, for the purpose of prayer and exhortation. The good Lord met with us, as he has promised to do, even where but two or three have met in his name. The Spirit of the Lord brooded over the meeting, there was not a jarring string; the utmost harmony prevailed, and much brotherly love was manifested. Our prayer to God is, let brotherly love continue. Says the Psalmist, "Behold! how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." We felt strengthened by thus meeting together, and confessing our faults one to another. We felt encouraged by recounting the many trials and difficulties the Lord has brought us through, and still feel to trust Him, not casting away our confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. Our reward is but a little in the future. Already are the nations angry, for the great day of His wrath is about to come, the Savior will soon be revealed in the clouds of heaven, bringing our reward with him. O, let us watch and pray, that we may be counted worthy of receiving it.

Torrington, Ct., May 14th.

From Peter Axe.

BRO. GRANT:—I wish brethren coming to the West would give us a call. There are many here willing to investigate the doctrine of life through Christ. I think if some of the brethren would come and preach the word, there would be much good done. Should any feel disposed to come to Westchester, Jay Co., Ind., inquire for Peter Axe.

☞ Some men think that the gratification of curiosity is the end of knowledge; some the love of fame; some the pleasure of dispute; some the necessity of supporting themselves by their knowledge—but the real use of all knowledge is this, that we should dedicate that reason which was given us by God to the use and advantage of men.

☞ FORGIVENESS.—There is an ugly kind of forgiveness in this world—a kind of hedgehog forgiveness, shot out like quills. Men take one who has offended, and set him down before the blow-pipe of their indignation, and scorch him, and burn his fault into him; and when they have kneaded him sufficiently with their fiery fists, then—they forgive him.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS. WHOLE NO. 194.

For the Crisis.

Honesty.

In serving God a man must be honest. And as serving God is a work to be done among men, man, to serve God acceptably, must be honest with men. Nothing else will avail in the place of this element of right doing. No mental raptures or rhapsodies,—no fervors nor flames of affection,—no trumpet-blowing pretences,—no inflated professions, can supply the lack of [illegible] honesty of soul.

The craft that aims to split the difference between serving God and mammon, the worldly wisdom that excuses mean tricks by the goodness of the cause they serve,—that perpetrates pious frauds for the purpose of cheating Satan and enriching the Lord, that does business in a selfish, smuggled sort of manner, and hides all its faults beneath the sacredness and importance of the work to be done, may succeed for a while in the eye of man, but before God it cannot prosper. Nor is its prosperity permanent among men. The veil will sometime slip aside. The dupes will get a glimpse of their deceivers, the day of reckoning will come, and it will be most severe upon those who have provoked the suspicions of those who have trusted them most implicitly. "Look you out seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom, whom we may appoint over this matter." Acts 6: 3. This was the injunction of those apostles who had before been fleeced by one who had by some means so secured their confidence that they allowed him to carry the bag, and to bear what was put therein, but yet who was a thief, who cared not for the poor,—who grudged the very ointment that Mary poured on Jesus' head, and this only that he might steal from its price—who finally sold his Lord for thirty pieces of silver, and learned at last in his horror and despair, that there were things in this world more precious than ill-gotten gain. The apostles were wise in their selection of seven men of honest report for the work of distributing the bounty of the church.

Such men have been and are still needed in all the departments of church and of state. The ancient Grecian who walked at midday with his lantern, "looking for an honest man," would, if he were here now, pass by many who have places of trust and responsibility before he found what he sought.

The kind of honesty which is in demand is not a mere legal honesty, for many of the veriest rogues in the world have all that. They slip through the meshes of the law. They keep outside of jail, and yet in reality they have no honesty about them. What is needed is honesty of soul. Honesty that shines in the whole countenance and that shows in the whole life. Honesty that is not a question of "the best policy"—but which is a question of immutable right. Honesty that is not based upon ignorance and credulity, and which renders its possessor a mere tool and dupe for cunning and crafty wire-pullers behind the curtain, but an honesty that is vigilant, intelligent, bright eyed, and active, and which not only maintains its own position, but guards against the selfish schemes of others who plot to do wrong.

God's work demands such men in all its branches. God's abused people demand such men as agents to do their collective work. Treasurers that will not steal; officers that will not swallow half they handle; men that dare make a full exhibit of their proceedings before sworn foes as well as gentle hearted friends; men whose acts will bear scrutiny and are open to it; men who prize something else better than dollars and cents; men who "walk honestly as in the day"; men who pay their debts, and whose word is as good as their bond; men whose acts inspire rather than impair confidence—and whose highest aim is to please God; men that can labor and wait for God to reward them; men that follow "whatsoever things are honest and of good report"; men who exercise themselves to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man.

With such men as these to carry "the bag" it will not get empty without some results. Its contents can be traced as the path of a river is traced by the verdure on its banks. But with a Judas stealing from the treasury all the time, good people soon get discouraged about trying to earn wages to put in a bag with holes. As well might one fulfill the task of filling a leaky tub with water drawn from a deep well in a sieve, as to satiate the demands of these children of the horse-leech, that only cry, "give, give" that they may consume the greatest part of their gifts; whose zeal and benevolence, and self-denial, and earnest begging for, and interest in, "the cause" which they represent, sooner or later turns the bulk of its results to those culminating points in all their courses, their bellies and their pockets.

God give us honest men! Men that we can rely on to do their appointed work, neither crafty nor imbecile, but honest before God and man. O, for more of them everywhere! M. L. H.

For the Crisis.

What is Wrong?

"Judge not that ye be not judged."—Matt. 7:1.

"Why don't our ministers preach faith and repentance to the people instead of harping forever on doctrinal points?" "Why do they give us so much of the letter of the word, without the Spirit?" "We want gospel sermons from spiritually minded men!" Yes, and would it not be well if they were possessed of spiritual bodies also, that would need neither food or raiment? and wings, that they might at will glide swiftly through the air above our heads, and gently drop down among us just when we needed them, without having to endure the wear and tear, and cost of traveling by car and stage? If they had none of these natural things to care for and endure, would not some of them come to us every Lord's day with the glowing eloquence of an angel from heaven? and should we not listen to their preaching with rapture, saying to ourselves,—

> "Our willing soul would stay
> In such a frame as this,
> And sit and sing herself away
> To everlasting bliss?"

All this would be very nice! But under the present dispensation, our ministering brethren have literal bodies that must be cared for, and natures like our own, whose yearnings must in some measure be supplied before they can preach to us the gospel in all its fullness, sweetness, purity and love! They need the necessaries of life (to say nothing of luxuries,) and they must have them! And not only these, they need your sympathies and your prayers; if you withhold them, you wrong your brother and cheat your own souls! It is not enough that we say we love Jesus and his message; we should love for Christ's sake the messenger also: it is not for him alone to comfort the people of God; the people must comfort him in return.

Murmur not, dear brother and sister, if the man of God who breaks to you the "bread of life," should sometimes fail to bring before you the truth in such a manner as your fancy or judgment might dictate. Judge him not hastily! First search out the hidden causes; these may be many, and perhaps you can easily remove some of them. Search thy heart diligently and thine eye also, before you attempt to pick out the flaws in thy brother's sermons.

Think not that you are too small and weak to help or hinder his work. The humblest child of grace has a mission to perform; and if they will, they may by faith and prayer have power to move in his behalf the arm that moves the world! Whatever thy hand finds to do, do it with thy might, remembering it is written, "The liberal soul shall be made fat: and he that watereth shall be watered also himself." "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withall it shall be measured to you again."

When you have done all you can find to do for your pastor, go to the house of God and see if the fountains of his heart are not broken up, and the healing streams of gospel truth ready to burst forth from his lips and flow sweetly over your soul:

> If ye are blessed with earthly store,
> Give to thy brother part;
> If ye have naught but smiles to give,
> Bestow with liberal heart.
>
> A cheerful word of sympathy
> May scatter clouds away;
> One little act performed in love,
> Turns darkness into day!
>
> In justice and in faithfulness
> His burdens kindly share;
> 'T will waken thoughts within his mind
> That long have slumbered there.
>
> As Hur and Aaron raised the hands
> Of Moses when they failed,
> And stayed them through the weary day,
> That Israel might prevail.
>
> So must ye stay thy pastor's hands
> With godly life and prayer;
> Sustain him, and the truth will come
> With spirit and in power.

John 3: 13.

"And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven."

George Campbell, in his translation of the four Gospels, translates the latter part of this passage "whose abode is heaven." This accords with the revealed fact, that our blessed Lord was with God in the beginning, John 1: 1, and enjoyed glory with him "before the world was." John 17: 5. Heaven was, and is, his permanent abode until he shall personally reign on the earth; although he sojourned here a brief period, to suffer and die for our salvation, in accordance with the wisdom of God, antecedent to the glory which shall follow.

Pool's Continuators remark on the passage, "The participle on is of the preterimperfect tense, as well as the present tense," and consider "who was in heaven" a correct translation.

The Spirit.—No. 8.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

In this number we complete our examination of the word ruakh, which is rendered spirit in our motto.

21. Ruakh is rendered wind ninety-five times. "And God made a wind to pass over the earth." Gen. 8: 1. "The Lord brought an east wind upon the land all that day, and all that night, and when it was morning, the east wind brought the locusts." Ex. 10: 13. "And the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts." Ex. 10: 19. "And the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night." Ex. 14: 21. "Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them." Ex. 15: 10. "And there went forth a wind from the Lord." Num. 11: 31. "He rode upon a cherub, and did fly; and he was seen upon the wings of the wind." 2 Sam. 22: 11. "The heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain." 1 Kin. 18: 45. "A great and strong wind rent the mountains, and break in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake." 1 Kin. 19: 11. "Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain." 2 Kin. 3: 17. "Behold there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house." Job 1: 19. "Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind." Job 6: 26. "O remember that my life is wind." Job 7: 7. "How long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind?" Job 8: 2. "The east wind." Job 15: 2. "They are as stubble before the wind." Job 21: 18. "Make the weight for the winds, and he weigheth the waters by measure." Job 28: 25. "Terrors are turned upon me; they pursue my soul as the wind." Job 30: 15. "Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou causeth me to ride upon it." Job 30: 22. "The wind passeth, and cleanseth them." Job 37: 21. "The chaff which the wind driveth away." Ps. 1: 4. "He did fly upon the wings of the wind." Ps. 18: 10. "The dust before the wind." Ps. 18: 42. "Let them be as chaff before the wind." Ps. 35: 5. "Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind." Ps. 48: 7. "A wind that passeth away." Ps. 78: 39. "As the stubble before the wind." Ps. 83: 13. "The wind passeth over it, and it is gone." Ps. 103: 16. "Who walketh upon the wings of the wind." Ps. 104: 3. "He commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind." Ps. 107: 25. "He bringeth the wind out of his treasuries." Ps. 135: 7. "He causeth his wind to blow, and the waters flow." Ps. 147: 18. "Stormy wind fulfilling his word." Ps. 148: 8.

"He that troubleth his own house shall inherit the wind." Prov. 11: 29. "Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift is like clouds and wind without rain." Prov. 25: 14. "The north wind driveth away rain." Prov. 25: 23. "Whosoever hideth her, hideth the wind." Prov. 27: 16. "Who hath gathered the wind in his fists?" Prov. 30: 4. "The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits." Eccl. 1: 6. We have now examined the various renderings and meanings of the word rendered spirit in the Old Testament, and submit them for the consideration of the candid reader. If we have succeeded in leading any to a better understanding of the Scriptures and an increased interest in their study, with love for the truth, we would praise the Lord for the privilege; and, although some honest and even good men may shun our society and consider us heretics, we would still thank the Lord that we are counted worthy to suffer for the truth's sake. We have no misgivings in relation to the truth of the points taken, and, hence, can afford to bear scorn and reproachful epithets with a smile, while the peace of God rules within the heart.

In all the Old Testament, we have found nothing to teach us that man has an immortal spirit that will be conscious when he is dead. Why are we called infidel for rejecting what we cannot find taught in the Bible? We have not yet been shown a chapter and verse that teaches the conscious existence of any part of man after "the breath of life" has returned to God, who gave it: but we have found it most plainly and positively declared, that, when man's (ruakh) "breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts PERISH."

In our next we purpose to commence the examination of the New Testament on this subject.

Adulteration of Food.

"Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived."—Paul.

The following is from the Knickerbocker,—"We find bread, for instance, compounded of potatoes, alum, beans, chalk, carbonate of magnesia, silicia, pipe-clay, bone-dust, plaster of Paris, sulphate of copper, etc.

Coffee is adulterated with chickory, roasted wheat, and beans, mangel-wurzel, acorns, etc. Tea is mixed with leaves of the beech, elm, willow, poplar, sand, starch, etc., and the dangerous auxiliaries, Venetian red, chrome yellow, carbonate and arsenite of copper, chromate and bichromate of potash, etc., are subsidized to give the counterfeit the requisite color."

"That which is sold for sugar, contains sand and plaster of Paris. Milk . . . is . . . diluted with water and thickened with chalk, and in some instances with sheep's brains!"

"Snuff is compounded with chromate of potash and lead, ferruginous earths, red and white lead, carbonate of ammonia, lime and powdered glass."

The N. Y. Independent has an article on cheating and deception. In the closing paragraphs, the writer says:—

"Thus, false weights are given for true; short measures are marked for full; foreign names are put on domestic goods; facsimiles of genuine labels are pasted on spurious packages; deceptive brands are marked on barrels; false dies are stamped on cutlery; lying dates are registered on casks; old vintages are inscribed on new wines; over-values are checked on various goods; wrong names are continually given to a thousand articles in every department of trade, by which those who buy are continually deceived by those who sell, and by which the general morals of the mercantile community, as well as the standards of honor among individual men, are insensibly yet not the less inevitably impaired."

When we consider the fact, that many are still declaring that the world is growing better, and that the conversion of the world is at hand, it seems as though the people were still worse deceived in theology than they are in food and drink. If it were not for the fabled idea of the world's conversion, no doubt, many more would see the clear evidence that the world is growing wicked very rapidly, and that Jesus will soon come to gather the waiting bride.

The following from the New Bedford Mercury, gives a faint idea of the kind of millennium we may expect till Christ comes in person to establish his kingdom, and destroy the wicked. The writer says:—

As if in view of some great struggle like that now approaching, there has been a vast improvement in the kind of missiles used in war. The old-fashioned horse-pistol, calculated to sacrifice the unoffending quadruped on which its discharger was carried, has been superseded by Colt's, or other equine revolver, and the Minnie rifle will despatch a body of troops almost before they have come into sight. Then, we have the Armstrong gun, the name of whose inventor is appropriate, as this strong arm will carry a ball five miles that will still dance through the enemy's lines at that distance. Though we have spoken of this from a pacific position rather lightly, it is no joke to feel that your enemy can pop you over long before you can see his weapons, unless you use a telescope. Dr. Lardner advertises in the London papers that with the metal arsenium he can poison the air of a camp so that people will die if they remain there, and somebody else proposes to fire balls loaded with assefoedita into the enemy's quarters, which will speedily empty any garrison of its troops, provided with the ordinary olfactory proportions.

Present prospects intimate that there will soon be abundant use for all the horrid weapons of war, that christian (?) nations have been inventing while preparing for the world's conversion—truly its destruction. Let the faithful watchman sound the alarm, for the sword is coming. Let the christian warrior gird up the loins of his mind, watch and be sober. Thrilling events seem just ready to burst upon an astonished world buried in wickedness. Most have forgotten God and his word, and many even of the professed followers of Jesus cower before his foes, and manifest shame in the presence of the Lord's enemies. No man has more reason to be bold than the real Christian. "Stand up for Jesus."

Write Plainly.

It sometimes happens that we find it difficult to read all that our correspondents write: not because any of them cannot write well enough, but for the reason that they write carelessly. Be very particular to write your own address and all names of persons and places so plainly that no one can mistake in reading them.

Those who write for the Crisis should use good black ink, write in a very coarse, plain style, as the compositor wishes to read the manuscript some distance from the eyes, and will be saved many painful perplexities if these points be observed. Dot the i's and cross the t's. We have the very best compositors, but they are frequently much troubled to read portions of some manuscript. Please remember to "write in a very coarse, plain" manner, with good, black ink, and much oblige your Ed. and Compositors.

For the Crisis.

To the Friends in Western New York.

A proposition has been suggested and briefly considered by some as to the expediency of holding a general Tent or Grove meeting in Western New York, this season. Honeoye, Conesus, Canadice and Springwater have been suggested as appropriate places.

An inquiry has arisen, whether it is best to call the meeting for the express purpose of discussing the questions of the coming and kingdom of our Lord, and of life and salvation only through His name; or of extending the call to all christians, of all views, and let each present his own, not for the purpose of debate, but irrespective of others. These are all grave questions, and should be thoroughly considered.

It is desirable to know the general wish of all interested in the subject, so far as may be. In order to this, some one or more must be the means of ascertaining the facts in the case. I have heard the names of several brethren mentioned, and will venture to add one or two more, who, it is hoped will act as a voluntary committee, to correspond with themselves and others and be able to state, at an early day, their judgment as to the expediency of holding such meeting, as to its character, and time and place. If the following brethren will act as such committee, it is believed they will confer a favor:

Brn. Ira Allen, Jr., Honeoye, Ont. Co., N. Y.; Noah Tibbals, Canadice, Ont. Co., N. Y., Elijah Wetmore, East Springwater, Liv. Co., N. Y.; A. Wiley, Springwater Valley, Liv. Co., N. Y.: William Brown, Danville, Liv. Co., N. Y.

Will the friends who are disposed, please correspond with these brethren and express their views fully, that in a multitude of counsellors they may arrive at a wise and safe judgment. If a meeting of the kind is held, it is desirable to know it at an early date, that the necessary arrangements may be made. We should hope to remain together not less than a week.

All of which is respectfully submitted, at the instance of some who wish to know the minds of more. L. P. Judson.

For the Crisis.

Query.—Matt. 13: 38 reads thus:—"The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one." Will some please tell me, through the Crisis, if the children of the wicked one can become the children of the kingdom? or, in other words, can they that are tares to-day, become wheat to-morrow?

For the Crisis.

"Born Again."

"Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.—John 3: 3.

Verse 5. Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

From this language of our Savior we properly infer that man has once been born, which birth referred to, or implied by the expression of again, is natural and past; the other is spiritual and future. Man must be born (not converted) again; otherwise he cannot see the kingdom of God, and in order to enter into the kingdom of God, he must also be born of water. Much has already been said on this subject, and yet it has not been exhausted. The nature of this second birth is the question at issue. Is it conversion? Truly, a man must be converted, for the command of the Lord is: "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted," and, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." But does this conversion, this faith and repentance constitute the second birth? As natural birth is essential to temporal life, so a spiritual birth is essential to eternal life; therefore, as that which is born of the flesh is flesh, that which is born of the spirit is spirit. Conception, according to the natural man, must precede the birth, so a spiritual conception must also precede the spiritual birth. Now, if conversion is the spiritual birth, where is the conception?

How are men to become the partakers of the divine nature? As every generative being begets his own likeness and nature, in order to become a spirit man, as Christ says he is who is born of the Spirit, he must first be begotten by the word of truth, Jas. 1: 18, and Paul says in one place, "I have begotten you by my Gospel." And how is this begetting brought about? See Jas. 1: 21. "And receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls."

Now the reception of the word is the conception of the Spirit, which is the incorruptible seed, which not only imparts to the children of God eternal life, but constitutes them heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, because they are legitimate children of God, being the children of the resurrection, begotten by one Spirit, born of one Father, all partakers of one nature, the divine nature; thus are all such as shall be born of the Spirit, born again, not of corruptible seed, by the word of God, which is the seed of God that liveth forever and abideth in all his children, preserving them from sin. And upon this subject John predicates the declaration, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his (God's) seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. In this (birth) the children of God are manifest and the children of the Devil."—1 John 3: 9–10. Again 1 John, 5: 18,—"Whosoever is born of God sinneth not, but he that is begotten (or converted to God) of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." Amen. E. R. Southwick.

Correspondence.

From B. J. Spaulding.

Bro. Grant:—I should like to give you a history of one of my visits on the Islands, as a specimen of many. I called at a house, where I found things looking very slack indeed,—found a young man at the door. I began conversation with him; soon his mother came out; I told her I was a colporteur, had religious tracts and children's papers to circulate. "Should you like to read some?" I inquired. "What is the price?" "O, I give them away." "Are you a minister?" "No, not exactly; yet I do the same things ministers do; I give lectures on Bible subjects." "You are licensed, I suppose?" "No, not by men; but I have a license from God." Should you like some of the tracts? "Yes." "Would your children like some of my little books, and children's papers?" "Yes, I guess so." "Well, we will go in and see them." "No, they are very bashful." "Well, I can get access to them." "They will not talk with you." "Let me try it?" "O, it is of no use; they don't want to see you. Give me some of your little books for them, and I will give them to them." "No, I never give books to those I can't see." And she went about her work, and I continued to talk with the young man; he was very talkative, yet very ignorant. He said he did not know whether he was born to be saved or to be damned, "for, said he, "some are born to be saved, and some to be damned." His mother believed the same, and had taught the same to her son.

After the mother went in, I overheard her telling the children, "that man has got little books to give children." I continued talking with the young man for half an hour, when the door opened, and she invited me to come in. I went in and found her children all seated in a row on a bench, in serious attitude, as though they expected some great personage. There was every appearance both of poverty and negligence. A chair was placed for me,—I think the only one in the house, for I saw the woman bring in a four-legged stool for herself. There were six children. "What a pretty row of children," said I; you don't need to be ashamed of such children;" and I had taken out my books and cards, showing them to the youngest one. "Should you not like one?" "Yes." "Can you keep it clean and nice?" said I. "Yes." I gave him a Scripture card. "What is this one's name?" "John." "Well, John shall have one too; and here is one for this girl, and another for that;" and when I had got through in this way, I went through again, giving them the "Well Spring," and the "Youth's Guide," etc., and gave the mother some tracts; then began to give them exhortations. I had to be very simple indeed; told them about the great God and the blessed Jesus who died for us, exhorting them to love and serve him, and the children to obedience, and the mother to train them up aright. I proposed to pray, and sang—"Whither goest thou, pilgrim stranger?" While I knelt, they all stood attentively. Perhaps those children had never heard a prayer in their lives.—The novelty kept them still, and I felt the spirit of prayer; my feelings choked my utterance; I had to make very long pauses to recover myself; they all seemed to hold their breath with intense feeling, and drew a very long breath as I closed. O, I felt that God was there; the Holy Spirit was there.

Give me these family meetings, even among dirt, rags and ignorance; these things don't grieve away the good Spirit. Give me the tear of sympathy, joined with the prayer of faith, and the most simple truths of the Gospel to effect hearts; these family meetings, where everything is in its natural state, and the most simple truth is held forth in the most simple language. These are the meetings for me. Let me go among these ignorant ones, if I do see dirt and rags, where the Spirit runs freely, where I have to adapt myself to small capacities, where there is no sectarianism, and minds are candid.

I retired, feeling God had been with me, and that seed had been sown which would spring up and bear fruit to the glory of God. That young man walked with me, without an invitation, to hear instruction; and I felt that the good Christ was moving upon his mind. When he left I could but cry like a child; the scene I had witnessed was melting; my heart was as soft as wax. Praise the Lord! Bless his holy name!

The papers which have been contributed for me, namely, the "World's Crisis," "Well Spring," "Youth's Guide," "Sabbath School Advocate," "Myrtle," "American Messengers," and others, are well adapted here. They are received and read just as though they had never been read before. I feel grateful to the donors. I feel it a privilege to do this good work. I hope our friends will still make an effort to supply me in future with these papers. They may be left at the "World's Crisis" Office, or with Moses Corliss, of Lowell, or with my family at home.

My health is good, my spirits also. Praise the Lord.

Eden, Me., May 6th.

From L. L. Leach.

Bro. Grant:—Through the providence of God a few of the brethren and sisters were permitted to meet this (Saturday) evening, at the quiet residence of Bro. D. A. Grant's, for the purpose of prayer and exhortation. The good Lord met with us, as he has promised to do, even where but two or three have met in his name. The Spirit of the Lord brooded over the meeting; there was not a jarring string; the utmost harmony prevailed, and much brotherly love was manifested. Our prayer to God is, let brotherly love continue. Says the Psalmist, "Behold! how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." We felt strengthened by thus meeting together, and confessing our faults one to another. We felt encouraged by recounting the many trials and difficulties the Lord has brought us through, and still feel to trust Him, not casting away our confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. Our reward is but a little in the future. Already are the nations angry, for the great day of His wrath is about to come; the Savior will soon be revealed in the clouds of heaven, bringing our reward with him. O, let us watch and pray, that we may be counted worthy of receiving it.

Torrington, Ct., May 14th.

From Peter Axe.

Bro. Grant:—I wish brethren coming to the West would give us a call. There are many here willing to investigate the doctrine of life through Christ. I think if some of the brethren would come and preach the word, there would be much good done. Should any feel disposed to come to Westchester, Jay Co., Ind., inquire for Peter Axe.

☞ Some men think that the gratification of curiosity is the end of knowledge; some the love of fame; some the pleasure of dispute; some the necessity of supporting themselves by their knowledge—but the real use of all knowledge is this, that we should dedicate that reason which was given us by God to the use and advantage of men.

☞ Forgiveness.—There is an ugly kind of forgiveness in this world—a kind of hedgehog forgiveness, shot out like quills. Men take one who has offended, and set him down before the blow-pipe of their indignation, and scorch him and burn his fault into him; and when they have branded him sufficiently with their fiery flats, then—they forgive him.

For the Crisis.

Effect of the Christian's Hope.

"Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God: therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure."

The hope here spoken of as having this purifying effect is, "that when He shall appear, we shall be like him," and "see him as he is." Two things are particularly needful, in order to beget in us this hope; viz.: an expectation and a desire; for a man may have a strong desire for a certain favor, and yet his circumstances will not allow him to harbor the least expectation that it will be conferred upon him; consequently he cannot be said to hope for it. To desire to be like the glorious Messiah when he shall appear, we will need to be informed of the glories pertaining to his person so beautifully described by that disciple whom Jesus loved. Listen to it.—"And in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle. His head and his hair were white like wool, as white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire; and his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; and his voice as the sound of many waters; . . . . and his countenance was as the sun shining in his strength. And when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And He laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am the First and the Last; I am He that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore." Amen

Who would not desire that the Lord Jesus Christ should change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body? And that we may expect this favor, it is written, "God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "But as He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy. Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and evil speakings, as new born babes desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby; if so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope and glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Self-Examination.

Any truthful examination into our actions must be good; but we ought not to be satisfied with it until it becomes both searching and progressive. Its aim should be not only to investigate instances, but to discover principles. Thus, suppose our conscience upbraids us for any particular, bad habit; we then regard each instance of it with intense self-reproaches and long for an opportunity of proving the amendment which seems certain to arise from our pangs of regret. The trial comes, and sometimes our former remorse is remembered and saves us; and sometimes is forgotten, and our conduct is as bad as it was before our conscience was awakened. Now in such a case we should begin at the beginning, and try to discover where it is that we are wrong in the heart. This is not to be done by weighing any particular instance, and observing after what particular interval it occurred, and whether, with a little more or a little less temptation than usual. Instead of dwelling chiefly on mere circumstances of this kind, we should try to get at the substance of the thing, so as to be certain what fundamental precept of God is violated by the habit in question. That precept we should make our study; and there is more hope of a permanent amendment. E. R. R.

The Mormons. It appears that the movement being made with regard to the Mormons leaving the Continent is not a party one, and did not originate with politicians. It originated with certain shipping and commercial men in combination with Mormon chiefs. The plan is not yet matured, but it is highly probable that it will be within a short time. The principle of it is that the Mormons shall be paid for their improvements at a fair valuation, and that with these means they will be able to pay for their transportation to an Island of the Pacific selected for that purpose.

Noble Thoughts.—I never found pride in a noble nature, nor humility in an unworthy mind. Of all trees, I observe that God hath chosen the vine—a low plant that creeps upon the helpful wall; of all beasts, the soft and patient lamb; of all fowls, the mild and guileless dove. When God appeared to Moses, it was not in the lofty cedar, nor the spreading palm, but a bush, a humble, abject bush. As if he would by these selections check the conceited arrogance of man. Nothing produceth love like humility; nothing hate, like pride.—Ex.

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in Jesus, Feb. 5th, 1859, in Jersey county, Illinois, of consumption, Bro. John D. Wagoner, aged thirty years and six months.

He had for years made the Bible his companion. When in California, while others spent the Lord's day in idleness, amusements, drinking and gambling, he improved the time in reading the Book of books, and in meditation. His life was governed by divine laws.

He embraced much of the Advent faith when in health, and some time before the fatal, yet flattering disease began to undermine his firm constitution. In the last year of his life, he became decided upon the unpopular doctrine of the sleep of the dead and destruction of the wicked; and notwithstanding he knew his life was short, the consistency and harmony of the sacred Scriptures on these points, and the grandeur that encircled the resurrection, in connection with the glory that enshrouded Christ as he holds the keys of death and hades, and would soon use them in opening the graves and bringing forth the saints to immortality and eternal life, gave him strong consolation and calm resignation.

His affectionate wife died in Christ some five weeks before his death, of the same aggravating disease. Her sickness was of longer duration than his. Amid these great and severe trials he found the promises of God sure, and grace sufficient to endure them unto the end.

He had the consolation and care of kind parents, friends and medical aid, until, beneath the parental roof, his eyes, by a father's hand, were closed in death. He requested in his last days of sickness that the writer should preach his funeral sermon, and give the reasons of his hope, for the benefit of his friends. We chose the language of the Apostle Paul (1 Thess. 4: 18) for the basis of our discourse on the solemn occasion.

Bro. and Sr. W. have left a lovely little daughter, with many friends, to mourn their loss. May they be sustained in their affliction, united to Christ, live to his glory, and share life and immortality with the resurrected saints in the kingdom of God

W. Pratt.

Died, in Alganese, Mich., April 8th, 1859, our much esteemed and worthy Bro. John Wakeman, aged nearly sixty-eight years.

The subject of this notice formerly stood identified with the Methodist Episcopal church; but when the glorious proclamation of the kingdom of God and the personal coming of Israel's king fell on his ear, he joyfully and heartily received the message; and as his soul was enlarged by the reception of so many new truths, he found that he was under the necessity of identifying himself with a people cherishing the same blessed hope, with whom he walked, adorning his faith by a well ordered life and christian conversation, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming. This was, in short, his history during the last years of his pilgrimage, and until he quietly and peacefully fell asleep in Jesus, to await the fulfillment of the promises at the coming of our glorious Redeemer in the morning of the first resurrection. Although death, the great enemy of man, with hades, has gained a temporary dominion over this disciple of Christ, together with his believing wife, who died about two years since, it is a matter of unspeakable consolation to the relatives, and the church, that Christ will soon come and vanquish all his enemies, and redeem all his saints; when all the mighty host will join in singing "the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints."

The writer improved the funeral occasion, speaking from Rev. 15: 3.

Rest, dear brother, rest in slumber,
Until the resurrection morn,
Then arise and join our number,
Who thy triumphs shall adorn.

A. N. Seymour.

Died, in Hallowell, Me., May 3d, 1859, George H. Dunn, aged fifty-four years.

Bro. Dunn experienced religion when quite young, and united with the M. E. church; but in the year 1842, under the labors of Eld. H. Butler, he obtained that perfect liberty the gospel promises to them that believe. Soon after the advent doctrine was proclaimed in this place; he embraced it in full—the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked. He told me but a few days before he died, that his only hope was in the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the dead.

A more patient person in great distress and sickness I never saw. He retained his senses till the last, and died in the above hope, in great peace. Nicholas Smith.

Sister Nancy Kirk, of Springfield, Vt, while returning from a short visit to a neighboring friend, was thrown from the carriage, and so badly injured that she expired in a short time after. It was supposed the horse took fright from the thill being left out of its place, and letting the carriage upon the horse. She was a young lady of about twenty-five years of age. She has left a husband and a large circle of friends to mourn her loss. She left an evidence that she will have part in the first resurrection. Funeral attended by the writer. Sermon preached from 1 Thess. 4: 13–18.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Per steamship Canada. From Liverpool the 5th inst.

THE WAR.

Intelligence of a battle was eagerly expected, but nothing of moment had occurred.

The Austrians crossed the Po near Cambio, and advanced toward Sala.

They also made an unsuccessful effort to cross near Trassinetto. The Sardinian official Bulletin says of the latter that it commenced on the 3d, with a cannonade that lasted fifteen hours, which was recommenced on the afternoon of the 4th, and lasted the remainder of the day. The Piedmontese had only a few wounded, whilst the Austrians experienced much loss.

The Austrians commenced a cannonade from the direction of Valenza on the 3d, without effect.

A letter from Genoa says that all the Austrian vessels there had been seized by the Sardinians.

Within a fortnight it was expected that the French army in Sardinia would be 100,000 strong.

Considerable portions of the French artillery had not been able to cross the Alps, the passes being blocked with snow. The sufferings of the French troops in crossing are said to have been terribly severe.

It is reported that Prince Napoleon is to command a corps of 25,000 men, to be employed on the shores of the Adriatic.

The Turin correspondent of the Daily News positively asserts that France is about to mobilize between 700,000 and 800,000 men, and that the French army on the Rhine will amount to 700,000, as the Emperor does not believe that Germany will remain quiet. The same correspondent also asserts, that on the day the Emperor quits Paris he will address a solemn manifesto to Europe, espousing the cause of the Nationalities.

The London Herald's Paris correspondent says, it was whispered that immediately after the Emperor's departure, Paris would be placed under martial law.

The Emperor of Austria was preparing to take chief command with Gen. Hess. The latter is reported as disapproving of Gyula's plan of attack.

The citizens of Milan have been ordered to deliver up all arms in their possession.

Rome, May 5. Rome is most tranquil. The French troops are not to leave.

PRUSSIA.

The army has been placed on a war footing ready to march. The Finance Minister has moved the temporary addition for one year of 4,000,000 thalers to the income tax, the glass tax, and the taxes on corn.

THE RUSSIAN AND FRENCH ALLIANCE.

The Russian official journal of St. Petersburg contains the following:

"We are authorised to declare, in the most positive manner, that there exists no treaty of alliance, offensive or defensive, between Russia and any other power whatever. At a moment when all Europe is making maritime or military armaments on a large scale, the Emperor was obliged to provide, by means of political prudence, for any emergencies.

His Majesty retains, in the present conjuncture, entire liberty of action, and we hardly need add he is animated only by a sentiment of dignity for his crown and the interests of his country."

TURKEY.

The Times' Vienna correspondent says:—We are on the eve of a general rising in European Turkey. The political agitation in the Southern provinces is exceedingly great.

The Porte has about 120,000 men concentrated at Shumla, Sophia, etc., and Omar Pacha was coming rapidly from Bagdad. The writer thinks the Russo-French plan for the dismemberment of Turkey is a good one, and that in all probability the days of the Mussulman in Europe are numbered.

The following is the official letter of Prince Gortschakoff to the British government: "I do not deny that there may exist a written engagement between France and Russia, but I can assure you, in the most positive manner, that such arrangement contains nothing that, in the most distant manner, could be interpreted as constituting a hostile alliance against Europe. If Lord Malmesbury should be questioned on the subject, he may answer with confidence in the above sense, and I give you my personal guarantee that the declaration will not be falsified by the facts."

The Prussian government had resolved to put the army in readiness to march.

A great many failures are reported on the Stock Exchange. Wolf & Co., of Berlin, had suspended. A considerable failure was reported at Vienna. It is expected that the impoverishment and ruin at the Paris Bourse, this week, will be beyond all example.

The English naval dockyards and arsenals are in a great state of excitement. Preparations for war are being made on an extensive scale.

Per Steamship City of Baltimore. Five days later.

The Austrians apparently exhibited much indecision. They kept occupying places, and then abandoning them, and no material change in the aspect of affairs has taken place since the departure of the Canada.

A bulletin from Vienna explains that the Austrians had taken up a position between the Po and the Suzia rivers, to await better weather before resuming the offensive.

The Emperor and Prince Napoleon left Paris on the 10th, and the Empress Eugenia is proclaimed Regent during their absence.

The Sardinian General De La Marmora has made the river Dora his strategetical line.

The Austrians were fortifying their position on the river Suzia.

Gen. Canrobert is said to be directing the operations of the allies from Alessandria.

The Austrian army was suffering severely from sickness.

The Sardinians were preparing a grand reception to take place upon the entry of Napoleon into Genoa.

The Austrians expect to soon have three-quarters of a million men under arms.

Ancona has been declared in a state of siege by the Austrians, against which the Pope has protested, and the Austrian government was to take the subject into consideration.

The French force at Rome is to be increased and placed on a war footing.

Turin, May 11. The official bulletin published this morning, 10 o'clock, says: On reaching Vercelli's, the Austrians ceased the retrograde movements to-day: they made an excursion towards Porsara yesterday, with two batteries and ten carts. Thirty carts of the sick and wounded have returned to Novara, by Gravellona.

Rome, May 10. According to orders from Vienna, the state of siege has been raised at Ancona, and the lighthouse lit.

[From the London Times of May 8th.]

The war has commenced. Two great armies are arrayed almost face to face. The first blood has been shed, and the sound of Austrian cannon has aroused the echoes of the Appenines. As we write a great battle may be in progress, and as these words are being set up in type, the telegraphic wires may be employed in conveying intelligence of the result of the first conflict between the legions of France and Austria. The last chance of peace, the last hope of diplomacy the last dream of mediation have passed away. There is an end of forms and challenges, and the sword has been drawn from the scabbard, not to be sheathed until one of the Powers committed to the contest succumbs to the other, or until both are exhausted. The French and Austrian Ambassadors have respectively withdrawn from Vienna and Paris. War has been proclaimed between the two Empires in solemn form. The armies of Austria have crossed the Ticino and the Po, and have penetrated nearly to the centre of Sardinia . . . . We may doubt whether Napoleon III. is the right man to plant free institutions in Italy, but if he will enable the Italians to regulate their own affairs in their own way he will earn the thanks of Europe. If he has embarked in war with a view to conquest, or the gratification of dynastic ambition he will end in wreck and ruin. Let us give him credit for good intentions, and vigilantly watch the progress of events . . . . The people of England heartily desire to see the Austrians driven out of Italy, and will not raise a hand to help them . . . . We must arm for our defence, and place ourselves in an attitude to make invasion hopeless. We must augment our navy for the protection of our shores and our commerce, and we must have powerful fleets in the Mediterranean and in the Channel.

Later from Europe.—By arrivals at New York we have three days later news from Europe. It is reported that a battle had been fought between the Austrians and Sardinians at Motara, and the place taken by the former. Mortara is a walled town of about 6000 inhabitants, 25 miles northeast of Alessandria. The Lago-Maggiore, to which the Sardinians of Mortara retreated, is to the north. The king of Sardinia and the French Generals, Canrobert and Niel, had visited the lines on the Dora, which river is considerably to the westward, and has upon its banks the fortifications designed to intercept the Austrian march upon Turin.

The Emperor Napoleon was expected to join the army on the 3d inst. The Prussian government has resolved to put its army in readiness to march, and Turkey, we are told, is preparing for war. Failures have occurred among the stock brokers of Berlin and Vienna, and the ruin on the Paris Bourse is expected to be beyond example. Preparations for war are being made in England with all possible dispatch. Breadstuffs have taken another rise, and cotton is dull.—Boston Journal

Italian Volunteers.—Nearly all the Italians in London have left for the seat of war. Amongst others, Count Montemerli, who is well known in the artistic circles of this capital, is, we understand, about to join the movement which is so general over Italy. He has issued an address to his countrymen, and especially to the Lombard National Guard and the Tuscan Volunteers, whom he organized in 1848. He proposes the formation of a legion at Pisa in Tuscany, to be specially armed with six shot rifles, revolvers, and lances, and to be manœuvred upon a new principle entirely his own.

The Courrier de Marseille says that the report is again current that the Pope is likely to retire to Gaeta during the war between France and Austria, and it adds that "a member of the Sacred College, accompanied by two high ecclesiastical dignitaries, has hastily left Rome for Paris." The Gazette du Midi also announces the departure of these personages, and says that the object of their mission is to pray the two Catholic Powers not to carry their conflict into the pontifical territory.

Paris.—The Minister of Finance states in his report that the condition of the public treasury is most favorable, and that the resources at his disposal would allow him, without encroaching upon funds necessary for usual current services, to devote more than 300 million francs to war expenses.

Vienna.—The bank has suspended cash payments, but the measure has no importance save in a political aspect, and so far as it indicates a state of war. In a financial point of view it signifies nothing whatever, for cash payments have in reality been suspended by the bank for several weeks past.

SWITZERLAND.

Berne, Tuesday, May 10. According to advices from the frontiers of Lombardy the inhabitants of the Valtelline are making great purchases of arms and ammunition. A revolution appears imminent. The Austrians are making heavy demands. General Cialdini has captured both cattle and forage belonging to the Austrians.

ITEMS.

Louis Napoleon, when he was with his mother in Switzerland during his exile, which so embittered his feelings and gave him that iron outside he now wears, applied himself especially to the study of mathematics and artillery. After leaving this retreat, he wrote his treatise on the service of Artillery, and he is fully competent to direct the operations of this part of the army, which, in fact, he made the study of his life. He has, however, shown in most of his practical efforts an astonishing lack of common sense, but he will doubtless now avail himself of the services of the many able and experienced captains who have been in Algeria and the Crimea. Austria has spent all the present century in building up her military resources in Italy, and studying the tactics of the first Napoleon, in order when she was again attacked she might defend herself successfully. Verona, Piacenza, Mantua, and other fortified towns, are said to be models of military defence, and she has called into action all the possible resources of war that art and science could afford. Thus, all tends to show how fierce and fatal will be the approaching contest.—New Bedford Mercury.

Wilmer & Smith's Times of the 23d, in treating of the position of England, has the following remarks:—

"It is now evident that we are on the eve of a great European war—a deadly struggle, which will shake the continent to its centre. Thrones will totter and dynasties may disappear before peace returns."

Alessandria.—This place, the rendezvous of the Sardinian army, whither the king has gone to take command, is probably destined to play an important part in the coming war. It is a fortified city near the eastern frontier of Piedmont, whose guns bristle towards the Austrian territory. It stands in the midst of a sterile plain. It is the great stronghold of Piedmont, and is to the Sardinians what Gibraltar is to the English, or Sebastopol was to the Russians. During the reign of the French in Italy, the formidable fortifications made it one of the strongest places in Europe, but these were subsequently demolished, leaving only the citadel. Within the past few years, workmen have been busy in reconstructing them, in anticipation of the events now at hand. In the surrounding plain, two miles distant, is Napoleon's celebrated battle-field of Marengo. Alessandria is garrisoned with several thousand troops, and being connected with Turin and Genoa by railway, any number can readily be concentrated there. To capture it would be a crowning glory to the Austrian Generals, and to lose it, a deep humiliation to Sardinia.—Albany Journal, May 12th.

Mr. Finney in London.—For nearly two months the Rev. C. G. Finney, of Oberlin, Ohio, has been preaching at the Borough-road chapel, during which time he has delivered six sermons every week. The attendance has been well sustained throughout; and on Sunday evenings the chapel has been crowded. Mrs. Finney has also conducted a series of meetings for women in the afternoons, which have been productive of great good. Some of the results of these efforts were brought out at a social meeting convened on Monday se'nnight, for the purpose of giving an opportunity to those who have received benefit to make it known, for mutual encouragement and for the glory of God. From the statements that were made, it appears that the Divine blessing has attended the labors of Mr. and Mrs. Finney to a large extent. Before commencing in a new sphere, Mr. Finney now retires for a season of repose.

The Beginning of War's Destruction.—The bridge over the Ticino, at Buffaloria, destroyed by the Sardinians, by blowing up with gunpowder, was a magnificent structure of hewn stone, 1000 feet in length, and cost, even in that country of cheap labor, nearly $700,000. It rested on eleven arches, and was calculated to last forever without ever requiring any repairs.

Notices, &c.

Notice.

The Fifth Annual Conference of Adventists in Maine, will be held at Lincolnville Corner, commencing June 23d, Thursday, P. M., at 2 o'clock, and continue over the Sabbath. Several places have been mentioned for it, but this seems to be the most central and easy of access for the greatest number. Those who think of attending from the West, should give notice of their intention, that carriages may be ready for them at Camden Harbor, where they will land six miles from the meeting. They can come from Boston, or Portland, by steamer Daniel Webster, to Camden, and call on Bro. Blanding, near steamboat wharf, arriving Thursday morning, in season for the meeting. Others from various parts of the State will come by such conveyances as may be had, and call on Bro George McKenny at Lincolnville. We hope all Advent ministers in Maine, who wish to labor in the union and fellowship of the Gospel, for the good of the cause of our coming Lord, will come to this meeting. And as many other brethren and sisters as can well do so, come to pray, labor, advise, and counsel, unitedly, for the salvation of the lost, and the upbuilding of the saints, by spreading abroad the great truths of the Gospel.

N. Smith, Moderator.

Discussion.

We have received and accepted a challenge from Mrs. C. M. Tuttle, to discuss the following resolutions, in West Winsted, Ct., at Camp's Hall, commencing Tuesday evening, June 7th, at 7 o'clock, and continuing three evenings.

1. Resolved, "That man is naturally immortal, possessing the capacity to communicate with minds of this earth after his departure therefrom."

2. Resolved, "That the material body, called Christ, was not raised from the dead, consequently, the resurrection of man is also spiritual."

3. Resolved, "That Christ's kingdom is a spiritual one, and now it is being made manifest that Christ has already come."

"The argument to be based upon the Bible, reason, and facts."

Mrs. Tuttle is to speak in the trance state.

The Christian's Hope Realized.

[illegible]
Our [illegible] cast on an eternal shore!
[illegible] the earth containeth!
[illegible] the "New," we tread its plains!
[illegible] in its fountains lave,
[illegible] to this treasure gave,
[illegible] to all adieu!
[illegible] have ye to do with you,—
[illegible], these we leave without a sigh,
[illegible] now greets our eye,
[illegible] streams, and flowerets fair,
[illegible] blight their verdure rare,) [illegible] whereof makes glad
[illegible] God. Its banks are clad
[illegible], while Life's fairer tree
[illegible] each side, and yields its fruits so free:
[illegible] each month, most surely doth it bear,
Its healing leaves for health of nations are.
A glorious city, not prepared by hands,
But built by God, on twelve foundations stands,
With jasper walls, and street of purest gold,
Like crystal clear, its lustre can't be told!
Of pearl the gates, adorned with precious stone,
Such glory ne'er from monarch's palace shone!
Within it beams with glorious radiance bright,
God and the Lamb, its everlasting light.
Its gates are ever open, night and day,
And leading thereto is the King's "highway."
Where walk the saints, all clad with glittering white,
Extolling Him who is their chief delight.
High on his glorious throne is David's Son,
Who to himself the kingdom now hath won:
As sun, moon, stars, His throne shall be,—
Ever enduring as eternity!
Immortal saints unfading crowns do wear,
With in His throne possess an equal share;
His territory is Paradise restored,
Here will His name be evermore adored.
Such are the glories that before me lie,
On which I gaze with ever wondering eye;
But beauties now unknown I yet shall view,
Immortal, never fading, ever new;—
Undying forms alone could bear the weight
Of glories so exalted, and so great.

The Symbols.—No. 4.

REPLY TO BRO. F. ALLING.

This A. M. the questions of our beloved brother reached me, en route to my appointment; and though I have not the paper before me, I think the points in question are as follows:

I. There is no "yea and nay" to truth—"Thy word is truth"—and hence there is no real or even apparent contradiction in the Scriptural symbols themselves, nor in their inspired explanation. (The only "yea and nay" in the premises, therefore, lie in our limited views.)

II. If in my article (No. 3,) "the proof is plain" (as Bro. Alling admits) that the symbols are successive—if one alone must symbolize the prevailing Gentile power, during its allotted time; then that is the [illegible] view, and no general objection can possibly make it yea and nay; but all yea to the glory of God." Amen.

III. The thought of a "yea and nay" here, I presume, comes from confounding distinctive and diverse symbols. There is no [illegible] combination or essential connection between the symbolic "seven heads" and the dragon, the forty-two month beast and two-horned beast. Rev. 12 and 13. These represent the several stages of "the [illegible] or Romish system of Gentileism; while "the seven heads" are never chronologized and fitted on to them, so as to be counted in serial connection with them.

Note. It is this or a like assumption (as it appears to me) that suggests a contradiction or discrepancy. But the misapprehension will become apparent at once to our excellent brother himself, I trust, when I say that the idea denies the declaration of the angel—"Five are fallen, one is," (the 6th) etc. For if the "heads" are coincident and coetaneous with these three symbols, Rev. 12 and 13, then only "four had fallen, one is," (the 5th,) and the 6th would have been contemporaneous with the papacy, and the 7th with the two-horned beast!

But no! "The dragon" of Rev. 12 was coincident with the 6th head—the Imperial! It left only one to succeed, and not two, to suit the other two symbols. "The seven heads" are separate symbols, following in their own series, and never confounded, or even contemporaneous with other symbolic stages of the Romish system—civil and ecclesiastical.

IV. The imperial—"sixth head"—could then [illegible] with the symbol through the forty-two months, as well as any other "head." The contemporary "head" must be determined by other considerations than that of a mere succession of symbolic stages. There is no ground to believe that all the symbols are numerically synchronous; or that there are "seven" other general symbols of Romanism to synchronize with "the seven heads."

V. "The Assyrian" is the one designation of Gentile dominion through 2500 years. Isa. 10. Yet that is the expression of "the kingdom of man" on through all its varying symbolic forms, in Isaiah, Micah, Daniel, Zechariah, Paul and John, to "the kingdom of God." This shows that all symbols are not reduced to one series of [illegible], and hence we should [illegible] that if "the dragon" were the symbol of Rome during the Apostolic age, and the [illegible] existent sixth head, therefore [illegible] in Rev. 13 was the seventh! [illegible] Papal forms, as is oft assumed in association with these symbols. . . . Rome became christian, professedly, under Constantine, about A. D. 325; but the Popedom arose over 200 years subsequently. The imperial 6th head title was worn by Justinian A. D. 536. The dragon then (as a christian imperiality—not as Pagan) did "give his power, seat (Rome) and great authority" to the Popedom.

Note. If Justinian, a christian prince, could wear the proud title of the Cæsars (dragonic emperors) over 200 years after Constantine became christian; and decree the bishop of Rome to be "the head of all the holy churches;" and make his code of laws the basis of legislation for the Popedom 1260 years; then a like christian prince could wear the same (or a like) title at its close! Furthermore, it follows that the seventh head was not contemporaneous, but to succeed, and "continue a short space." (It would have been the very longest of all, on our brother's suggestion of making it synchronous with papacy 1260 years; or the symbol of Rev. 13: 1–10.)

This, in its connections, is a demonstration that the last—"the seventh head"—is to be filled only by the closing dynasty of Rome. Napoleon I. did adopt a new title, (after the abolition of the old Justinian or Imperial title, worn by the house of Hapsburg, in the time of Francis II. of Austria.) The Napoleonic dynasty must have a number as well as a name! There is no number for it save the seventh! "Was, is not, and yet is," applies to it most palpably.

The geography of this dynasty is French. The French is "the frog power;" and to crown the whole of this series of wonders, France is, in fact, the fountain of modern revolutions in the Roman world.

This is penned in haste, and in great respect for our brother. J. B. C.

Charity.—No. 5.

FRUITS OF CHARITY.

First fruits:—Long suffering and kindness. "Charity suffereth long and is kind." 'Tis like the patient christian slave under a merciless master or slave driver, doing with his might the task and work required of him, and submitting quietly to the indignities and insults imposed upon him,—praying to God his Maker and the Avenger of wrong, to pity and forgive the man who so illy treats him, and yet wisely avenge the wrong. 'Tis like the patient ox or horse under a cruel owner, which, overburdened, expends his strength and finally falls to the earth beneath his load; and receiving still the lash or goad most unmercifully applied, meekly and piteously turns his large bland eye upon his tyrant exactor, and seeming to say, O spare me, for I cannot perform the work you require of me. 'Tis like the innocent lamb dragged to the slaughter, and bleeds, and gives his life and flesh, to preserve the life of those who regard him of so little worth.

Such is charity, and such was the charity of Christ Jesus: "He was oppressed, and He was afflicted, yet He opened not His mouth. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth." "They took Jesus into the common hall, and gathered unto Him the whole band of soldiers. And they stripped Him, and put on Him a scarlet robe. And when they had plaited a crown of thorns, they put it upon His head, and his reed in His right hand, and they bowed the knee before Him, and mocked Him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! And they spit upon Him, and took the reed, and smote Him on the head. And after that they had mocked Him, they took the robe off from Him, and put His own raiment on Him, and led Him away to crucify Him." And He bearing His cross went forth into a place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew Golgotha, where they crucified Him." Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

"Charity suffereth long," and then, "is kind." O. R. Fassett.

For the Crisis.

Pray for all Men.

Bro. Grant:—I feel inclined to write a word in vindication of the "good deacon of the Baptist church," who "at a recent missionary meeting," prayed "for the conversion of the world." Perhaps the good deacon thought that when "the nations of the earth are muttering their threats at each other and preparing for war," it was the very time to pray that they might obey God's command to love one another.

We pray that "God's will may be done on earth as it is done in heaven." This is praying for the conversion of the world. Whatever may be the state of the world, we are to offer "supplications, prayers, intercessions for all men; for kings and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior; who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."—2 Tim. 2: 1–4.

Here we are taught an important principle, that we are to pray that men may be conformed to the revealed will of God in respect to their duty. God now commands all men to repent: it is their duty to repent immediately. It is our duty to pray that all men should do their duty, and love God and one another; and the more averse they are to do so, the more earnestly should we pray for them, for the greater is their danger of everlasting death.

Amid the dreadful developments of man's depravity throughout the earth, we may indeed rejoice that the Lord reigneth, and that he will cause the wrath of man to praise him, and ultimately overrule all things for his highest glory, and the best good of the intelligent universe. Yet is it our duty to weep over the rebellion and wretchedness of a fallen world. Whatever may be the destiny of the guilty and warring nations, our duty is to implore for them the divine mercy, in submission to the divine will. It was the revealed purpose of God to destroy Sodom; yet Abraham prayed that the city might be spared. The word of the Lord threatens terrible judgments against the present nations, especially such as have shed the blood of his saints. Notwithstanding, the same holy word commands us to pray for all men that they may "be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth." Our imperfect reason may offer some plausible objection, but we must not be wise above what is written by the spirit of truth.

God's commands to us are our rule of duty, not his predictions of what he will do.

A Thank Offering.

BY E. S. M.

For the many countless blessings
That are strewn along our way,
We would thank our Heavenly Father,
On this blessed Sabbath day.

For the sunshine, soft and pleasant,
For the breezes, mild and bland,
For each opening bud and blossom,
Fashioned by our Father's hand.

For the joyous birds that, singing,
Waken music on the air,
For each sign of power and beauty
Strewn around us everywhere.

For our pleasant hills and valleys,
For our broad and glorious sea,
For our peaceful homes and dwellings,
We would render thanks to Thee.

For our food and for our raiment,
For each kindred tie of love,
For our health and every blessing
Coming from Thy hand above.

For our sorrows we would thank Thee,
On our pathway to thy throne,
Knowing well the thorns that pierce us
Will but bring us nearer home.

But above all boons or blessings,
Whatsoe'er our want or care,
We would thank Thee, oh, our Father,
For the blessed gift of prayer!

Lightning-like, with speed unmeasured,
To Thy throne it wings its way,
And each heavy trust or burden
On a Father's breast we lay

Man or angel, king or peasant,
Each alike the gift may share,
And again we humbly thank Thee
For the priceless boon of Prayer!

"Be of Good Cheer."

So said the Captain of our salvation to his disciples! "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." Is there any music in these words, to revive thy drooping spirits in passing through the deep waters of affliction and sorrow? Ah, yes. There is a sound that comes over the billows of the stormy sea of life, louder than all howlings of the wind, lashing of the waves, or rattling of the thunder. It reaches the finest feelings of the burdened heart:—"I have overcome the world." "I have borne all thy sorrow." "In all thy afflictions, I was afflicted." "Be of good cheer."

Listen, hear, look to the Fountain of all wisdom and goodness, of all life and power, when the storm beats hard upon thee. When trouble almost overwhelms thee; when the clouds of darkness and dismay are about to encircle thee; when the gloomy pall of despondency is just falling over you to keep out the light from the throne, just then listen,—"Be of good cheer." Let thy heart ponder it. Remember Jesus speaks it. He speaks it to you,—"I have overcome the world," and it is for you. "I was tempted in all points like as you." Why? "Wherefore he is able to succor those that are tempted." Yes. "We have an High Priest who can be touched with the feelings of our infirmities." Suppose tribulation comes, Jesus said it would; but he added, "Be of good cheer." He is the one, "who, though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." He took our nature, lived our example, died our sacrifice, arose again for our justification. It is he who says, "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive forevermore. Amen, and have the keys of hell and of death."

Troubles may come, yes, they do come, they nearly overwhelm us; but this scene of tribulation will soon give place to a life more blessed and glorious. The voyage is nearly made, our reckoning is out, signs bespeak that land is near. Ah! our King said, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you." He is coming; then our sorrows and tribulation cease; pain is endured no longer; sickness is banished; our smaller foes are seen no more; death, the last enemy, is destroyed; then we can shout "Victory!" Then, children of sorrow and tribulation, remember, and "be of good cheer." I. C. Wellcome.

Rhode Island Conference.

Bro. Grant;—I wish to write a short account of our Providence meeting of the R. I. Conference. Bro. Burnham was here preaching for us at the time of the Conference. He came Monday, Mar. 27, and preached until Friday, April 1st. Various causes conspired to make the Conference, as a business meeting, appear like a failure. Some who would otherwise have been here were sick. Others, who perhaps thought they could not stay through the whole time, did not come till Thursday, (while the time appointed was Wednesday, March 30,) and when they reached the city, some of them inquired of some one that did not know, and were told the wrong time for the meeting, etc.; thus they did us no good. And one church, who did not seem to know their friends, as well as some would suppose they might in this little State where Brn. are so few, (and having the remembrance of some past conferences in their mind, of which conferences they can see the effects to-day,) were afraid to send any one to represent them, for fear that they would be brought into bondage, and so they kindly sent me a letter to inform me that they had rejected the conference. As we feared that there would be but few here, we concluded to adjourn, and in order to do so in order, we chose Bro. Jno. F. Dixon Moderator pro tem, Bro. Bellows not being present; after which we adjourned to meet Wednesday June 29, with the church at Carolina Mills, R. I.

On Friday, P. M., Bro. Jno. F. Dixon was publicly ordained, and we had a good time at the ordination. We do not expect to give up our conference, for we think that it is needed, and will be for good, and so we shall go on with it and trust that some of these days the Brn. in R. I. will see the utility of it. We wish all the churches to take pains to send delegates to help us along, and if any church don't know whether we wish to bring them into bondage or not, let them, if they please, send some one that they can trust to hear our proceedings and report to them the most Popish things we do.

Those who come, but cannot stay through, ought to come the first day with the rest, for if all are there promptly, we can do our business immediately, and then we shall not have to wait, and do nothing for a whole day, and when the business is done they can go if they must, and those that remain can go on with religious meetings. Brethren, come, and let us take hold unitedly to push the war to the enemy's strongholds.

Rest.

O for rest! When the heart is heavy, the hand weak, the head weary, the toil severe, the trial sore, and the pressure of care is bearing down upon the soul, I sigh for rest! But "I must not repine nor murmur at the hand of God." True, I can bear to be under the hand of the Lord," but when it comes to that I must bear "the foot of the Devil," then faith and patience have their trial. When the Sabeans and Chaldeans, the thunder-bolts and tempests come, stirred by Satanic malice to work the ruin of the servant of God, then it needs both faith and patience to endure the trial, and it causes the panting spirit to long for rest.

But peace, my soul! Thy Master bore the cross and endured the shame. His soul was "exceeding sorrowful even unto death," and he hid not his face from shame and spitting. He hath borne his cross and despised the shame, and endured all the woes that earth could heap upon his head. My soul, let him be thy pattern and thy trust. Thy fastings and thy faintings, thy pilgrim journeyings to and fro, thy tears of anguish, thy vexings with the spite and trickery of wicked men—all these are but the filling up that which is behind of the sufferings of Christ,—all thy sadness will only bring thee into deeper fellowship with him who was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." Thy tears excite the sympathetic love of Jesus who is "touched with the feeling of our infirmities"—not one of these tears are forgotten before the Lord. Not one sigh, not one pang but what he knows and pities.

"Whate'er the bruised spirit grieves,
No light distress will Jesus deem;
There's not a throb my bosom heaves
But stirs a kindred pulse in him.

Thrice welcome then shall sorrows be,
Though nature faint beneath the smart,
Since every pang supplies a key,
To open the Redeemer's heart."

Still my wearied soul cries out for rest! Rest for the wearied hand, the languid foot, the throbbing brow, the aching lungs, and, above all, the burdened heart, the weary soul! Unto thee, oh Lord, I turn. Weary and heavy laden I come to thee. O! to learn to rest in God. They that believe do enter into rest. Lord, I do believe! help my unbelief! O, let me enter into rest and fear no evil. O, make me to keep this Sabbath of believing rest in the light and joy of the living God. Amen. [illegible]

Selections.

Selected for the Crisis.

A Christmas Carol.

[Written by request for the scholars of the Whitby Cong. S. School.]

BY HARRIET ANNIS.

"It behooved Christ to suffer, and then to enter into his glory.—And now, little children, abide in him; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.—Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ."

An infant in a manger slept;
The dew-drops round his cradle wept;
No roof of man could give him rest—
No monarch claimed him as a guest—
But in the sky one brilliant star
Led Eastern Magi from afar;
And holy and love-breathing strains
Were heard upon Judea's plains.

Chorus.
A Hymn of Praise for Bethlehem!—a Cradle Song,
For Him who came to bear with us each human wrong!

Lo! One is hanging on the cross,
And counting life and "all things loss;"
Of God-like power, but human form—
Ah! can he, will he, brave the storm?
So holy, spotless, undefiled,
Is this the death of Bethlehem's child?
Oh! was there ever woe like thine,
Thou lonely treader of the vine!

Chorus.
A Hymn of Praise for Bethlehem!—a Cradle Song,
For Him who came to war with us Sin's fearful throng!

And must the Sufferer come again,
To bear the cross, the shame, the pain?
No! as a Conqueror in his might,
With burning flames and legions bright;
With opening earth and yielding sea,
The Advent of our Lord shall be.
He'll come with glory in his track,
To fetch his exiled children back

Chorus.
A Hymn of Praise for Bethlehem!—a Cradle Song.
To Him who'll come to waft us home to Canaan's throng!

Anecdotes Respecting the Bible.

There are a few anecdotes relating to the publication of the first authorized translation of the Bible, which are well worth recording, as demonstrative of the temper in which our ancestors received the blessing, and the use they made of it. A command was issued that every church should be provided with one of these folio Bibles. It was done; but the anxiety of the people, of such as could, to read the precious volume, and of such as could not, to handle and turn over the pages of that book, which they had been in the habit of regarding as a thing of mystery and prohibition, was so great, that it was found necessary to chain them to the desks. In a country church I have seen the very Bible, and the very chain preserved as relics, which three hundred years ago, attested the popular feeling on this subject. But so deeply rooted were the old prejudices of the governing authorities, that it was four years after the Bible was placed in the churches, before the king could be persuaded to revoke the decrees which forbade his subjects to have it in their private possession. At last they were graciously permitted by royal license, to purchase Bibles for their own reading at home. Then it was that every body who could afford it bought a copy of the Scriptures; such as could not buy the whole, purchased detached passages. A cart-load of hay was known to be given for a few chapters of St. Paul's Epistles. And many there were, who having learned to read in their old age, that they might have pleasure in poring over the written word, and reading with their own eyes the wonderful things of God, exclaimed with the prophet, "Thy words were found and I did eat them; and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of my heart." The crosses and public places often presented the moving sight of men, women and children, crowding round a reader who was rehearsing the songs of Zion, and the prophecies of the seers of Israel, or the tender discourses of the Redeemer of mankind.

One poor man, named John Marbec, was so desirous of making himself master of a Bible, that he determined to write one out, because he had not money enough to buy one; and when he had accomplished that laborious task, he set about the still more trying toil of making a concordance.

"They would hide the forbidden treasure under the floors of their houses," says Mr. Blunt, in his admirable "Sketch of the Reformation," which everybody should read, "and put their lives in peril rather than forego the book they desired; they would sit up all night, their doors being shut for fear of surprise, reading or hearing others read, the word of God; they would bury themselves in the woods, and there converse with it in solitude; they would tend their herds in the fields, and still steal an hour for drinking in the good tidings of great joy."

Such being the avidity with which the Scriptures were cherished, let the reader imagine the consternation which overwhelmed the pious of his country, when the capricious Henry reversed his former decrees in favor of Biblical learning, and threatened his people with imprisonment, confiscation and fire, if any below the privileged classes should presume to search the Scriptures. This terrible sketch of royal prerogative was confirmed by act of parliament in 1543; and it seemed like a seal of human folly and infatuation forced upon a tyrant king and a subservient senate, to refute future calumnies against Protestantism, and to be handed down to posterity as proof that the Reformation was carried on, not by the cold mechanism of state politics, but by the fervent zeal and undaunted devotion of holy men, in spite of kings and parliaments. Our Protestant forefathers would have been crushed, and their names and their labors forgotten, if the will of their temporal and spiritual rulers could have been accomplished. This proclamation of 1543 set forth that no books were to be printed about religion without the king's consent; none might read the Scriptures in an open assembly, or expound it, but he who was licensed by the king, or his ordinary. Every nobleman or gentleman might cause the Bible to be read to him in or about his house. Every merchant, who was a house-keeper, might also read it, but no women, [illegible], apprentices, journeymen, servingmen under the degree of yeomen, and no husbandman, nor laborer, might read it.

Such were the struggles of Protestantism! Nearly two hundred years after Wickliffe's translation first appeared, even after the authorized version was published and circulated, the king, who is falsely described by our opponents as the nursing-father of our faith, strove by every means with which absolute power invested him, to stifle the infant religion, which he is said to have engendered.

There is a curious document still in existence, which shows what was felt by the humble and lowly christians of that day, who were thought too degraded in intellect to be permitted to read in the Bible. It is in the form of a note, made by a shepherd in the spare leaf of a book, which he bought after the passing of the act above referred to:—"At Oxford in the year 1546 brought down to Seynbury, by John Darley, price 14d. When I kept Mr. Letymer's I bought this book, when the Testament was abrogated, that shepherds might not read it. I pray God amend that blindness. Writ by Robert Williams, keeping sheep on Seynbury Hill, 1546."—"Our Protestant Forefathers," by W. S. Gilly, D D.

A Wife's Influence.

Judge O'Neal, in the Yorkville Enquirer, tells the following of Judge Wm. Smith, of South Carolina:

"He had the rare blessing to win the love of one of the purest, mildest, and best of women, whose character has ever been present to the writer. He married Margaret Duff. In his worst days she never upbraided him by word, look or gesture, but always met him as if he was one of the kindest and best of husbands. This course on her part humbled him, and made him weep like a child. This sentence, it is hoped, will be remembered, was the language of Judge Smith to the friend already named, and to those who knew the stern, unbending character of the Judge, it will teach a lesson of how much a patient woman's love can accomplish. He was at last reformed by an instance of her patient love and devotion, as he himself told it:

"The evening before the return day of the Court of Common Pleas for York District, a client called with fifty notes to be put in suit. Mr. Smith was not in his office—he was on what is now fashionably called a spree—then a frolic. Mrs. Smith received the notes and sat down in the office to the work of issuing the writs and processes. She spent the night at work—Mr. Smith in 'riotous living.' At daylight, on his way home from his carousals, he saw a light in his office, and stepped in, and to his great surprise saw his amiable wife, who had just completed what ought to be his work, and with her head upon the table, and asleep. His entry awoke her. She told him what she had done, and showed him her night's work—fifty writs and processes. This bowed the strong man, 'he fell on his knees, implored her pardon, and then and there faithfully promised her never to drink another drop while he lived.' 'This promise,' says my friend Col. Williams, 'he faithfully kept,' and said the judge to him, 'from that day every thing which I touched turned to gold.' 'His entire success in life,' says Col. Williams, 'he sat down to his faithful observance of this noble promise.'

"No better eulogy could be pronounced on Mrs. Smith than has just been given in the words of her distinguished husband. The reformation of such a man as William Smith is a chaplet of glory which few women have been permitted to wear. To the people of South Carolina, and especially of York district, certainly no stronger argument in favor of temperance and total abstinence, need be given."

☞ It is not natural for a cow, nor any other female animal, to give milk when she has no young to nourish. The permanent production of milk is a modified animal function, produced by an artificial habit for several generations. In Columbia, the practice of milking cows having been laid aside, the natural state of the function has been restored. The secretion of the milk continued only during the sucking of the calf, is only an occasional phenomenon. If the calf dies, the milk ceases to flow.

About Ants.

Dear Children:—The wise man, Solomon by name, says, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise, which, having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest." It would seem rather humiliating to send man to a tiny ant, in order to receive instruction, yet she may teach them very valuable lessons by her example. She is very industrious in providing food during the summer and fall months, and she also manifests a great deal of wisdom, though so very small. I will tell you some stories that I have gleaned by the way, respecting the —— what shall I call it? of ants.

One day two little children wandered off into the woods on a tour of observation, to find something new and interesting, respecting which they could ask questions of their father in the evening. They roamed about until quite weary, and then sat down on a log which was partly decayed, that they might rest themselves. Pretty soon they espied some ants running about in various directions, all apparently very busy at work. Soon they observed one that seemed to be in great haste, and they concluded to watch its movements and see where it was going. So they carefully watched the little straggler, as it ran over or under the sticks and leaves, until at last it reached a small birch, and then it began to ascend the trunk. It went up until it came to one of the largest branches, then it turned off, and crept along to a cluster of leaves which were growing near its end, and then it stopped.

"What now?" said Robert; "has it met an enemy?" Emily, who was closely watching, cried out:

"Oh, Robert, Robert! here is a whole bunch of insects on those leaves, and I guess the ant has come to kill them."

Pretty soon the children saw the ant go close up to one of the insects and touch it carefully with its feelers or horns. After waiting a moment, it began to strike it more rapidly, and then the ant put its head down close to the side of the insect as if to bite it. It did so several times and then went away. On another part of the bush, they noticed that some of these insects made a jerking motion, by which a small drop of something was thrown from their bodies, which an ant immediately ran to and eat.

The children thought this was a very curious affair, and after they returned home, they told their father all about it, and he explained it to them thus:

"The little insects to which the ants appeared to be so attentive are called aphides, or plant-lice. They live upon the branches or leaves of plants. They are very social in their habits, that is, they live together like a society or family. These little insects are furnished with very small suckers, which they insert into the back of the tree or plant on which they live, and through which they are almost constantly drawing the sap. On each side of their body towards their back, is a small tube or hole, and after the sap which they have eaten has passed through certain changes it is discharged from these tubes. It is then very sweet and agreeable. This substance, whether it is milk or honey, ants are very fond of. Whenever they see a drop of it oozing from the sides of their little favorites they eat it off. On this account the aphides have been called ant's cows. What is most singular of all is, that when the ants are hungry, and none of this honeyed milk is to be seen upon their little cows, they know how to make them discharge it. In other words, they can milk their cows. It was this process which you saw this afternoon. The ants, with their long feelers or horns at first gently touch the aphides upon their sides or backs, as if caressing them. If the little insects do not take the hint, and discharge some sweet milk, the ants then pat them very rapidly first on one side, and then on the other. In a short time the aphides raise their hind limbs, and from tubes on their sides, a drop of the precious fluid oozes out, which the ants immediately consume. Some species of the ants carry the eggs of the aphides to their own nests, and there rear the young ones, that they may have them at hand to supply their wants. When they do this, they select a place where there are such roots as the insects can feed upon, and there build their nest."

Now do you not think, my dear children, that man may learn much from the teaching of the tiny ant? Aunt Mary.

Politeness.

A WORD TO GIRLS AND BOYS.

Young friends, are you polite, at all times, every where, to every body? Kind, courteous, affable, polished in your manners, refined in your behavior? Is it your aim always to please others by a careful attention to their wants and wishes? Is this the case, especially towards the aged and infirm? Trait, lovely, beautiful, praiseworthy. True politeness gives a passport every where, in the best society. To illustrate, we give you an example of a polite boy.

The other day we were riding in a crowded car. At one of the stations an old gentleman entered, and was looking around him for a seat, when a lad, ten or twelve years of age, rose up and said:

"Take my seat, sir."

The offer was accepted, and the infirm old man sat down.

"Why did you give me your seat?" he inquired of the boy.

"Because you are old, sir, and I am a boy," was the quick reply.

The passengers were very much pleased and gratified. For my part, I wanted to seize hold of the little fellow, and press him to my bosom. It shows a respect for age which is always praiseworthy.

Forgiveness.—A little girl five years old once said to her mother, "Do you know when I feel the happiest?" Her mother answered, "I suppose when you are good."

"No," said she, "but when I feel very sorry for having been naughty, and God has forgiven me."

How sweet it is to be forgiven!

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER III.

Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of man as a race, or of the good—or those who shall become good—as a class?

The Scriptural argument I shall divide as follows:

1. Is the proper immortality of man assumed in the Bible?
2. Is it involved or implied in the Bible?
3. What is the general tenor of Scriptural language respecting man's destiny?
4. The exegetical or analytic argument.
5. Do the phrases zoe aionios (rendered in our version "eternal" or "everlasting life," by Universalists "age-lasting" or "alonian life,") and its equivalent zoe eis ton aiona, imply immortal life?
6. If "aionian" life does not imply immortal life, then do any who fail of it finally attain immortal life?
7. The two Theodores. Change for Authorities.

§ 1. Is the proper immortality of man ASSUMED in the Bible?

Here at the outset we meet the question whether man is naturally immortal. We may call this the question of the immortality of the soul; or, if that phrase seems too technical and metaphysical, it is the more general question whether all human beings are destined actually and absolutely to an immortal life, without forfeiture or failure.

The older Universalists, as Winchester and Huntington, holding the old opinion that sin against an infinite God deserved endless woe, regarded eternal life not as of man's nature or desert, but as once forfeited and now bestowed as an act of grace. They held that all had been liable to "eternal death." And if we take this phrase in its literal sense, as signifying the loss of immortality, we should then have at once a doctrine of conditional immortality, and we should say nothing more about any absolute immortality of the soul or of man.

But modern Universalists, if I am not mistaken, do not allow any notion of forfeiture or of speculative contingency in respect to immortality. They say it would be either unjust to man or unworthy of God, that He should allow such a being as man by any possible means or supposition, fail of the immortality for which he was created. And in this view the word death, as used in the Scriptures, can have no reference whatever to the being of the soul, or to the loss of immortality, but it can refer only to the dissolution of the body, or to such a low moral or spiritual state as is, for the time, no better than death itself. Universalists at this day, I say, will hardly allow the idea of annihilation as a thought to be in any wise entertained. I may be mistaken; but I think the following criticism of my heterodox book, from my very good friend the Editor of the Christian Inquirer, (Dec. 19, 1857,) is only a strong statement of the real views of Universalists generally. The Inquirer says:—

"He admits the possibility of the annihilation of the soul of man, which argues a want of appreciation of its exceeding worth, its dignity, and divinity. We cannot but feel that any man who esteems the image of God at so light a figure that it could by any possibility of its earthly action, choice, experience, or condition, come within the verge of the shadow of annihilation, is not fitted to write upon the immortality of man. He speaks of what he does not know, and testifies of what he has not seen.—The creation points to man as the crown and completion of its long ages of change and refining development, the king and climax of its several departments of vegetable and animal growth. History and revelation confirm all that nature hints of the honor and greatness of the spiritual nature. To believe in the remotest contingency or possibility of the utter extinguishment of these souls, is to throw a disastrous eclipse over all those teachings and hopes they inspire, and destroy all moral perspective. If we admit that one soul will be annihilated, we admit that all souls may be; we lose the absolute certainty of its immortality; we begin to sink ever so little in a fathomless gulf of soulless and atheistic nonentity."

Abating the strong statement of the case, the above, I think, expresses the common view and sentiment of your readers. But if so, it cuts off all argument to prove the immortality of man, from two of the passages most relied on by Universalists. I refer to Rom. 5: 12–21, and 1 Cor. 15: 12–18. For it is manifest that if these passages teach the final salvation and actual immortality of all men, they equally teach that man has been subject to utter death, and liable to annihilation—the very thing which is held unjust to man or unworthy of God. Life and death are in these passages put in contrast. The death came by Adam; the life comes by Christ. If the life includes immortality, the death implies annihilation; and it follows that man is no more immortal absolutely, or by a strict nature, but by grace; by a regaining of what was lost; but by recovery of what was forfeit; by a redemption—a rescue from the jaws of the very monster which it is supposed has no place nor right in all the universe of God.

The only escape from this view that annihilation has been invited and confronted by man, is in supposing that Rom. 5: 12–21, and 1 Cor. 15: 12–58, refer not to life and death of man's being, but either, literally, of man's body, or, metaphorically, of his moral nature. The immortality of the soul is then no longer expressed or directly taught in those passages, but assumed and implied. So much for the present; what the passages do refer to, we will inquire hereafter.

Another important passage relied on to prove the final salvation of all is that in Luke 20: 35–38. And this is also relied on by some as explicitly declaring the immortality of all.—The phrase "Neither can they die any more," is applied to all mankind. But we need only remark that the expression, "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world," etc., is at least partitive in form; the whole passage taken alone would not suggest the immortality of all, but of a class only; the proof that it applies to all must be derived from other passages. Hence it is simply accurate to say that the immortality of all men is not here named, or explicitly taught.

Now Orthodox writers, in saying that "the immortality of the soul is rather assumed, or taken for granted, than explicitly revealed in the Bible," have been obviously consistent because they have not applied these three passages to all mankind. A single Orthodox writer, maintaining the immortality of the lost, has endeavored to show that the last named passage applies to all; but his attempt to relieve the silence of the Scriptures on the immortality in question only adds a manifest burden to the Orthodox argument; for he would have those elsewhere called the "children of the wicked one" here called the "children of God." What the passage means is to be seen hereafter.

But it will be found as really consistent for the Universalist to say that the immortality of the soul is not explicitly taught, but silently assumed in the Bible. For if he claims that it is taught in Rom. 5: 12–21, and 1 Cor. 15: 12–58, his argument, as we have seen, proves more than he admits, it proves too much.—Hence I think the Universalist labors under the same general difficulty with the Orthodox, respecting the profound silence of the Scriptures on a very weighty matter,—their utter failure to name the immortality of the soul as such, or the immortality of man as man. And I may therefore here repeat, with some variations, the argument I have published on this subject.

To propose the argument more distinctly I should say that I reserve two or three passages supposed to imply the immortality in question, for separate consideration. The point now urged is that man's immortality is nowhere either directly asserted or made the burden of a proposition, nor stated, mentioned, spoken of, or alluded to, in proper terms. As Olshausen says "the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the name are alike unknown to the entire Bible." Such expressions as to live or to exist forever, to be immortal, the immortal soul, etc., never occur in the Scriptures with plain reference to the nature of man or the destiny of the human family. If such be the doctrine of Scripture, it is not told, but quietly taken for granted and assumed.

For argument's sake I will admit this; and we will compare this supposed implicit doctrine of the Bible with another doctrine doubtless assumed in that volume, and with which the doctrine in question is often associated as one of the main pillars of all religious truth. I mean, of course, the doctrine of God's existence; which I say is assumed or taken for granted because it is never made the burden of a proposition. The doctrine of one God is sometimes asserted against that of many gods. And in one instance (Heb 11: 6,) where the nature of faith is the point in question, the existence of God appears in a subordinate statement, by which the doctrine is explicitly assumed.

Now I assert that we might expect these two truths to receive similar treatment in the Bible. For the questions of God's existence and of man's immortality are of precisely the same importance to man himself. Not of the same absolute importance to the Universe at large, for in that relation the eternal duration of a billion human souls might be only as a drop in the ocean, to the existence of an infinite and eternal God. And therefore, if the Universe had been divided into halves, ruled by two Gods, and the Bible were a volume of diplomatic documents and messages exchanged between the two deities, then we might suppose a bare allusion in it to the existence of the people of this earth, and nothing said whether they would all live forever. All nations are as the dust of the balance, compared with Deity. "He sitteth in the circle of the heavens, and the inhabitants of the earth are as grasshoppers before him." But the Bible is no such book of state papers, or of royal correspondence. It is not a majestic thundering, from Deity to Deity, uttered from Sinai to Olympus, or from nebula to nebula, in which the children of Adam might be overlooked and forgotten, but it is a special revelation from the Supreme God to the sons of Adam. And it is a revelation for their special instruction, and benefit and behoof, and so exclusively for them is it designed, that all the rest of the universe is put by it in the background, and it seems to make the earth the centre of the world, insomuch that its apparent meaning once imprisoned the reformer in astronomy, Galileo, and the star gazers can now tell us more about the universe than the Bible itself does. And this confined and exclusive character of the Revelation, with which geologists and astronomers have sometimes quarreled, is just and proper, because the dearest personal interests of man's immortality are as important to him as all worlds beside, and as the being of God himself. Whether God exists at all and whether man lives forever, are questions of equal moment to man. Hence I say that in the revelation of God's character and of man's destiny, these two doctrines, if equally true, should be treated alike, we should expect to find them on the same footing.

If, then, one of these cardinal truths is stated in the Bible explicitly and directly, we should expect the same of the other. If one is assumed implicitly and silently,—taken as a doctrine too clear for doubt and scarcely needing to be named, we should expect the same of the other.

But in fact these doctrines receive in the Bible the widest difference of treatment. That of the divine existence, as I have already remarked, is not directly asserted, but it is assumed as too clear for assertion. It is taken as a first truth of the religious consciousness, to prove which would be preposterous. The Bible never goes into debate with the Atheist. If one says in his heart, "There is no God," there is no help for him in logic. But while this truth is taken for granted in the Bible, so far from being tacitly assumed, it is named and alluded to in various forms of speech, continually. It stands out in bold relief, on almost every page. In two short books only it is not named,—Esther and the Song of Solomon,—and their inspiration has been questioned on that ground. In every other book this doctrine is the apple of gold in the picture of silver. It is the central truth, that makes the Bible a Discourse of God—the Word of God. It is the Shekinah that renders it sacred and "holy." And with manifold names, and expressions of the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, do the Scriptures invite men to the faith, love, and service of Him. If we strike out from the record those passages that tell of His being and His works, we reduce the dimensions of the volume almost by half, we make it a book without sense or meaning, we exchange its radiant light for midnight darkness.

But if we expugn from the same book all those passages in which man's immortality is expressly mentioned or unquestionably assumed, we leave the volume unchanged. It might have been written precisely as it is, and the revelation would have been just as complete as it is, if the sacred writers had agreed to ignore that doctrine now so much on the lips of men, or at least, to speak about it so obscurely that their words should settle nothing in the case.

Whence this contrast in the Scriptural treatment of these ideas? Will it be said that man's immortality is sufficiently clear to man's unaided reason? But that important truth ought to be exceedingly clear to human reason, which need not be named in a revelation. And if the more obvious truth is named less frequently because more obvious, then man's immortality should be as much clearer than God's existence as a thousand is greater than zero, for this is about the numerical ratio in which the truths are named.

No one will claim that the soul's immortality is so clear past all shadow or dream of doubt. But if we suppose, for argument's sake, that it is too clear to need explicit mention in the Bible, we only encounter a new difficulty. The Revelation which God should make to man is of necessity given in man's language; not only in a human dialect, but also in the current phrases of human speech, including many proverbial expressions. But if the immortality of men were so clear a doctrine of the human reason, it must be a most cherished sentiment, and must give rise to many familiar expressions—household words of natural theology. In fact, the doctrine has created various forms of expression that reveal the sentiment, wherever it has been believed. These now appear in the daily speech of Christendom, and we shall find them also in the old forms of Gentile philosophy. Why, then, are such expressions wholly avoided and unknown in the Bible? Why should the spirit of prophecy, that catches so readily the language of men, have failed to conform to their style of thought in this most important item of their own immortal nature? If man is born an heir of the future eternity, why is he not invited and encouraged to its suitable virtues by some mention of the fact? The gift of immortality is surely pre-eminently worthy of God's sacred mention to those who think and say so much of their supposed possession of the boon. Why has He not deigned to say a plain word about a nature in man which would be the chief element of the divine image in him?

Such are our difficulties, on the supposition that man's proper immortality is too clear to need mention in a revelation. Turning from the supposition to the facts, we only meet a new difficulty in the anxious doubts of long generations on this very question. Because man was made for immortality, we find in his fallen nature, through all history, some sentiment of the birthright he had lost. He finds himself subject to death, but he also finds, or thinks he finds, some remnant within him of that which is too good to die. Is death an eternal sleep? or, "if a man die, shall he live again?" This was the question of Ages. But when it came to be answered, and "life and immortality were brought to light," there was not a word said respecting the immortal nature of which there had been so much talk. He who "had the words of eternal life" never said that all men were to live forever. He never spoke of the life that he gave as an attribute or quality of some other essential life which men already possessed.

As I have remarked already, the Universalist will not probably claim that Christ gave immortality to all men, for this would imply that it had been lost. He will say rather that Christ revealed and gave assurance of what was already true. Thus a writer on 2 Tim. 1: 10 in the Universalist Quarterly, (vol. 2, p. 55,) says: "Immortality of some beings was brought to light; but not surely the immortality of angels or of beings in another sphere of action. It was the immortality of mankind. But this could not have been disclosed, unless it had been possessed as an inherent attribute of the soul, prior to its disclosure—before the appearing of Christ." But Christ never said that men are immortal. His own words are never such as to describe such an existing fact. And the expression "brought to light" does not require such an interpretation. It may as naturally signify that he pointed out the way of life; or that he showed that there is immortality for man, and how it may be gained. And this accords perfectly with the general tenor of his language. "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." "He that eateth of this bread shall live forever." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "Because I live, ye shall live also." Whether these and similar expressions cover the doctrine of immortality, I shall examine hereafter. But if they do, we see at once that they confirm my interpretation of the phrase in question.

And equally significant, it seems to me, is the silence of Paul respecting the immortality of the soul. It may be said that the Jews were too little philosophic, or too full of national conceit and prejudice, to think of such an immortality, good for all nations and all men.—But Paul surely suffered no such lack of culture, nor such narrowness. He was the Apostle of the Gentiles; and he who could quote the Gentile poets, and was even more a logician than a poet, could not have been so grossly ignorant of the Grecian philosophy as to know nothing of their doctrine of immortality. Why did he then, never speak of the immortality of the soul? If he thought that too abstract and metaphysical a form of thought, why did he not speak of an immortal nature in man? or of man as somehow immortal? Nay, if he thought the Greeks in the truth respecting a universal immortality, but in error respecting the nature or method of it, why did he not take special pains to recognize their half of the truth, and complete the doctrine by showing the connexion between its two parts? When some mocked at the mention of the resurrection of the dead, why did he not show that immortality did not at all depend on the resurrection? And when, in that most ample discussion in the 15th chapter of 1 Cor., he made a supposition of no resurrection, why did he say, "Then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished?"

The sum is this:—The Scriptures, given to reveal God's character and man's duty and destiny, speak of the divine existence many hundred times and in considerable variety of ways, but they speak of man's proper immortality, equally important to himself, never. And though the question had been long agitated among men, and the doctrine was incarnated in men's language, Christ, coming to illustrate the subject, said nothing of the doctrine. And Paul, whose education and mission pointed him out as the man to name and teach so great a truth, has failed to do it. The question arises whether the supposed taking for granted of man's immortality is not an assumption out of the Bible, and foreign to it.*

I think that my argument from the silence of the Scriptures respecting man's immortality receives additional force from some facts among the Spiritualists. They offer the spiritual manifestations as proving more than almost anything else the immortality of the soul. Those Spiritualists who reject the Bible will naturally regard its teachings as defective on this subject. But how is it with those who accept the Bible? I cannot speak from very general acquaintance or reading, but I have read enough to know that the following incident means something. The first lecturer on Spiritualism whom I have heard, told us that he had been a Methodist preacher. He found himself in trouble because he could not prove the immortality of the soul from the Bible. He told his perplexity to a friend, yet he found no relief, but aggravation of his difficulty, for his friend was in the same case. The friend, however, thought that what the church had always held must be true, and he must preach it indulging no private speculations on the subject. Our lecturer replied that God gave him the faculty of reason, and he did not dare to forego the use of it, he must think for himself. And he thought he could now prove the desired immortality, thus. Matter is eternal. Whatever produces material effects, is matter. The spirits do this. hence they are eternal; and the Bible, recognizing their existence, teaches thus the immortality of the soul.

The argument of our lecturer plainly proved a great deal too much,—a past eternal existence, as well as a future immortality, and that of all species of life. It was pretty straight Pantheism. Yet I doubt whether the lack of faith among Orthodox Christians in a Providence that could give immortal life to the worthy alone, or their reliance on immortality from some "nature of things," has not helped forward this modern style of Pantheism.

§ 2. Is the immortality of the soul IMPLIED in the Scriptures?

A truth which does not lie on the surface of an expression, or in the form of its words, may yet be very clearly contained or implied in it. Is the immortality of man thus taught in the Bible? A very few passages only need here to be considered.

Gen. 1: 26, 27. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. . . . So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him."

* This argument, from the persistent silence of the Scriptures respecting man's immortality, I regard as the main argument of my book; and it is so regarded by others. It is passed over in silence by three of my reviewers: D. N. Lord, Theological and Literary Journal, April, 1858; Dr. J. Strong, Methodist Quarterly Review, July, 1858; and Dr. A. Hovey, State of the Impenitent Dead. Another reviewer, Prof. E. P. Barrows, Bibliotheca Sacra, July, 1858, entirely misapprehends the argument; he proceeds as if I had in mind only the "immortality of the soul" in the technical or metaphysical sense, though I devote a paragraph (p. 162) to prevent such a misconception. I know the Professor too well to suspect him of an intentional ignoratio elenchi; but the ignoratio elenchi is manifest.

I think this can prove no more than the creation of man for immortality, of which, nevertheless, he might fail. I think the expression in the book of Wisdom, 2: 23, denotes just this: "God made man for immortality (ep' aphtharsia,) and to the image of his own nature made he him. But by the envy of the devil death came into the world." Some editions of the Apocrypha have the word eternity instead of nature; but this is a false reading of aidiotetos instead of idiotetos, which has been remarked by various scholars. And I think the context shows that the prospective immortality was, in the opinion of the Jews, cut off by the entrance of death. This appears more fully from the entire context, which I think signifies the immortality of the righteous alone.

"And they [the wicked] knew not the secrets of God, nor hoped for the reward of righteousness nor esteemed the honor of holy souls. For God made man for incorruption, and to the image of his own nature made he him. But by the envy of the devil death came into the world; and they follow him that are of his side. But the souls of the just are in the hand of God, and torment may not touch them. In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die, and their exit was reckoned a calamity, and their departure from us utter destruction; but they are in peace. For though in the sight of men they are punished, their hope is full of immortality."

This passage may be taken as showing how the Jews understood that in Genesis, and my view is supported by an expression in chap. 15, 3. "The just live for ever [eis ton aiona], and their reward is in the Lord."

And two expressions in the New Testamen seem to denote that the divine image in man is a moral likeness. Eph. 4: 24. "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." Col. 3: 10. "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him." From this we should not infer that actual holiness was concreated in man, for character can not be created by another. Rather, I should take it, man was made with a capacity and design for godliness, or godlikeness, and thus for immortality. Now that which is moral is primary and ruling, that which is physical is subordinate. If the godlikeness fails, the immortality may follow.

Gen. 2; 7. "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul."

Few of your readers, I presume, need to be told that the Hebrew phrase for living soul is in chap. 1: 30, applied to the brutes. And in Gen 7: 22, we have a still stronger expression. "All in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of lives (nishmath ruach chajim) died." In 1 Cor. 15: 45, the phrase is put in a contrast which directly intimates that Adam was not made absolutely immortal. "The first Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit."

Eccl. 3: 21. "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?"

This text would be unworthy of attention in this argument, if it were not so often adduced by many Orthodox people. I am happily ignorant of the Universalist treatment of it. Suffice it to say, the previous verse,—"All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again,"—and still more the 19th verse, sustains the view which takes it as a challenge: q. d. "Who knows whether the spirit goeth upward," etc. It is a piece of Solomon's scepticism, which proves Epicurianism and French Atheism if it proves anything. That it should get into a "Scripture Manual" as a proof-text that man will live as long as God does, shows either a sad state of traditional reasoning, or a great meagreness of Orthodox argument.

Eccl. 12: 7. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Here the Preacher speaks more as a moralist, and as the last two verses show, with some sentiment of piety. Yet his whole book yields scarcely a glimpse of immortality. The "judgment" named in verse 14, if after death, proves no eternal life. And the expression, "shall return to God who gave it," naturally denotes that the spirit reverts back to the disposal of the power that created it; and it may intimate a return to original nothingness. This view is strongly supported by an expression of Justin Martyr, treating this very question of immortality. He says,—"As the personal man does not always exist, and body and soul are not ever conjoined; but whenever this harmony must be dissolved, the soul leaves the body and the man is no more; so likewise, whenever it is necessary that the soul should no longer be, the vital spark leaves it, and the soul is no more, but itself returns again thither whence it was taken." (Dial. c. Trypho c. 6.)

Morning.

Above, below, what charms unfold
In all the varied view,
Before me all is burnished gold,
Behind the twilight's hue.
The mists which on old night await,
Far to the west they hold their state,
They shun the clear blue face of morning,
Along the fine cerulean sky
The fleecy clouds successive fly,
While bright prismatic beams their shattery folds adorn.

The World's Aspect.

The christian who surveys the present aspect of the world, must at once arrive at the conclusion that we live in a day of unprecedented crime and abounding evil. Without entering into its maddening details, it is sufficient to refer to the sure word of prophecy for evidence that the coming struggle is but the fulfillment of its predictions. The trouble seems to have commenced at the right place to complete the prophecies. But that which we have chiefly to do at present is, the clear and joyous light in which it presents the Rest that lies beyond the struggle, the glorious day, which is to break out of this long, long night.

It is an evident truth that we are awaiting the most terrible storm that ever desolated the homes of art and civilization; the vastness of the consequences delays the issue, the internal condition of the nations of Europe and Asia, and the mutual relations of these nations which are to be dragged into the world's quarrel, render it certain that every expedient of mediation will be exhausted for arresting the collision which will strew continents with ruin, convert the world into a battle-field, and join the horrors of civil war to the devastation of international slaughter; and whatever may be the order of the field, despotism will come up to meet the retribution of centuries of wrong; and the people enraged beyond endurance, will come to inflict it.

Let us, then, who fear the Lord, speak often one to another, draw closely together as a flock, let the glory that awaits us in a little time from this overcome all selfish and sectarian aims, that we may be united in the presence of common enemies and dangers, and, above all, united when our glorious King shall arrive. Handling the Word of God Deceitfully—Cor. 4: 2—No. 3.

In pursuing the subject of the deceptive use of Scripture, I may touch some in a tender spot. If so, let them learn to do better. It is my object to show the thing as it is, as a warning to those who do it, and an example for others to shun. If any find themselves portrayed and are not deceitful, they can plead ignorance or confusion, which is claimed by some to be the definition of Babylon.—Rev. 18: 2. Either is much more honorable and excusable than deception.

It has been often taught that it is sin to pray in public, or before the unregenerate, in a family, or in a public meeting. To prove this, Matt. 6: 6. is quoted, and great stress is laid on "entering into thy closet," and, "thy Father which seeth in secret." All this is done to prove it wicked to pray in the public meeting of saints and sinners. But, say they, it reads, "Enter into thy closet." Yes, but does it say you must not pray also in public meetings, in the family circle, by the sick and dying, and anywhere when help is needed from the Lord? "But, we must follow the word. This is a command of Jesus, and we must obey his commands that we may have a right to the tree of life." Then why do you pray with each other in companies? It is not according to the word.

Again, Jesus tells you not to pray as the heathen do. "After this manner therefore, pray ye." Do you only repeat what is called the Lord's prayer? If you do, then you do not obey him, on your own reasoning. Beware, brethren, somebody has been handling the word of God deceitfully and misled you. It has been done before this, and the devil found in it. I have known several so holy they could not pray before people, while at the same time in secret they were committing the most unseemly wickedness. Beware, do not fail to pray much in secret, nor fear to pray before the multitude, either. Many a wicked person has been convicted of [illegible], and his need of mercy and [illegible], while listening to the [illegible] of faithful christians, and [illegible] the Lord. Please read carefully 1 Cor. 14. [illegible]

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER III.

Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of man as a race, or of the good—or those who shall become good—as a class?

The Scriptural argument I shall divide as follows:

1. Is the proper immortality of man assumed in the Bible?
2. Is it involved or implied in the Bible?
3. What is the general tenor of Scriptural language respecting man's destiny?
4. The exegetical or analytic argument.
5. Do the phrases zoe aionios (rendered in our version "eternal" or "everlasting life," by Universalists "age-lasting" or "aionian life,") and its equivalent zoe eis ton aiona, imply immortal life?
6. If "aionian" life does not imply immortal life, then do any who fail of it finally attain immortal life?
7. The two Theodores. Change for Authorities.

§ 1. Is the proper immortality of man ASSUMED in the Bible?

Here at the outset we meet the question whether man is naturally immortal. We may call this the question of the immortality of the soul; or, if that phrase seems too technical and metaphysical, it is the more general question whether all human beings are destined actually and absolutely to an immortal life, without forfeiture or failure.

The older Universalists, as Winchester and Huntington, holding the old opinion that sin against an infinite God deserved endless woe, regarded eternal life not as of man's nature or desert, but as once forfeited and now bestowed as an act of grace. They held that all had been liable to "eternal death." And if we take this phrase in its literal sense, as signifying the loss of immortality, we should then have at once a doctrine of conditional immortality, and we should say nothing more about any absolute immortality of the soul or of man.

But modern Universalists, if I am not mistaken, do not allow any notion of forfeiture or of speculative contingency in respect to immortality. They say it would be either unjust to man or unworthy of God, that He should allow such a being as man by any possible means or supposition, to fail of the immortality for which he was created. And in this view the word death, as used in the Scriptures, can have no reference whatever to the being of the soul, or to the loss of immortality, but it can refer only to the dissolution of the body, or to such a low moral or spiritual state as is, for the time, no better than death itself. Universalists at this day, I say, will hardly allow the idea of annihilation as a thought to be in any wise entertained. I may be mistaken; but I think the following criticism of my heterodox book, from my very good friend the Editor of the Christian Inquirer, (Dec. 19, 1857,) is only a strong statement of the real views of Universalists generally. The Inquirer says:—

"He admits the possibility of the annihilation of the soul of man, which argues a want of appreciation of its exceeding worth, its dignity, and divinity. We cannot but feel that any man who esteems the image of God at so light a figure that it could by any possibility of its earthly action, choice, experience, or condition, come within the verge of the shadow of annihilation, is not fitted to write upon the immortality of man. He speaks of what he does not know, and testifies of what he has not seen.—The creation points to man as the crown and completion of its long ages of change and refining development, the king and climax of its several departments of vegetable and animal growth. History and revelation confirm all that nature hints of the honor and greatness of the spiritual nature. To believe in the [illegible] contingency or possibility of the utter extinguishment of these souls, is to throw a disastrous eclipse over all those teachings and hopes they inspire, and destroy all moral perspective. If we admit that one soul will be annihilated, we admit that all souls may be; we lose the absolute certainty of its immortality; we begin to sink ever so little in a fathomless gulf of soulless and atheistic nonentity."

Abating the strong statement of the case, the above, I think, expresses the common view and sentiment of your readers. But if so, it cuts off all argument to prove the immortality of man, from two of the passages most relied on by Universalists. I refer to Rom. 5: 12–21, and 1 Cor. 15: 12–18. For it is manifest that if these passages teach the final salvation and actual immortality of all men, they equally teach that man has been subject to utter death, and liable to annihilation—the very thing which is held unjust to man or unworthy of God. Life and death are in these passages put in contrast. The death came by Adam; the life comes by Christ. If the life includes immortality, the death implies annihilation; and it follows that man is no more immortal absolutely, or by a strict nature, but by grace; by a regaining of what was lost; but by recovery of what was forfeit; by a redemption—a rescue from the jaws of the very monster which it is supposed has no place nor right in all the universe of God.

The only escape from this view that annihilation has been invited and confronted by man, is in supposing that Rom. 5: 12–21, and 1 Cor. 15: 12–58, refer not to life and death of man's being, but either, literally, of man's body, or, metaphorically, of his moral nature. The immortality of the soul is then no longer expressed or directly taught in those passages, but assumed and implied. So much for the present; what the passages do refer to, we will inquire hereafter.

Another important passage relied on to prove the final salvation of all is that in Luke 20: 35–38. And this is also relied on by some as explicitly declaring the immortality of all.—The phrase "Neither can they die any more," is applied to all mankind. But we need only remark that the expression, "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world," etc., is at least partitive in form; the whole passage taken alone would not suggest the immortality of all, but of a class only; the proof that it applies to all must be derived from other passages. Hence it is simply accurate to say that the immortality of all men is not here named, or explicitly taught.

Now Orthodox writers, in saying that "the immortality of the soul is rather assumed, or taken for granted, than explicitly revealed in the Bible," have been obviously consistent because they have not applied these three passages to all mankind. A single Orthodox writer, maintaining the immortality of the lost, has endeavored to show that the last named passage applies to all; but his attempt to relieve the silence of the Scriptures on the immortality in question only adds a manifest burden to the Orthodox argument; for he would have those elsewhere called the "children of the wicked one" here called the "children of God." What the passage means is to be seen hereafter.

But it will be found as really consistent for the Universalist to say that the immortality of the soul is not explicitly taught; but silently assumed in the Bible. For if he claims that it is taught in Rom. 5: 12–21, and 1 Cor. 15: 12–58, his argument, as we have seen, proves more than he admits; it proves too much.—Hence I think the Universalist labors under the same general difficulty with the Orthodox, respecting the profound silence of the Scriptures on a very weighty matter,—their utter failure to name the immortality of the soul as such, or the immortality of man as man. And I may therefore here repeat, with some variations, the argument I have published on this subject.

To propose the argument more distinctly I should say that I reserve two or three passages supposed to imply the immortality in question, for separate consideration. The point now urged is that man's immortality is nowhere either directly asserted or made the burden of a proposition, nor stated, mentioned, spoken of, or alluded to, in proper terms. As Olshausen says, "the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the name are alike unknown to the entire Bible." Such expressions as to live or to exist forever, to be immortal, the immortal soul, etc., never occur in the Scriptures with plain reference to the nature of man or the destiny of the human family. If such be the doctrine of Scripture, it is not told, but quietly taken for granted and assumed.

For argument's sake I will admit this; and we will compare this supposed implicit doctrine of the Bible with another doctrine doubtless assumed in that volume, and with which the doctrine in question is often associated as one of the main pillars of all religious truth. I mean, of course, the doctrine of God's existence; which I say is assumed or taken for granted because it is never made the burden of a proposition. The doctrine of one God is sometimes asserted against that of many gods. And in one instance (Heb. 11: 6,) where the nature of faith is the point in question, the existence of God appears in a subordinate statement, by which the doctrine is explicitly assumed.

Now I assert that we might expect these two truths to receive similar treatment in the Bible. For the questions of God's existence and of man's immortality are of precisely the same importance to man himself. Not of the same absolute importance to the Universe at large; for in that relation the eternal duration of a billion human souls might be only as a drop in the ocean, to the existence of an infinite and eternal God. And therefore, if the Universe had been divided into halves, ruled by two Gods, and the Bible were a volume of diplomatic documents and messages exchanged between the two deities, then we might suppose a bare allusion in it to the existence of the people of this earth, and nothing said whether they would all live forever. All nations are as the dust of the balance, compared with Deity. "He sitteth in the circle of the heavens, and the inhabitants of the earth are as grasshoppers before him." But the Bible is no such book of state papers, or of royal correspondence. It is not a majestic thundering, from Deity to Deity, uttered from Sinai to Olympus, or from nebula to nebula, in which the children of Adam might be overlooked and forgotten; but it is a special revelation from the Supreme God to the sons of Adam. And it is a revelation for their special instruction, and benefit and behoof; and so exclusively for them is it designed, that all the rest of the universe is put by it in the background, and it seems to make the earth the centre of the world, insomuch that its apparent meaning once imprisoned the reformer in astronomy, Galileo; and the star gazers can now tell us more about the universe than the Bible itself does. And this confined and exclusive character of the Revelation, with which geologists and astronomers have sometimes quarreled, is just and proper, because the dearest personal interests of man's immortality are as important to him as all worlds beside, and as the being of God himself. Whether God exists at all and whether man lives forever, are questions of equal moment to man. Hence I say that in the revelation of God's character and of man's destiny, these two doctrines, if equally true, should be treated alike; we should expect to find them on the same footing.

If, then, one of these cardinal truths is stated in the Bible explicitly and directly, we should expect the same of the other. If one is assumed implicitly and silently,—taken as a doctrine too clear for doubt and scarcely needing to be named, we should expect the same of the other.

But in fact these doctrines receive in the Bible the widest difference of treatment. That of the divine existence, as I have already remarked, is not directly asserted; but it is assumed as too clear for assertion. It is taken as a first truth of the religious consciousness, to prove which would be preposterous. The Bible never goes into debate with the Atheist. If one says in his heart, "There is no God," there is no help for him in logic. But while this truth is taken for granted in the Bible, so far from being tacitly assumed, it is named and alluded to in various forms of speech, continually. It stands out in bold relief, on almost every page. In two short books only it is not named,—Esther and the Song of Solomon,—and their inspiration has been questioned on that ground. In every other book this doctrine is the apple of gold in the picture of silver. It is the central truth, that makes the Bible a Discourse of God—the Word of God. It is the Shekinah that renders it sacred and "holy." And with manifold names, and expressions of the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, do the Scriptures invite men to the faith, love, and service of Him. If we strike out from the record those passages that tell of His being and His works, we reduce the dimensions of the volume almost by half, we make it a book without sense or meaning, we exchange its radiant light for midnight darkness.

But if we expunge from the same book all those passages in which man's immortality is expressly mentioned or unquestionably assumed, we leave the volume unchanged. It might have been written precisely as it is, and the revelation would have been just as complete as it is, if the sacred writers had agreed to ignore that doctrine now so much on the lips of men, or at least, to speak about it so obscurely that their words should settle nothing in the case.

Whence this contrast in the Scriptural treatment of these ideas? Will it be said that man's immortality is sufficiently clear to man's unaided reason? But that important truth ought to be exceedingly clear to human reason, which need not be named in a revelation. And if the more obvious truth is named less frequently because more obvious, then man's immortality should be as much clearer than God's existence as a thousand is greater than zero; for this is about the numerical ratio in which the truths are named.

No one will claim that the soul's immortality is so clear past all shadow or dream of doubt. But if we suppose, for argument's sake, that it is too clear to need explicit mention in the Bible, we only encounter a new difficulty. The Revelation which God should make to man is of necessity given in man's language; not only in a human dialect, but also in the current phrases of human speech, including many proverbial expressions. But if the immortality of men were so clear a doctrine of the human reason, it must be a most cherished sentiment, and must give rise to many familiar expressions—household words of natural theology. In fact, the doctrine has created various forms of expression that reveal the sentiment, wherever it has been believed. These now appear in the daily speech of Christendom, and we shall find them also in the old forms of Gentile philosophy. Why, then, are such expressions wholly avoided and unknown in the Bible? Why should the spirit of prophecy, that catches so readily the language of men, have failed to conform to their style of thought in this most important item of their own immortal nature? If man is born an heir of the future eternity, why is he not invited and encouraged to its suitable virtues by some mention of the fact? The gift of immortality is surely pre-eminently worthy of God's sacred mention to those who think and say so much of their supposed possession of the boon. Why has He not deigned to say a plain word about a nature in man which would be the chief element of the divine image in him?

Such are our difficulties, on the supposition that man's proper immortality is too clear to need mention in a revelation. Turning from the supposition to the facts, we only meet a new difficulty in the anxious doubts of long generations on this very question. Because man was made for immortality, we find in his fallen nature, through all history, some sentiment of the birthright he had lost. He finds himself subject to death; but he also finds, or thinks he finds, some remnant within him of that which is too good to die. Is death an eternal sleep? or, "if a man die, shall he live again?" This was the question of Ages. But when it came to be answered, and "life and immortality were brought to light," there was not a word said respecting the immortal nature of which there had been so much talk. He who "had the words of eternal life" never said that all men were to live forever. He never spoke of the life that he gave as an attribute or quality of some other essential life which men already possessed.

As I have remarked already, the Universalist will not probably claim that Christ gave immortality to all men; for this would imply that it had been lost. He will say rather that Christ revealed and gave assurance of what was already true. Thus a writer on 2 Tim. 1: 10 in the Universalist Quarterly, (vol. 2, p. 55,) says: "Immortality of some beings was brought to light; but not surely the immortality of angels or of beings in another sphere of action. It was the immortality of mankind. But this could not have been disclosed, unless it had been possessed as an inherent attribute of the soul, prior to its disclosure—before the appearing of Christ." But Christ never said that men are immortal. His own words are never such as to describe such an existing fact. And the expression "brought to light" does not require such an interpretation. It may as naturally signify that he pointed out the way of life; or that he showed that there is immortality for man, and how it may be gained. And this accords perfectly with the general tenor of his language. "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." "He that eateth of this bread shall live forever." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "Because I live, ye shall live also." Whether these and similar expressions cover the doctrine of immortality, I shall examine hereafter. But if they do, we see at once that they confirm my interpretation of the phrase in question.

And equally significant, it seems to me, is the silence of Paul respecting the immortality of the soul. It may be said that the Jews were too little philosophic, or too full of national conceit and prejudice, to think of such an immortality, good for all nations and all men.—But Paul surely suffered no such lack of culture, nor such narrowness. He was the Apostle of the Gentiles; and he who could quote the Gentile poets, and was even more a logician than a poet, could not have been so grossly ignorant of the Grecian philosophy as to know nothing of their doctrine of immortality. Why did he then, never speak of the immortality of the soul? If he thought that too abstract and metaphysical a form of thought, why did he not speak of an immortal nature in man? or of man as somehow immortal? Nay, if he thought the Greeks in the truth respecting a universal immortality, but in error respecting the nature or method of it, why did he not take special pains to recognize their half of the truth, and complete the doctrine by showing the connexion between its two parts? When some mocked at the mention of the resurrection of the dead, why did he not show that immortality did not at all depend on the resurrection? And when, in that most ample discussion in the 15th chapter of 1 Cor., he made a supposition of no resurrection, why did he say, "Then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished?"

The sum is this:—The Scriptures, given to reveal God's character and man's duty and destiny, speak of the divine existence many hundred times and in considerable variety of ways; but they speak of man's proper immortality, equally important to himself, never. And though the question had been long agitated among men, and the doctrine was incarnated in men's language, Christ, coming to illustrate the subject, said nothing of the doctrine. And Paul, whose education and mission pointed him out as the man to name and teach so great a truth, has failed to do it. The question arises whether the supposed taking for granted of man's immortality is not an assumption out of the Bible, and foreign to it.*

I think that my argument from the silence of the Scriptures respecting man's immortality receives additional force from some facts among the Spiritualists. They offer the spiritual manifestations as proving more than almost anything else the immortality of the soul. Those Spiritualists who reject the Bible will naturally regard its teachings as defective on this subject. But how is it with those who accept the Bible? I cannot speak from very general acquaintance or reading; but I have read enough to know that the following incident means something. The first lecturer on Spiritualism whom I have heard, told us that he had been a Methodist preacher. He found himself in trouble because he could not prove the immortality of the soul from the Bible. He told his perplexity to a friend; yet he found no relief, but aggravation of his difficulty, for his friend was in the same case. The friend, however, thought that what the church had always held must be true, and he must preach it indulging no private speculations on the subject. Our lecturer replied that God gave him the faculty of reason, and he did not dare to forego the use of it; he must think for himself. And he thought he could now prove the desired immortality, thus: Matter is eternal. Whatever produces material effects, is matter. The spirits do this: hence they are eternal; and the Bible, recognizing their existence, teaches thus the immortality of the soul.

The argument of our lecturer plainly proved a great deal too much,—a past eternal existence, as well as a future immortality, and that of all species of life. It was pretty straight Pantheism. Yet I doubt whether the lack of faith among Orthodox Christians in a Providence that could give immortal life to the worthy alone, or their reliance on immortality from some "nature of things," has not helped forward this modern style of Pantheism.

§ 2. Is the immortality of the soul IMPLIED in the Scriptures?

A truth which does not lie on the surface of an expression, or in the form of its words, may yet be very clearly contained or implied in it. Is the immortality of man thus taught in the Bible? A very few passages only need here to be considered.

Gen. 1: 26, 27. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. . . . So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him."

I think this can prove no more than the creation of man for immortality, of which, nevertheless, he might fail. I think the expression in the book of Wisdom, 2: 23, denotes just this: "God made man for immortality (ep' aphtharsia,) and to the image of his own nature made he him. But by the envy of the devil death came into the world." Some editions of the Apocrypha have the word eternity instead of nature; but this is a false reading of aidiotetos instead of idiotetos, which has been remarked by various scholars. And I think the context shows that the prospective immortality was, in the opinion of the Jews, cut off by the entrance of death. This appears more fully from the entire context, which I think signifies the immortality of the righteous alone.

"And they [the wicked] knew not the secrets of God, nor hoped for the reward of righteousness nor esteemed the honor of holy souls. For God made man for incorruption, and to the image of his own nature made he him. But by the envy of the devil death came into the world; and they follow him that are of his side. But the souls of the just are in the hand of God, and torment may not touch them. In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die, and their exit was reckoned a calamity, and their departure from us utter destruction; but they are in peace. For though in the sight of men they are punished, their hope is full of immortality."

This passage may be taken as showing how the Jews understood that in Genesis, and my view is supported by an expression in chap. 15; 3. "The just live for ever [eis ton aiona], and their reward is in the Lord."

And two expressions in the New Testament seem to denote that the divine image in man is a moral likeness. Eph. 4: 24. "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." Col. 3: 10. "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him." From this we should not infer that actual holiness was concreated in man; for character can not be created by another. Rather, I should take it, man was made with a capacity and design for godliness, or godlikeness, and thus for immortality. Now that which is moral is primary and ruling; that which is physical is subordinate. If the godlikeness fails, the immortality may follow.

Gen. 2; 7. "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul."

Few of your readers, I presume, need to be told that the Hebrew phrase for living soul is in chap. 1: 30, applied to the brutes. And in Gen. 7: 22, we have a still stronger expression: "All in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of lives (nishmath ruach chajim) died." In 1 Cor. 15: 45, the phrase is put in a contrast which directly intimates that Adam was not made absolutely immortal: "The first Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit."

Eccl. 3: 21. "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?"

This text would be unworthy of attention in this argument, if it were not so often adduced by many Orthodox people. I am happily ignorant of the Universalist treatment of it. Suffice it to say, the previous verse,—"All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again,"—and still more the 19th verse, sustains the view which takes it as a challenge: q. d. "Who knows whether the spirit goeth upward," etc. It is a piece of Solomon's scepticism, which proves Epicurianism and French Atheism if it proves anything. That it should get into a "Scripture Manual" as a proof-text that man will live as long as God does, shows either a sad state of traditional reasoning, or a great meagreness of Orthodox argument.

Eccl. 12: 7. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Here the Preacher speaks more as a moralist, and as the last two verses show, with some sentiment of piety. Yet his whole book yields scarcely a glimpse of immortality. The "judgment" named in verse 14, if after death, proves no eternal life. And the expression, "shall return to God who gave it," naturally denotes that the spirit reverts back to the disposal of the power that created it; and it may intimate a return to original nothingness. This view is strongly supported by an expression of Justin Martyr, treating this very question of immortality. He says,—"As the personal man does not always exist, and body and soul are not ever conjoined; but whenever this harmony must be dissolved, the soul leaves the body and the man is no more; so likewise, whenever it is necessary that the soul should no longer be, the vital spark leaves it, and the soul is no more, but itself returns again thither whence it was taken." (Dial. c. Trypho c. 6.)

* This argument, from the persistent silence of the Scriptures respecting man's immortality, I regard as the main argument of my book; and it is so regarded by others. It is passed over in silence by three of my reviewers: D. N. Lord, Theological and Literary Journal, April, 1858; Dr. J. Strong, Methodist Quarterly Review, July, 1858; and Dr A. Hovey, State of the Impenitent Dead. Another reviewer, Prof. E. P. Barrows, Bibliotheca Sacra, July, 1858, entirely misapprehends the argument; he proceeds as if I had in mind only the "immortality of the soul" in the technical or metaphysical sense, though I devote a paragraph (p. 162) to prevent such a misconception. I know the Professor too well to suspect him of an intentional [illegible] but the [illegible] manifest.

While bright prismatic beams their shadowy [illegible] adorn.

The World's Aspect.

The christian who surveys the present aspect of the world, must at once arrive at the conclusion that we live in a day of unprecedented crime and abounding evil. Without entering into its saddening details, it is sufficient to refer to the sure word of prophecy for evidence that the coming struggle is but the fulfillment of its predictions. The trouble seems to have commenced at the right place to complete the prophecies. But that which we have chiefly to do at present is, the clear and joyous light in which it presents the Rest that lies beyond the struggle, the glorious day, which is to break out of this long, long night.

It is an evident truth that we are awaiting the most terrible storm that ever desolated the homes of art and civilization; the vastness of the consequences delays the issue; the internal condition of the nations of Europe and Asia, and the mutual relations of these nations which are to be dragged into the world's quarrel, render it certain that every expedient of mediation will be exhausted for arresting the collision which will strew continents with ruin, convert the world into a battle-field, and join the horrors of civil war to the devastation of international slaughter; and whatever may be the order of the field, despotism will come up to meet the retribution of centuries of wrong; and the people enraged beyond endurance, will come to inflict it.

Let us, then, who fear the Lord, speak often one to another, draw closely together as a flock, let the glory that awaits us in a little time from this overcome all selfish and sectarian aims, that we may be united in the presence of common enemies and dangers, and, above all, united when our glorious King shall arrive. Handling the Word of God Deceitfully—Cor. 4: 2.—No. 2.

In pursuing the subject of the deceptive use of Scripture, I may touch some in a tender spot. If so, let them learn to do better. It is my object to show the thing as it is, as a warning to those who do it, and an example for others to shun. If any find themselves portrayed and are not deceitful, they can plead ignorance or confusion, which is claimed by some to be the definition of Babylon.—Rev. 18: 2. Either is much more honorable and excusable than deception.

It has been often taught that it is a sin to pray in public, or before the unregenerate, in a family, or in a public meeting. To prove this, Matt. 6: 6, is quoted, and great stress is laid on "entering into thy closet," and, "thy Father which seeth in secret." All this is done to prove it wicked to pray in the public meeting of saints and sinners. But, say they, it reads, "Enter into thy closet." Yes, but does it say you must not pray also in public meetings, in the family circle, by the sick and dying, and anywhere when help is needed from the Lord? "But, we must follow the word. This is a command of Jesus, and we must obey his commands that we may have a right to the tree of life." Then why do you pray with each other in companies? It is not according to the word.

Again, Jesus tells you not to pray as the heathen do. "After this manner therefore, pray ye." Do you only repeat what is called the Lord's prayer? If you do, then you do not obey him, on your own reasoning. Beware, brethren, [illegible] has been handling the word of God deceitfully and misled you. It has been done before this, and the devil found in it. I have known several so holy they could not pray before people, while at the same time in secret they were committing the most unseemly wickedness. [illegible] pray much in secret, nor fail to pray before the multitude, either. [illegible] person has been convicted of [illegible] and his need of mercy [illegible] while listening to the [illegible] christians, and [illegible] the Lord. Please read [illegible] praying?" Yes, such as was done to be seen of men. Secret prayer is also condemned when done mechanically, only to appease a guilty conscience, by a false tradition that we must pray, if we do not leave off sinning. "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination."—Prov. 28: 9. Do not be deceived in this matter. First see that you love God with all your heart, then you will love his law, and can safely pray in secret and in public, the Lord will answer your prayers, and good will follow.

Be on your guard against deceptive teaching. Job's friends (?) were full of it. Satan engaged in it while quoting Scripture to Christ in the wilderness, and his subjects have always been doing the same to mislead christians who would not give up the word of God. If men will believe the Bible at all events, then the devil seeks to corrupt, pervert, and use it deceitfully, while many christians are misled thereby. "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?" Yours in hope of eternal life soon.

The Predicted Destruction of Rome.

That Rome is to be destroyed, previous to the coming of Christ, is revealed in the Apocalypse under the three angel messages. Thus John says,—"I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue and people, saying with a loud voice, 'Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication. And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb."

From the fact that the third angel warns men against the worship of the beast and his image, and the receiving of his mark, it indicates a state of probation prior to the coming of our Lord. And as the first angel proclaims the hour of his judgment is come, and the second angel, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen," her fall must occur on the very verge of the judgment, which is indicated by the message of the third angel, that those who shall worship the beast shall be tormented in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb.

Under the pouring out of "the seventh vial" of wrath it is said, "Great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath;" and immediately after John says,—"And there came one of the seven angels, which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying, come hither; I will show thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters, with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication. So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness; and I saw a woman sitting upon a scarlet-colored beast, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of the abomination and filthiness of her fornication; and upon her forehead a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and abomination of the earth."

In the explanation given of the mystery of the woman, and the beast that carrieth her, the angel said, "The woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth." As no other city reigned over the kings of the earth at that time, but Rome, and since the prediction of her destruction has not yet been fulfilled, the message of the angel, "Babylon is fallen," is yet future; and will be until the fact agrees with the prediction. Rome has not yet fallen according to the prediction; for an angel to represent her fall as total, took up a stone like a great millstone and threw it into the sea, and declared that Babylon should thus fall with violence and be found no more at all. The following is the description given of her fall:

Rev. 18.—And after these things I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power, and the earth was lightened with his glory. And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. For all nations have drunk of the wine of her wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies. And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities. Reward her even as she hath rewarded you, and double unto her double, according to her works: in the cup which she hath filled fill to her double. How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her: for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death and mourning and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire: for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her. And the kings of the earth, who have committed fornication and lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning, standing afar off for fear of her torment, saying, Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come. And the merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her; for no man buyeth her merchandise any more; her merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all thyme wood, and all manner vessels of ivory, and all manner vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble, and cinnamon, and odors, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men. And the fruits that thy soul lusted after are departed from thee; and all things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou shalt find them no more at all. The merchants of these things, who were made rich by her, shall stand afar off for fear of her torment, weeping and wailing, and saying, Alas, alas! that great city, that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones and pearls! for in one hour is so great riches come to naught. And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea stood afar off and cried when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city! And they cast dust on their heads, and cried, weeping and wailing, Alas! alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate. Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets; for God hath avenged you on her. And a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all. And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee; and the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee; for thy merchants were the great men of the earth; for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived. And in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth."

Everything that is here said of the judgment to be poured out on mystical Babylon, indicates a particular city, and not the world in general. In the first place, Babylon is said to be that great city that reigns over the kings of the earth, and no city but Rome reigned over the kings, when John wrote: so the city is spoken of as distinct from the Empire over which she reigned. Her locality is also pointed out as being seated on seven mountains; and Rome is situated on seven hills. See her description, Rev. 17: 9, 18. And those who are to mourn over her, are to stand afar off and gaze upon the smoke of her burning; and this fact of the prophesy indicates a local city.

Rome is also situated so that the smoke of her burning can be seen by the ships in the Mediterranean sea. The description of the mourning among the shipmasters, "and as many as trade by sea," is not to be understood of the shipping of the Atlantic, or any ocean or sea, except the Mediterranean. John wrote the Apocalypse, on the isle of Patmos, in the Mediterranean sea; and it can only be the merchantmen of that sea, who are made rich in their traffic with Rome, who can behold her afar off, and lament for her when they shall see the smoke of her burning.

The Apocalyptical prediction respecting the destruction of "that great city Babylon" is so minute and particular, that no doubt need be entertained but that Rome is the city meant. And her overthrow is predicted as complete and eternal; so that the voice of music, and the voice of the bridegroom and bride shall be heard no more in her forever. Amen. Even so let it be.

The reason assigned for her destruction is because "her sins have reached unto heaven and God hath remembered her iniquities." The iniquity of Rome consists in the adoption of the Catholic creed, in all its height, and length, and breadth, and depth; a depth of infamy which none but those who have studied her history and creed can appreciate. Her creed is the mystery of iniquity; an adulteration of the truth with lying doctrines. A creed that regards the faith of Jesus the son of God, as heresy; and those who profess it, heretics. She has made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the poison of her doctrines rankles in the blood of others besides her immediate supporters.

Then let the judgments of Jehovah descend upon the cruel old monster of iniquity, and let all the people, who abhor her, say, Amen.

The Spirit.—No. 9.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Having examined the word spirit in the Old Testament, and found no proof that any thing leaves man at death but "the breath of life," which is essential to sustain man's conscious existence, but is not of itself the conscious part; we now pass to the examination of pneuma, the corresponding word in the New Testament.

Pneuma is from pneo, "to blow, breathe, of the wind and air." 2. "To breathe, send forth an odor," "to breathe or smell of a thing." 3. "Of animals, to breathe hard, pant, gasp." 4. "Generally, to draw breath, breathe, and so to live."—Liddell & Scott.

Pneuma is defined as follows:—"Wind," "air," "the air we breathe," "the breath of life," "the Spirit," "a living being," "spirit, i. e., feeling."—Lid. & Scott.

Pneuma, like ruakh in the Old Testament, has four significations.

1. It represents, primarily, the air we breathe.

2. It denotes a being, as angels.

3. It represents an influence from a being.

4. It indicates a state of feeling.

Pneuma is the only word rendered spirit in the New Testament, with two exceptions.—Matt. 14: 26; Mk. 6: 49. For an examination of these two passages, see Crisis No. 6, April 6th, '59.

We would hear remark that pneuma is not once rendered soul. The word occurs in the Greek text three hundred and eighty-five times. In order that we may understand the uses of the word, we will examine all the passages in the gospel by St. Matthew which contain the word pneuma. The first is in Matt. 1: 18, where we have an account of the birth of Christ. When speaking of Mary, the mother of Jesus, he says:—"She was found with child of the Holy (pneuma) Ghost." "Holy Ghost" and "Holy Spirit" are synonymous, and in our examination we shall adopt the latter expression. In this first use of the word, pneuma represents the holy influence "which proceedeth from the Father." As this influence is the agent employed by our Heavenly Father to accomplish his purposes, it is represented by a pronoun in the masculine gender. By means of this influence, God is omnipotent, while his personality is in heaven, accompanied by our Savior, who is "the express image of his person." Heb. 1: 3. By means of this influence or holy pneuma, he dwells in all his children, and exerts his power in all parts of our world at the same time. David says:—"Whither shall I go from thy (pneuma) spirit?" intimating that he could not hide from its influence, "for the (pneuma) spirit searcheth all things." 1 Cor. 2: 10. We see no reason why this influence, by means of which God exerts his power, should not be represented by the masculine pronoun, as well as wisdom by the feminine. Of the latter it is said:—"Wisdom hath builded her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars." Like wisdom, the Holy Spirit is often personified to represent the presence and acts of our Heavenly Father, from whom this agent proceeds.

The second time the word pneuma occurs is in Matt. 1: 20. The angel said to Joseph, when speaking of his espoused wife, "That which is conceived in her is of the Holy (pneuma) Spirit." As the Savior was begotten by the Holy Spirit, he in this partook of the Divine nature, and as he was born of the virgin Mary, he also partook of human nature, and thus became a mediator between God and man. These two natures are blended in one being, who is denominated "the Son of God" and "the Son of man,"—our Savior.

The third passage in order, where pneuma is found, is in Matt. 3: 11. "He shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit." Wakefield renders this, "in a holy wind." When describing the event, the apostle says, "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting." Acts 2: 2. As the house was filled with this holy wind or Spirit, the disciples were immersed or baptized in it. We must be immersed in the element employed, otherwise, baptism is impossible.

4. "And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water; and lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the (pneuma) Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him." Matt. 3: 16. On this extraordinary occasion, the Holy Spirit was seen. Electricity and magnetism may be so concentrated as to be seen, but such is not their ordinary appearance. So at Christ's baptism, the Holy Spirit was manifested as never before; at least, we have no record of such a manifestation before or since. This was the special sign to John by which he was to know the Son of God.

5. Then was Jesus led up of the (pneuma) spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil." Matt. 4: 1. The spirit in this example is the same influence mentioned in the passage already examined.

6. "Blessed are the poor in (pneuma) spirit." Matt. 5: 3. We are satisfied, at a glance, that pneuma in this text does not refer to the Holy Spirit, for those are not blessed who are poor in this, or nearly destitute of its influence. Pneuma in this example is used to denote "a state of feeling,"—such a state as is pleasing to the Lord—one opposed to arrogance and pride. Says the Lord by his prophet Isaiah;—"To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite (ruakh) spirit, and trembleth at my word." Says the Psalmist, "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart, and saveth such as be of a contrite (ruakh) spirit." Pneuma is used to represent "a state of feeling" sixty-two times.

7. "They brought unto him many that were possessed with devils; and he cast out the (*pneuma) spirits with his word." Matt. 8: 16. We have now come to an example where pneuma is used to denote a being. It is thus used sixty-five times. In Heb. 1: 7, 14, we learn that angels are "ministering (pneuma) spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." Angels have always appeared as tangible organisms. "The angels that sinned" are called "unclean (pneuma) spirits." These frequently took possession of men and women, as they do at the present day, in what is now known as Spiritualism; then, as sorcery, necromancy and witchcraft, exerting an influence upon the mediums in a manner similar to that produced by a good mesmerizer. When Jesus cast them out, he removed their influence from the mediums, so that the latter enjoyed perfect self-possession.

8. "When he had called unto him his disciples, he gave them power against unclean (pneuma) spirits, to cast them out." Matt. 10: 1.

9. "It is not ye that speak, but the (pneuma) spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." Matt. 10: 20. In this example, the Holy Spirit is indicated.

10. "I will put my (pneuma) spirit upon him, and he shall show judgment to the Gentiles." Matt. 12: 18. This refers to the reception of the Holy Spirit by Christ.

11. "I cast out devils by the (pneuma) spirit of God." Matt. 12: 28. This refers also to the Holy Spirit.

12. "Blasphemy against the Holy (pneuma) Spirit shall not be forgiven unto men." Matt. 12: 31.

13. "Whosoever speaketh against the Holy (pneuma) Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." Matt. 12: 32.

14. "The unclean (pneuma) spirit is gone out." Matt. 12: 43. This refers to an evil being who had possession of an individual.

15. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other (pneuma) spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in." Matt. 12: 45.

When a man is set free from the influence of evil spirits by the power of God, in answer to prayer, and afterwards rejects Christ, the evil angel returns in company with several others, "and the last state of that man is worse than the first." There appears to be a host in this condition at the present time. They are fulfilling the Scripture which says:—"In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." 1 Tim. 4: 1.

16. "How then doth David in (pneuma) spirit call him Lord?" Matt. 22: 43. Reference is here made to the instruction David received from the Holy Spirit.

17. "The (pneuma) spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." Matt. 26: 41. Spirit, in this example, indicates a state of feeling. The individual would like to perform the act, but his physical strength is deficient.

18. "Jesus, when he had cried with a loud voice, yielded up the (pneuma) ghost." Matt. 27: 50. This is one of the two examples where pneuma is improperly rendered ghost. The Syriac, Campbell, Wesley and Whiting, render the phrase, "the ghost,"—"his spirit." Instead of the phrase, "yielded up the ghost," Wakefield and others render it, "he expired," which gives the true idea, as clearly expressed in other Scriptures. Pneuma, in this passage, as in several others, is used to denote "the breath of life." In the Emphatic Diaglott, opheke to pneuma, which is here translated "gave up the ghost," is properly rendered, "resigned the breath." Pneuma is used in the same sense in Lk. 8: 55, where we have an account of the raising of the daughter of Jarius. Jesus said,—"Maid, arise. And her (pneuma) spirit came again, and she arose straightway." Wakefield and Thompson render pneuma in this example by the word breath. Pneuma has the same signification in Jas. 2: 26. "The body without the (pneuma) spirit is dead." Our translators have placed breath in the margin, thus showing that they considered breath a proper rendering of pneuma in this Scripture. Wakefield and Griesbach render it breath in this passage. As this point will come up again, we pass it now, to notice the last example of pneuma in the gospel by Matthew.

19. "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy (pneuma) Spirit."

We have now examined all the passages in the twenty-eight chapters of Matthew, and the other gospels are similar, but have found nothing concerning an "immortal," or "never dying spirit" in man, which leaves in a conscious state when the man is dead. Nothing yet appears to show that any thing but "the breath of life" is taken away at the death of the physical organism.

* We give the simple form of the word in all examples.

Distribution of Tracts.

In view of the approaching judgment, and the fact that many of our neighbors and friends are unprepared for the event, the inquiry has arisen in many minds, what can be done to reach those who are out of the ark of safety? Knowing that truth can be successfully scattered by means of small tracts, and that many are anxious to read, and would be instructed and benefitted by perusing these little messengers, it is thought best to make an extra effort to place the truth in the hands of those who desire to make its acquaintance, and bid it a hearty welcome. We already hear of much good accomplished by means of tracts. It often happens that persons meet friends with whom they wish to converse on some particular point, but not having time to do it, and perhaps if they had, they would not be able to quote all the Scripture they need to explain the points, but if they had a tract to give, setting forth the truth in a clear manner, their friend could read it carefully at his leisure, and by this means be guided into the right way, and, as a consequence, be saved in the kingdom of God to rejoice for ever. Many valuable tracts are now ready for circulation, but move slowly, and in small quantities, for want of more systematic action. Other good ones would be prepared at once, if the writers could see encouragement for their circulation.

It is proposed to form a general tract society, under the direction of prudent men, chosen for the purpose, who should see that funds are properly expended, in harmony with the wishes of the society. In connection with the general society, it is desired that every church become an auxiliary, to scatter tracts in their particular locality. By some such arrangement, it is believed we can do much more than we are now doing to interest the people in the great truths of the Bible. In this way, small sums may be made to accomplish great results.

When we consider the shortness of time, the extent of country to be occupied, the few preachers of the everlasting gospel now in the field, and the important consequences of the approaching judgment, it seems necessary that greater effort be made to reach those unprepared to meet the Son of man. How can a little money be better appropriated than for this object?

We wish our brethren would consider the subject, express their feelings, and prepare at once for action, so that, if we meet again at the general campmeeting in Wilbraham, we may be able to perfect the arrangements, and take hold of the work in earnest.

State of Affairs in Europe.

The political aspect of the eastern nations is becoming more and more complex, and the war clouds wear a deeper and more bloody dye. No bright spot appears to relieve the painful anxiety of the belligerent powers. The horrid gloom of war is rising on all sides. The preparations are on a grand scale. King Victor Emanuel commands the army in chief; the Emperors of France and Austria appear in the field at the head of their respective armies, feeling conscious that the importance of the coming struggle demands all the aid their presence can afford.

There is but little chance for England, Russia and the other powers of Europe to remain spectators of the bloody drama, now just opening to a wondering world. Says the Independence Belge of May 5th:—

"The gravest news of the day is that the English government has protested at Paris against the passage of French troops thro' the neutralized Territory of Savoy—that is to say, against the use of the railway constructed upon that part of Savoy. The French government replied that it could not acknowledge this protest."

England must either bow in submission to France and see her protest trampled under foot, thereby acknowledging her inferiority and inability to sustain her claims, or at once enforce her protest by military power, if the French government continues to disregard the demand of the English. We anxiously wait to know the result.

A letter from Vienna, May 2, says:—

"In our political circles the conviction becomes daily stronger that Russia will seize on the first favorable opportunity to effect the triumph in the East of the principle of nationalities, in the same manner as France is now attempting it in favor of Italy. The union of the Sclavonic nation is a project which has been for a long time past cherished by Russia, and what awakens uneasiness here is, first, the military armaments which are being made in Servia, the Danubian Principalities and in Montenegro, and the accumulation of warlike stores, evidently out of proportion to the wants and resources of those countries; and next, the very close relations which have been established between the Princes Milosch, Couza and Danilo, and the presence in Paris of Prince Michael, son of Prince Milosch."

We may expect to see the whole Russian army engaged in the death grapple of the nations, and acting a prominent part in the closing scene, if this be the final gathering for the battle of the great day. The financial aspect is very bad. It is said:—"A disturbance of the money market throughout Europe is inevitable, and has indeed already taken place." In describing the state of feeling, they use such words as the following:—"A pressure has suddenly arisen;" "fears;" "despondency and panic;" "completely unnerved;" "universal disquietude;" "fright;" etc., thus showing that the "distress of nations" is beginning to be felt.

The cruel king of Naples is wasting away with a most loathsome disease. One of the liberals remarked that,

"The Almighty has inflicted on Ferdinand the greatest punishment for his cruelty to others that can befal mortal, namely, that of surveying his own corpse. And such, indeed, depicts his condition; the head is sound, the intelligence as acute as ever, but the whole body a mass of decomposition."

"The Count of Syracuse, who is alarmed at some symptoms in his own person somewhat resembling the commencement of the King's malady, is going to the Terre del Greco, a village about six miles south of Naples."

Oppression, misrule, war and bloodshed, pain and sorrow, sickness and death, all combine to extort the cry from the humble christian, "Come, Lord Jesus."

Oswego City, N. Y.

A correspondent from this city writes:—"Our city is in a state of constant excitement occasioned by the Spiritualists.... They hold their... meetings every Sabbath, and often through the week, evenings .... They are favored, I am told, with crowded houses of attentive listeners, for the subject of Spiritualism is talked of, so far as I know, in every family." Our correspondent is anxious to have some one "come and tell the people the truth," and says:—"I presume there are few places where the preaching of the sleep of the dead, and life only through faith in Christ, is more needed than here. Go where you will in this city, and the people are in a restless, dissatisfied state of mind, and perishing, or famishing for want of knowledge."

The city has some eighteen or twenty thousand inhabitants. Who will go up to meet the Philistines? Says our correspondent:—"Do stir up some one to come at once. Our homes are ready and waiting to welcome the servant of God."

A Reviewer.

The Rev. N. Rounds, D. D., in the Ladies Repository for May, quoted by the Watchman and Reflector, says:

"If eternal unconscious privation of being is everlasting punishment, then the absurdity would follow that all created beings have already suffered everlasting punishment; for there is an anterior as well as a posterior eternity—an eternity before their existence as well as after it. There had been an eternity in the existence of God before we or any other creatures were made. And during all this prior eternity we were deprived of existence. Existence was withheld from us. And therefore, if eternal unconscious privation of existence is everlasting punishment, all created beings, not excepting redeemed saints and unfallen angels, have suffered everlasting punishment. And those of our race not yet born are suffering it now; for the antecedent eternity is just as long as the subsequent eternity. And the withholding of conscious being during the former is just as truly eternal punishment as is the privation of it during the latter; that is, it is no everlasting punishment at all. And it is just at this point of confluent absurdities that the theory of Prof. Hudson explodes."

I am very sorry indeed if my argument, consistently carried out, proves such dreadful things; and though the same Repository has said that I, "for a rarity, do not complain of my reviewers," I should be a hard-hearted wretch if I did not now hasten to expurgate myself, if possible, from such infinite logical guilt. And not myself alone; but such great and good men as Witsius, and Watts, and Edwards, and R. W. Hamilton, whom my book involves in the same "absurdities" and "sophistry;" instead of which last sweet name I presume the writer would have said "fallacy," if he had chosen to tell how these divines stand committed. But he kindly spares them—and my arguments too, for he alludes to neither.

I am happy that he knows two things about eternity which some thinkers do not know. One is, that God allowed a past eternity to transpire before he created any beings, and was thus inactive and idle half of all his time. The other is, "the antecedent eternity is just as long as the subsequent eternity." It may be so; but then the past eternity is no longer than it was 6000 years ago, and the future eternity no shorter. But by the same principle the future eternity would be no greater if it had begun a million times 6000 years ago, or with the eternal past itself. I am glad if there is some one who understands these mysteries, and if Dr. Mansel's "Limits of Religious Thought" need not go to a new edition.

But I am forgetting my defence. It is this. My reason for saying that annihilation is eternal punishment is, that man was made for immortality, in the same sense in which he was made for eternal life. And, failing of that by his own guilt, failing of that which might have been his own, which was his by the freshness and fullness of God's gift, until it was rejected,—it is strictly a loss; an infinite loss, an eternal loss. And besides the Orthodox and Calvinistic concessions of this point which I have quoted, I may here add the words of an Armenian D. D., such as my reviewer is. Dr. Strickland, noticing my book in the National Magazine, Sept. 1858, says:

"The loss of existence is an evil of more terrible magnitude than even that of perpetual punishment." How then can it be anything less than perpetual punishment?

Now man had been created for a past eternity, so that immense blank of created intelligence which our writer supposes might have been filled up, if the engine of his immortal life had been constructed with the reversing lever, so he might live backward toward that "from the beginning" where there is no beginning, and if in the richness of God's favor and grace there were no impediment to his exploring that boundless world unto an infinite fullness of joy, to fail of that by a wild plunge down the precipice of annihilation I should think would be an eternal punishment of life. It would be so, because, by the supposition man was created for it, and fails of it. Hypothetically, his existence covered it; and therefore just such an eternal existence would be lost. And to argue that there can be "no privation" because one is deprived of his very-being, no eternal penal loss because existence itself is forever lost, seems like proving that there is no evil to one who has incurred what the ancient philosophers often called the greatest of all evils, and what the Jewish writers called the greatest of all punishments.

Indeed this writer himself cannot avoid speaking of "eternal unconscious privation of being." But his present argument fails—is fallacious—at the outset, because it confounds "eternal privation of being" with "eternal non-existence." The very word about which this strife is,—annihilation,—means more than simple and original non-existence. To be thrust out of being into non-being is a good deal worse than never to have been, according to Dr. R.'s showing. And to be annihilated out of an eternal existence upon which one had entered with high and flattering hope—what is one thinking about who says that our non-existence for an eternal past is the same as that? Has death, or a late birth cheated us out of any eternity that is gone forever? Is it something that we have "lost"? Have we been "deprived" of it? Have we ever been thrust out from it? Do we fail of it for any other reason than this,—that we are not self-existent Gods? and that too at no great loss—if from the eternal past we might have done nothing. Indeed, if we have incurred loss in this situation, we have been so little aware of it, ever since we began to exist, that we must accord some honor to this writer for the discovery. So little were we created or designed for that kind of existence that it has needed a wise man to tell us it was lost.

I plead guilty to a little impatience in arguing this question whether it is an eternal punishment to be destroyed forever. But I will here add a little argument, which may relieve the trouble somewhat. By what right do we call capital punishment any punishment at all? Not for the pain suffered in execution—that is less than is commonly endured in natural death. Not because the criminal is hastened into his future woe—the criminal code contemplates no such thing. Sentence is always pronounced upon the culprit, not with imprecation, but with supplication,—"and may God have mercy on your soul!" The Bench, the Bar, and the Jury, would rise in a meeting of horror and protest at the bare thought that the extreme sentence of the law was designed to add the smallest fraction of a moment to those pains of hell, whether physical or mental, which the Pulpit maintains will never end. The statute which condemns to death contemplates nothing of the kind. Where, then, is the penalty? It consists simply in this,—life is cut short. It is privation, loss, of which the law recognizes and designs no suffering, consciousness or sense. And how long is the culprit punished? Only while he is dangling and dying? Can the period of his punishment be anything less than that covered by his premature death? He was born to live three score years and ten, or for a certain period of "natural life," more or less. But if he will rush upon the gallows forty years earlier, and become "dead, dead, dead," out of society, family, and life, during all that time, who says that he lies so long in a felon's grave unpunished? Would imprisonment for life be punishment during that period? And would its commutation into capital punishment bring so long impunity?. And, if we transfer the scene to the future, and regard the "second death" as holding its victim forever dead, beyond all hope and reach of life, is that an eternal impunity?

Upon the fact that many say that for themselves they should regard annihilation as eternal punishment, while others would not, I sometimes meet the remark that "tastes differ." But if "de gustibus disputandum," if the case is judged by any preferences of man, it should be considered that they who so shudder at the thought of annihilation are the robber sort of folk. And it is a fair question whether their feeling and judgment in the case may not be more like God's own judgment than is that insensibility which regards death as the end of punishment; which does from the heart what this writer does, we are sure, only in argument—puts annihilation on the same footing with creation or existence, not from eternity. Nay, God may consult the "tastes" of either class. He gives eternal life to those who . . . "seek for glory, honor and immortality." "But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own destruction." C. F. H.

Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy. No. 4.

BABYLON AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS.

The ancient city of Babylon was, for a long period of time, the most wealthy and powerful city in the world. Its walls were reckoned among the wonders of the world. There is a difference of opinion among historians relative to the exact proportions of those immense bulwarks, but this we learn with certainty from their descriptions, that they were of gigantic height and thickness.

Herodotus states them to have been 840 furlongs in circumference. Pliny and Salinus say that they were 60 Roman miles; Strabo, 305 furlongs; Curtius, 368. Herodotus states their height to have been 200 cubits, or 300 feet, and their breadth 50 cubits, or 75 feet, and 32. This discrepancy may be the result of observation at various periods of time, as the walls began to diminish in size after the glory of the mighty city began to wane. Those objects which rendered the city of particular note, beside its gigantic walls, were the temple Belus, which, we are informed by historians, was half a mile in circumference and a furlong in height; the hanging gardens, which were piled in successive terraces one above another, until they towered as high as the walls of the city; the embankments which restrained the waters of the great Euphrates and the hundred brazen gates; the imperial palace built by Nebuchadnezzar, and the artificial lake, more than an hundred miles in circumference, and its depth, by the most limited computation, thirty-five feet. These were objects of great interest and fame. Chaldea, of which country Babylon was the capital, was the most fertile region of the whole east. This was called Babylonia until after the christian era. It was a "vast plain, adorned and enriched by the Euphrates and Tigris, from which, and from the numerous canals that intersected the country from the one river to the other, water was distributed over the fields by manual labor and hydraulic machines, giving rise in that warm climate, and rich, inexhaustible soil, to an exuberance of produce, without a known parallel over so extensive a region, either in ancient or modern times. Herodotus states that he knows not how to speak of its wonderful fertility, which none but eye-witnesses would credit; and though writing in the language of Greece, itself a fertile country, he expresses his own consciousness that his description of what he actually saw, would appear to be improbable, and to exceed belief."

It was the testimony of Herodotus, Strabo and Pliny, the most reliable of ancient authorities that can be given, that Babylonia was exceedingly fertile in corn, the soil never yielding less than two hundred fold; and Strabo goes so far as to state that it reached even to three hundred, and that the grain was of prodigious size. After its subjection to Persia, the government of Chaldea was accounted the most noble in the Persian dominions. Besides the supply of horses for military service, it maintained about seventeen thousand horses for the sovereign's use. The revenue was immense, for, beside the "monthly subsidies, the supply from Chaldea, (including perhaps Syria) for the subsistence of the king and his army, amounted to a third part of all that was levied from the whole of the Persian dominions, which, at that time, extended from the Hellespont to India."

If Babylon could truthfully be denominated "the lady of kingdoms," the country surrounding it might be called the glory of lands. The pastures adjacent to the residence of the king, in the seventh century," were covered with flocks and herds; the paradise, or park, was replenished with pheasants, pea-cocks, ostriches, roe-bucks, and the noble game of lions and tigers was sometimes turned loose for the golden pleasures of the chase. Nine hundred and sixty elephants were maintained for the use and splendor of the king; his tents and baggage were carried into the field by twelve thousand great camels, and eight thousand of a smaller size, and the royal stables were filled with six thousand mules and horses. Six thousand guards successively mounted before the palace gate, and the service of the interior apartments was performed by twelve thousand slaves. The various treasures of gold, silver, gems, silk and aromatics, were deposited in a hundred subterranean vaults." Gibbon's Hist. vol. 4, p. 422. It was in view of the magnificent wealth of the Chaldean empire, no doubt, that in prophecy it is represented as the "head of gold," in the image presented to Nebuchadnezzar when it stood in the height of its glory.

Query.

"Are there two deaths implied in the penalty for Adam's transgression?" See Gen. 2:17. If not, what does Paul mean by being dead in trespasses and sin?" Eph. 2:1. E. P. K.

We should give an emphatic negative answer to this question. We find but one death intimated to Adam for his trangression, and that a death of the whole man. The Lord explains the penalty, in Gen. 3:19. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

When Paul speaks of those "who were dead in trespasses and sins," he is not speaking of a penalty, but a crime to be followed by the literal death of the man after judgment, unless he repents in this life. These were truly dead to righteousness, and alive in sin. They had no interest in righteousness, and hence in a state of mental death to holiness and purity of heart. Christianity had no place in their affections, and when one is in such a state, it is proper to say he is "free from righteousness," or "dead in trespasses and sins." There is no christian life in him, hence he has "the wages of sin," which "is death." The crime and penalty should not be confounded. He who is not mentally alive in well doing, must die physically for his wickedness; but being dead to righteousness is never mentioned as a penalty for sin.

Correspondence.

From E. Bellows.

Bro. Grant:—To the oft repeated inquiry of my friends as to my whereabouts, I would say that I have moved from Lafayette, my former residence, to East Greenwich, at Borton's Corner, about two and a half miles west of the village, and about four miles from River Point. I would say to the friends who have written me to visit them, that my health has been such that I have not been able to preach but a few times for more than two months. Through unceasing labors for nearly two years, my health is impaired and constitution well nigh broken down. During this time I have had many blessed seasons, and the Lord has sustained me, almost miraculously at times. Sinners have been converted, saints made to rejoice, some churches established, and gospel order observed.

My last tour was at Blackstone, Mass., on Chestnut Hill. Never did I spend a week more profitably; quite a number were converted, mostly young men. Being nearly worn down and attacked with sore throat, I was obliged to leave. The work still went on. Bro. Dixon of Peace Dale made them a visit, baptized a number, formed a church,—and their number had been increased to fifteen the last I heard from there.

Since I left Blackstone I have not been able to preach but little. My throat is better, but my lungs are in a weak state. I fear sometimes that there is an organic disease seated there. Brethren, pray for me, that I may have strength to labor a little more for my Master; for what is done must be done quickly. The Lord is soon to come. Already the thunders of the judgment are muttering in our ears. Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly. Amen.

The Revival in England.—We have before chronicled for our readers the interesting commencement of the daily revival labors and prayer meetings in Scarborough, England. We have now thrilling news of the progress of that movement of the Divine Spirit rising higher and higher. The daily prayer-meetings, both at noon and night, appear from the report in the London Patriot, to be multiplied and crowded, filling the several places of worship in the town daily and nightly. The exercises, in form and spirit, appear to be identical with those of our meetings. All sectarian distinctions are lost and forgotten, and special prayers, in view of special requests, are the order of the hour, as with us. The town is districted and visited throughout, from house to house, under the direction of a Union of the pastors and prominent layman of the several denominations. All the ordinary week day services of the different congregations have been suspended. It is impossible to say when these united services will terminate, as the interest seems daily deepening.—N. Y. Examiner.

☞ A law has been passed in France that Protestant churches shall receive no aid from abroad, and Protestant ministers must not only be natives, but educated in France. They are two of the most infamously proscriptive laws ever passed against freedom in religion.

☞ News has reached this city (New York) that in the city of London there are over one hundred daily prayer meetings after the order of New York; that there are more than one thousand in England; that there are one thousand in Scotland.

Obituary Notices.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Sister Lizzie M. Foster, of Falmouth, Me., fell asleep in Jesus, May 16, 1859, aged twenty-three years.

This beloved sister gave her heart to God a few years ago, but did not understand and embrace fully those truths that distinguish us "a peculiar people" till a few weeks previous to her death. Nothing seemed to cause her more joy than to learn that "the King is coming soon" to give rest to the weary pilgrim. Her sickness (consumption) was borne with remarkable patience; and although her sufferings at times were intense, not a murmur escaped her lips. But few perhaps have ever been permitted to enjoy more of the love of Jesus than did Sister Lizzie during the last few weeks of her sickness. Her dying counsels, and words of "farewell," seemed to touch every heart, and it is hoped will not be lost.

With the greatest calmness she made some arrangements in regard to her funeral, and when told that she was dying, shouted "glory, glory!" and without a struggle fell asleep in hope of very soon awaking to immortality, to sing the victor's song on mount Zion. That the best of "Heaven's blessings" may rest upon all in the mourning circle, is the prayer of the writer, who at her request, attended her funeral. R. R. York.

Yarmouth, Me, May 20th, 1859.

Died, in Dover, N. H., May 12, 1859, Lydia Jane Pinkham, wife of Joseph Pinkham, aged twenty-nine years, five months, five days.

She was converted in 1852, and joined the Methodist Church at Dover.—She expected to meet her Savior in 1854, but was disappointed. But believing him faithful who had promised, she continued to look and to pray for his return till her death. She was a kind, affectionate wife, and a devoted follower of the Lord Jesus. She fell asleep in Jesus, expecting to awake in his likeness, when he shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God. J. P.

Died, at Millbank, New Glasgow, Canada East, May 5th, 1859, Widow H. Lloyd, in her seventy-ninth year.

She has been a firm believer in the Advent doctrine since the year 1842, and she fell on sleep hoping soon to arise and be clothed with immortality at the coming of her Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. John Morrison.

THE SEAT OF WAR.

It is affirmed in a letter from Vienna that the Austrian commander intended to send a corps to Novi to destroy the railroad at that place, but the sudden rising of the Po rendered it necessary that the troops should return to the left bank of the river without delay. Had the Austrians reached Novi they would have cut off the railway communication between Genoa and Alessandria, and between those two places and Tortona, but the rain was so heavy, and the danger of a general inundation so imminent, that the commander of the detached corps did not deem it advisable to go far beyond Voghera.

Turin, May 11. Some Austrian siege trains, a regiment of infantry, and a detachment of Chasseurs, have recrossed at Gravelona, and directed their course toward Casal and Pusterlengo in Lombardy. Many of the enemy's troops are concentrated between Mortara, Palestro and Robbio. The head quarters of the Austrian staff are at Mortara."

The Paris Pays says that the depredations committed by Austria in Piedmont "are for the purpose of filling the military storehouses of Lombardy. They are literally stripping the Piedmontese provinces of hay, grain, provisions, and everything they can carry off," and, according to the French journals, they do this with the greatest rigor and cruelty.

The Pays also states that Rear Admiral Jeurien de Lagraviere had left Genoa in the Algesiras, for the Adriatic, to give notice to the military authorities that the ports of the Austrian coast are in a state of blockade.

Great Britain.

The Queen's proclamation of neutrality, which is an exceedingly formal document, was issued on the 13th.

The Times gives a long account of the immensely increased activity going on in the production of weapons and warlike preparations of all kinds at Woolwich, which is said to be as great as at the height of the Crimean war. The resources of the arsenal are equal to fitting out and issuing, in case of emergence, 500 guns per week of the best and largest ordnance. There are now 12,000 pieces of iron ordnance in store at Woolwich, of which 7000 are of the best make and modern calibre. At each of the great dockyards there are stores of from 1000 to 1500 heavy cannon. With regard to small arms, it is stated that there are about 90,000,000 rounds of Minnie ammunition in store, and the production of conical bullets is going on at the rate of 2,000,000 rounds a week.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says on the 12th:

"It is said the cavalry of the French is not yet complete, and that a good deal remains to be done concerning the balls for the rifled cannon. There are, or lately were, 10,000,000 cartridges in the arsenal at Genoa.

According to travelers and diligence conductors, the road from Susa to St. Jean de Maurienne is again in good order, and the bad weather that recently prevailed in the mountains had passed away.

The most rigid precautions continue to be taken to prevent the circulation of information concerning the war. Dispatches in cipher are no longer accepted by the telegraph hence."

The Moniteur of the 13th publishes the following account of the reception of the Emperor of the French at Genoa.

Genoa, May 12th—The Emperor arrived at Genoa at 2 P. M. No words can express the welcome given to his Majesty by all classes of the population. The port and roadstead to a great distance were covered with vessels and boats decked with flags. Ladies in elegant toilettes strewed flowers on the passage of the royal barge which conveyed the Emperor, the Prince de Carignano, and their staffs.

His Majesty, when he alighted at the Royal Palace, immediately received the civil and military authorities. The bearers of the medal of St. Helena were then admitted. These veterans were drawn up in the gardens of the palace, where the Emperor conversed with many of them, and received the petitions presented to him. The streets leading to the palace were filled by an immense crowd, which loudly expressed its joy at his arrival. The Emperor is in the enjoyment of excellent health."

France.

The Paris correspondents of the London papers are unanimous in describing the enthusiasm of the people upon the Emperor's departure for the army in Italy as immense.

The correspondent of the Herald report that the stern, unbending features of Louis Napoleon quivered with emotion, while the Empress was weeping without any attempt at concealment. The Emperor put his hands out of the carriage, and the barricade makers of the Rue St. Antoine, bending over and kissing them, saluted him with renewed cries of enthusiasm. When the cortege resumed its march, a band of workmen stood between the Imperial carriage and the Cent Gardes, and proceeded with it all the rest of the way, singing patriotic songs, including the Marseillaise. Never has the Emperor received such a conclusive proof of his popularity with the people, and the popularity of the cause which he was setting out to defend was equally demonstrated.

The Empress had already transacted business, and was to hold weekly reviews of the National Guard.

The Minister of Public worship had sent a circular to the Archbishops and Bishops of the Empire, directing that public prayers be offered up in all the churches for the success and protection of France.

The Austrian semi-official organ says of Russia:

"That power will not bind itself to any one, and will remain faithful to the programme of Prince Gortschakoff, not to meddle directly in European complication. All that Count Karolyi has been able to learn from Prince Gortschakoff is, that for the moment events must speak for themselves.

[From the London Times.]

THE CLARION OF WAR.

The war trumpet has rung out with loud, shrill blasts, and its notes are echoed from the farthest confines of Europe. Two of the greatest military powers of the world are approaching each other in battle array. The defiance has been given, the challenge has been accepted, and we are counting the hours before two mighty armies meet in deadly conflict . . . . Thus we see the German States who are neighbors of the belligerents, and on the confines of the seat of war, are girding up their loins and preparing their arms. Prussia is putting her whole army on a war footing, and the entire German Confederation are following in the wake. Russia, although remote from the scene, is gathering troops on her western frontier, casting keen glances from the Dnieper to the Danube and the Bosphorus. Even Switzerland, hardy, industrious, and wedded to peace, is mustering her armed citizens. We ourselves have not escaped the infection, and a warlike spirit is growing up in our midst. For the present, the Governments not actually committed to the war declare that they are arming only to protect their neutrality, and they are probably sincere. But the most pacific may be changed in a day. It is the manifest interest of Germany to maintain peace, and the German people can have no feeling in common with Austrian oppression in Italy. Yet we read of the enthusiasm of the Germans, not merely within the dominions of the Hapsburgs, but over the length and breadth of the land, in favor of war against France. It may be possible to moderate this fervor, and to keep it within bounds for a time, but the war spirit has been evoked, and none can say how long it may be restrained. Old antipathies will be revived, dormant ambitions will be awakened, and national pride will be aroused. Men with arms in their hands will grow impatient of inaction, and demand to be actors instead of spectators. The very people upon whom all the losses, the burdens, the calamities, and the woes of war must fall may come to urge their rulers forward. The dictates of reason are disregarded and the calculations of prudence are forgotten when the passions of nations are inflamed. Germany may now stand by while Austria engages her enemy single-handed on the plains of Sardinia, but if victory crown the arms of France, it is but too probable that the Confederation will move to the rescue of a German Power. Bitter recollections of French conquest are still cherished, and the cry of "defence of the fatherland," though raised by despotic Sovereigns, would be responded to by the whole population. At such a frenzied period, it would be vain to urge that the war was caused by the intolerable cruelties of Austrian misrule in Italy, or that Austria was the aggressor and provoked the conflict. When war begins its origin is forgotten, and the ultimate effects bear little relation to the primary cause. In England we have nothing in common with either of the principals, and yet we have an uneasy feeling that we may be drawn into the vortex. We are manning and arming ships, and preparing to station powerful fleets in the Channel and in the Mediterranean. In our dockyards and arsenals there is unceasing activity in the production of military stores and material.

Per Steamship New York. Advices of the 17th.

No battle had been fought in Italy up to the 16th.

The Emperor Napoleon and the king of Sardinia had fixed the head quarters at Alessandria, and had already arrived there.

All Sardinian vessels in Austrian ports are to be seized. All Austrians were withdrawn from Bobio.

France.

The Paris correspondence of the London Times says the confidence in the success of the army in Italy is so great that preparations will soon be made at Notre Dame for the Te Deum, in thanksgiving for a great victory.

All officers of the regiment of sappers, to be commanded by Prince Napoleon, left Paris on the 14th for Toulon.

A train of siege artillery had also left for Italy.

It is rumored that arms have been sent to Hungary, and that the Hungarians abroad are employed in fomenting insurrection in their country.

It is reported that the Emperor Napoleon, before leaving Paris, addressed a letter to Queen Victoria, repeating his promise to take no step during the war compromising the interests of England.

FRENCH MANIFESTO.

The Emperor Napoleon caused the following to be issued:—

Austria, in causing her army to enter the territories of the King of Sardinia, our ally, declares war against us. She thus violates treaties and justice, and menaces our frontiers. All the great Powers have protested against this aggression. Piedmont having accepted the conditions which ought to have insured peace, one asks what can be the reason of this sudden invasion? It is that Austria has brought matters to this extremity, that she must either rule up to the Alps, or Italy must be free to the shores of the Adriatic; for in this country every corner of territory which remains independent endangers her power.

Hitherto moderation has been the rule of my conduct; now energy becomes my first duty. Let France arm, and resolutely tell Europe:—"I desire not conquest, but I desire firmly to maintain my national and traditional policy. I observe the treaties on condition that no one shall violate them against me. I respect the territories and the rights of neutral Powers, but I boldly avow my sympathies for a people whose history is mingled with our own, and who groan under foreign oppression."

France has shown her hatred of anarchy. She has been pleased to give me a power strong enough to reduce into nonentity the abettors of disorder and the incorrigible members of those old factions whom one incessantly sees confederating with our enemies; but she has not for all that abdicated her task of civilization. Her natural allies have always been those who desire the improvement of the human race, and when she draws the sword it is not to dominate, but to liberate. The object of this war, then, is to restore Italy to herself, not to impose upon her a change of masters, and we shall then have upon our frontiers a friendly people, who will owe to us their independence.

We do not go into Italy to foment disorder, or to disturb the power of the Holy Father, whom we have replaced upon his throne, but to remove from him this foreign pressure, which weighs upon the whole peninsula, and to help to establish there order based upon legitimate satisfied interests. We are going, then, to seek upon this classic ground, illustrated by so many victories, the footsteps of our fathers. God grant that we may be worthy of them. I am going soon to place myself at the head of the army.

I leave in France the Empress and my son. Seconded by the experience and the enlightenment of the last surviving brother of the Emperor, she will understand how to show herself equal to the grandeur of her mission. I confide them to the valor of the army which remains in France, to watch our frontiers and to protect our homes; I confide them to the patriotism of the National Guard; I confide them in a word, to the entire people, who will encircle them with that affection and devotion of which I daily receive so many proofs. Courage, then, and union! Our country is again about to show the world that she has not degenerated. Providence will bless our efforts, for that cause is holy in the eyes of God which rests on justice, humanity, love of country, and independence.

Aspirations.

O, to behold my Savior's face,
To know the fullness of his grace,
To taste his love, his glory know!
Ah! this were more than all below.

To feel the heart at last secure,
[illegible] and filled, forever pure,
To know that naught beneath, above,
Can ever move me from his love;—

To feel that I at last may rest
With mercy crowned, with glory blest,
Beyond the reach of sin and woe,—
Ah! this were more than all below.

Hence, hence! ye fleeting things of time,
I pant for holier joys sublime,—
Joys of eternal, glorious birth,
Ah! they are more than all of earth.

And shall I e'er with Jesus be?
Is such a hope prepared for me?
Yes, and the bliss this hope doth give,
Is more than all that worldlings have.]

For the Crisis.

The War!

THE MISSION OF THE KINGS.

Italy is now fast becoming the grand theatre of the European war. Upon whatever pretext, France has been steadily provoking this struggle. To annihilate small nationalities and to extend the area of their own dominions, mapping out anew the countries of Europe, is manifestly the purpose of France and Russia. Austria must be brought into a war by some means, because Austria must be humbled,—and well may we ask,—does she not deserve it? No doubt it is designed to turn the territory of the German States into battle fields, as in the days of Napoleon the Great. Prussia, lying as she does, must necessarily be interfered with, and hence England must, if for no other reason, be brought into the conflict; for Prussia must resist, and with her, if not with Austria, England must resist.

Whether, says one, "we should defend our homes on the continent or on our own soil, is the question." Whatever reasons Austria may have for war, she could hardly avoid this alternative consistently with national honor. Napoleon needed war-work for his army and his people, for the security of his own throne,—he may fearfully jeopardise it by the expedient. Having resolved to leave France, to take possession of the army in Piedmont, he may find his government more difficult than his flattering pride and assurance suggest. There is a legitimate interest in France, a Bourbon line, not dead, a succession which England should delight to honor! England may care for herself, now that she has helped to preserve the "balance of power;" and on the policy that the existence of a great German power in central Europe is for her interest, and just begun to exhaust her war resources by the war in India.

So great are these complications, that diplomacy is at an end. War must follow! Who can see the finale! I need not speculate. I did not begin for the purpose of treating this subject as a merely accidental state of things, a condition brought about by the sagacity of some aspiring and grasping rulers, or want of diplomatic skill on the part of eminent statesmen. Far from it! The die is cast. The wild war-cloud rises on the eastern sky, by the wind of God. Neither Lord Cowley, nor any other diplomat, with all the pacific and politic arguments and resources, of which they are masters, could prevent the tendency of these influences, which have decided the question of peace or war. The storm is raised! Who can allay it? The tempest must now roll on. Who shall guide its revolutionary forces—mark its pathway of consternation and overthrow? I am not wise to calculate upon the ultimate result in the human view—who will be crushed and who will be victorious. Nay! for of the whole continent, "a whirlwind is raised up from the coasts of the earth." And now will they not "labor in the fire and weary themselves for naught?" Can the old condition of affairs return? Never! The claims of Austria to Italian possessions, it should seem, will now be annihilated. Such is the relation of Austria to the Pope, that with this should come the liberation of the States of Italy, and the end of the Pope's temporal power. So the Italians understand it.

The contest of Austria and Russia for ascendency in the western dependencies of Turkey, with the present advantage of Russia—she having an army of one hundred thousand men upon the Turkish frontier, and a smaller one on the Austrian frontier—will now become a terrible aggression on the part of Russia. By the policy of Louis Napoleon, who set on foot these complications, with the consent of the Russian autocrat, time has been gained, Austria placed in the wrong, the proposal for a Congress, the peace overtures of England, rejected. The "terrible debt" of humiliation owed by Russia and France must now be paid;—the abolition of the house of Hapsburg, with the tyranny of the Pope, all ground to powder together between these vast imperial alliances.

The "ten kings," which not merely when John [illegible] his visions, but at a point to which he was brought by his prophecy, [illegible] "as yet no kingdom," are the ten Italian States or kingdoms. The "ten horns" upon the beast, without crowns, represent these ten States or principalities. Hence, we behold their connection with the beast. They agree and give their power unto the beast, till the words of God be fulfilled. The beast that was, and is not, and yet is, is France under the Napoleon dynasty. That becomes the eighth king. Who has kept the Italians in check? The French! The Napoleon, French dynasty has ever been naturally opposed to the great temporal power of the Pope, and to Austria as occupying an entirely different position. To contend against the Pope and Austrian power, the Italians are prepared to arise as if to emancipate themselves from the bondage of centuries, and live under liberal constitutions. Sardinia, one of the "ten," has been in the interest of France from the first. Tuscany, another, has now given in her adhesion, and the grand Duke has fled. Austria has rushed into the very whirlpool of destruction. What of her one hundred and twenty thousand men in Piedmont, as part of the Sardinian territory—with France pouring her armies into the same small principality—Russia on the whole eastern half circle—Italy all rising—and the German States, becoming as before, the field of operations?

But it is a significant fact that now the attention of the best students of prophecy is turned to Italy as exhibiting a later instance of fulfillment, which shall place the power of the usurper, who assumes to govern for Christ, under foot. It is an ominous and solemn providential indication, that, now, Italy is the bone of contention between these hungry imperial wolves. And why all this?

The "ten kingdoms" which are most clearly those also indicated by the "ten toes" of the image in the dream of Nebuchadnezzar,—a part of Daniel's prophecy,—in the time of which God will set up his everlasting kingdom,—having given "their power" to "the beast" in its last form, the Napoleon dynasty being the head, shall follow the lead of the beast. That lead is to take Italy from the Austrians and the Pope. The "ten" shall hate the "harlot power"—the papal power, and all that supports it; and, with the beast, shall "make her naked and desolate, eat her flesh and burn her with fire." What language could express more perfect destruction? This is now the approaching destiny of the power of Rome! The imminency of her ruin, what student of the apocalypse can for one moment doubt?

What position will England, Protestant England, take? She has, by turns, aided every policy on the continent which might promise good to herself. She has helped, with Russia, to put down Buonaparte and give States to the Pope; has helped France against Russia, to keep the tottering Ottoman power alive; has leagued herself with the illegitimate ascendency of Louis; nursing a tiger in the sheepfold of nations, she must now spurn him from her bosom. She will have no one to fight but the common foe; then she must aid Austria and the Pope! Will she do it? If not, will she forsake Prussia? Is it not a complication? Little did England think, when the haughty, intriguing, treaty-breaking "man of destiny," kissed the cheek of England's fair queen, it was the hot blast of hell upon her court and pride, circling around her homes and firesides. She has only been following the interest of France, in all the alliance—who has managed to betray her altogether, even to the house of Romanoff. Her queen smiled at the inception of the most subtle and diabolical political establishment this world has known for centuries; whose only claim to power was, and is still, that France must have a ruler—a despotism, and cheerfully submit to the embrace of this imperial Judas to repent by defending her own shores. But it is all secured in the destiny of prophecy! There is a destiny of nations in the prophecy. It is not at all conditional.

Listen, men of God! Hark ye, saints, waiting God's trump! Think, now, one moment, careless sinner! "Be wise now, therefore, ye kings of the earth!" Oh, God! Is it the voice of Armageddon? Is it the shout of the valley of Decision? Is it the din of the battle of the great day? "Prepare war! Wake up the mighty men. Let all the men of war draw near!!!" "The nations shall rush like the rushing of mighty waters." Look over the old battle plains of the continent. On! on they come! It is the Lord's battle with the wicked dynasties and principalities of Europe. He has a controversy with the nations, beginning with Jerusalem, (oh, Lord, remember Jerusalem!) and going to the north countries, and to all the world. But the Lord must come down and fight! How, precisely, we may not fully comprehend, but he will be there! Why do the "heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?" To destroy themselves! These "ten" "shall make war with the Lamb, but the Lamb shall overcome them." True and faithful are his servants. Amen.

Note.—Two more of the ten States have declared for France.

☞ In the height of your prosperity, expect adversity, but fear it not; if it come not you are the more sweetly possessed of the happiness you have, and the more strongly confirmed; if it come, you are the more gently disposed, and more firmly prepared.

For the Crisis.

Come, Lord, and Reign!

Come, Lord, with trumpet strains,
Change earth's polluted plains
To Eden fair;
Come with thy angels bright,
All clothed in robes of light,
Through the air.

O, come, thou from above!
Thou city of our love,
With glittering dome;
With glorious scenes untold,
And streets all paved with gold,
The saint's sweet home.

Come from blest realms of light,
Change earth's dark, dreary night,
To endless day;
For here 'mid cares and toil,
And dreary earth's turmoil,
We wandering stray.

Come, save thy faithful few,
Who to thy bosom flew
When storms arose;
And lean on thee to save,
When Time's dark ocean wave
Tumultuous flows.

Then, when we've gained thy rest,
No more by earth oppressed,
In hallowed strains
We'll swell glad songs of praise,
Prolonged through endless days,
On Eden's plains.

For the Crisis.

Forty Facts for all Sorts of Sabbatarians.

BY T. W.

1. It is a fact that there is but one weekly Sabbath mentioned in the Bible.

2. It is a fact that there exists no proof that man did, or that he was required, to keep a Sabbath from the creation to the exode, a period of about 2514 years.

3. It is a fact that throughout all history we can discover no trace of a Sabbath among the heathen nations of antiquity; hence,

4. It is a fact that no nation except the Jews have ever observed the Sabbath.

5. It is a fact that the Jews, Talmudical writers and early fathers, regard the Sabbath as only given to the Jews after the exode.

6. It is a fact that the Edenic 7th day does not coincide with the Sabbath of the Decalogue.

7. It is a fact that Adam's first day corresponded with God's seventh day.

8. It is a fact that Gen. 2: 3, was not written until after the law was given at Sinai.

9. It is a fact that God gave (not restored) the Jews a Sabbath.

10. It is a fact that God never gave the Gentiles a Sabbath.

11. It is a fact that the Israelites never prohibited Gentiles from work on the Sabbath unless they were servants or proselytes.

12. It is a fact that Christ abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments (10) and ordinances. Baptist version.

13. It is a fact that the Pope did not change the Sabbath.

14. It is a fact that the early Fathers and reformers did not regard the fourth commandment as binding.

15. It is a fact that the Exodus Decalogue was destroyed, and hence the Deuteronomy one was the guide of the Jews.

16. It is a fact that the only reason given in either Decalogue for the Sabbath was because they had been servants in Egypt.

17. It is a fact that the only reason given elsewhere for the Jews to keep the Sabbath on the seventh day, was because God rested on a seventh in Eden.

18. It is a fact that we can discover no trace of a Sabbath even among those oriental nations who had the hebdomadal week.

19. It is a fact that throughout the entire range of Grecian literature no trace of Sabbath or Septenary institutions can be found.

20. It is a fact that no Pagan writer can be adduced who refers to the Sabbath otherwise than as a Jewish institution.

21. It is a fact that the Sabbath is a positive precept, not a moral one.

22. It is a fact that the Sabbath for the man was made, and not the man for the Sabbath. Hence the Sabbath was a servant and subservient to man, and not vice versa.

23. It is a fact that the Sabbath was a feast day, and all feast days have ceased.

24. It is a fact that a Jew could keep the ten commandments and be lost.

25. It is a fact that a Jew could violate the Decalogue and be innocent, and experience the condemnation of the law, and at the same time the justification of God.

26. It is a fact that the law has nothing to do with the motive, but only the deed.

27. It is a fact that there is no distinction between the law of God and law of Moses.

28. It is a fact that fornication, incest, bigamy, lying, cheating, dancing, and a thousand other immoral and unchristian acts, are no violation of the table law.

29. It is a fact that "thou shalt not kill," means man, Jews or proselytes.

30. It is a fact that "thou shalt not steal," means man, Jews or proselytes.

31. It is a fact that all nations cannot keep the Sabbath.

32. It is a fact that Christ did not once Sabbathize after his resurrection, a period of forty days.

33. It is a fact that the law could not give eternal life, but Christ can.

34. It is a fact that the law (Decalogue) was the Sinaiatic covenant.

35. It is a fact that the Sinaiatic covenant was one of bondage, from which we are now delivered by its being cast out.

36. It is a fact that if the table law is binding, then circumcision is.

37. It is a fact that we are saved by faith, but the law is not of faith, hence we are not saved by keeping the law.

38. It is a fact that no particular time or place is now more holy than another.

39. It is a fact that the early christians for 300 years did not recognize the Sabbath as binding, or hold to the Sabbatical nature of Sunday.

40. It is a fact that Sunday was never called the Sabbath by the early christians, nor by any one else for 1000 years afterwards.

The Cross.

"Orient pearls, at random strung."

If Christ died the cursed death of the cross for us, how cheerfully should we submit to and bear our cross for Jesus Christ. He had his cross, and we have ours; but what feathers are ours compared with his! His cross was a heavy cross indeed, yet how patiently and meekly did he support it! He endured his cross, but we cannot bear ours, though they are not to be named with his. Three things would marvelously strengthen us to bear the cross of Christ, and bring it a good report in the world.

I. We shall carry it but a little way.—If twenty crosses be written in God's book, they will come at last to nineteen, and after that to nothing.

It should be enough to me that Christ will have joy and sorrow to make up the life of the saints, and that each of them should have a share of our days, as night and day are kindly partners of time, and take it up between them. But, if sorrow be the greediest half of our days here, I know joy shall dawn, and more than recompense all our sad hours.

Let my Lord Jesus (since he will do so) weave my bit-and-span length of time with white and black—weal and wo; let the rose be neighbor with the thorn .... 'Tis true, Christ and his cross are separable in this life, howbeit, Christ and his cross parted at heaven's door; for there is no house-room for crosses in heaven. One tear, one sigh, one sad heart, one fear, one loss, one thought of trouble cannot find lodgment there. Sorrow and the saints are not married together; or suppose it were so, Heaven shall make a divorce. Life is short, and therefore crosses cannot be long. Our sufferings here are but for a while.—1 Pet. 5: 10. They are but the sufferings of the present time.—Rom. 8: 18.

II. As we shall carry the cross of Christ but a little way, so Christ himself bears the heaviest end of it. He says of our crosses, Half mine. He divideth sufferings with us, and takes the largest share to himself. O how sweet a sight it is to see a cross betwixt Christ and us. To hear our Redeemer say, at every sigh, at every blow, and every loss of a believer, Half mine. For they are called the sufferings of Christ and the reproach of Christ.—Col. 2: 24; Heb. 11: 26. As when two are partners and owners of a ship, half of the gain and half of the loss belongeth to either of the two; so Christ in our sufferings is half gainer and half loser with us; yea, the heaviest end of the black tree lieth on our Lord. Nay, to speak as the thing is, Christ doth not only bear half, or the better part, but the whole of our cross and burden; yea, he bears all, and more than all, for he bears us and our burden too, or else we should quickly sink and faint under it.

III. An innumerable multitude of blessings and mercies are the fruit and offspring of a sanctified cross. Since that tree was so richly watered with the blood of Christ, what store of choice and rich fruits doth it bear to believers.

Our sufferings are washed in the blood of Christ, as well as our souls; for Christ's merit brought a blessing to the crosses of the sons of God. Our troubles owe us a free passage, through him. Devils, men and crosses are our debtors; and death and all storms are our debtor, to blow our poor tossed bark over the waters, freight free, and to set the travelers in their own known ground. Therefore we shall die, and yet live.

I know no man hath a velvet cross, but the cross is made of what God will have it; but verily, though it be no warrantable bargain to buy a cross, yet I dare not say, O that I had liberty to sell Christ's cross, lest therewith also I should sell joy, comfort, sense of love, patience, and the kind visits of the Savior. I have but small experience of sufferings for Christ, but let my Judge and Witness in heaven lay my soul in the balance of Justice, if I find not a young heaven and a little paradise of glorious comforts, in suffering for Christ and his truth. My prison is my palace, my sorrow is pregnant with joy; my losses are rich losses, my pain easy pain, my heavy days are holy days and happy days, [illegible] I may tell a new tale of Christ to my friends.

O what I owe to the file, and the hammer, and the furnace of my Lord Jesus! who hath now let me see how good the wheat of Christ is, that goes through his mill and his oven to be made bread for his own table. Grace tried, is better than grace, and more than grace—it's glory in the infancy. Who knows the truth of grace without a trial? And how soon would faith freeze without a cross! Bear your cross, therefore, with joy.

The above is mostly taken from the writings of Flavel, with some alterations. Flavel, however, copied much of it from other writers. It may interest others as much as it has me.

Contrast between Time and Eternity.

"Here bliss is short, imperfect, insincere;
But total, absolute, and perfect there.
Here time's a moment, short our happiest state,
There infinite duration is our date.
Here Satan tempts and troubles e'en the best,
There Satan's power extends not to the blest.
In a weak, sinful body here I dwell;
But there I drop this frail and sickly shell.
Here feeble faith supplies my only light,
There faith and hope are swallowed up in sight.
Here love of self my bliss doth oft destroy,
There love of God shall perfect all my joy.
Here things, as in a glass, are darkly shown,
There I shall know as truly as I'm known.
Frail as the fairest flowers which bloom below,
There freshest palms on roots immortal grow.
Here wants and cares perplex my anxious mind,
But spirits there a calm fruition find.
Here disappointments my best schemes destroy,
There those that sow'd in tears shall reap in joy.
Here vanity is stamped on all below,
Perfection there on every thing shall grow.
Here my fond heart is fastened on some friend,
Whose kindness and life must have an end;
But there no failures can I ever prove;
God cannot disappoint, for God is love.
Here Christ for sinners suffer'd, groan'd and bled,
But there he reigns the great triumphant head.
Here, mock'd and scorn'd, he wore a crown of thorns,
A crown of glory there his brow adorns
Here error clouds the mind and dims the sight,
There all is knowledge, purity and light.
Here, so imperfect is this mortal state,
If blest myself, I mourn some other's fate.
At every human woe I here repine,
The joy of every saint shall there be mine.
Here, if I trust, the world shall pierce my heart,
But there, that broken reed and I shall part.
Here, on no promis'd good can I depend,
But there the "Rock of Ages" is my friend.
Here, if some sudden joy delight inspire,
The dread to lose it damps the rising fire;
But there, whatever good the soul employ,
The thought that 'tis eternal crowns the joy!"

How to Read with Profit.

For the sake of those who are not accustomed to systematic reading, we make some suggestions as to the best mode of reading, so as to gain the highest advantage from the books they peruse:

1. Ascertain the aim of the author. You will thus know what to expect from his book, and may save much time, which might otherwise be spent in looking for what you could not find. An attentive reading of the title-page, preface, and table of contents, will enable you to judge pretty accurately what the author is about. Some facts, too, which float only among intelligent men, will aid you greatly in these matters.

2. Read wakefully and attentively, and with a determination to comprehend thoroughly the book you are perusing. Read neither credulously nor skeptically, but candidly; endeavoring to go to the root of the matter, if possible. One hour of such reading is worth a week of the superficial reading which is so common.

3. Read with a good dictionary at your elbow, and consult it freely whenever you meet a word you are not sure you understand. Webster and Worcester are the best in general use. We use Webster. Never pass an important word without mastering its meaning in the work you are reading. In this way you will soon gain a good stock of words for your own use, while you are learning the meaning of the book you are reading.

4. After reading a chapter, close the book and try to recall, and state briefly in your own language, the substance of the chapter, in the order the author pursues. This is one of the most profitable exercises. It will show you just how much you have gained by reading. If you cannot do this, just read the chapter again. The second reading will probably do you some good. The first reading has been of little use to you, if you are unable to state what the main thoughts are.

5. If the book is your own—but not if it is a borrowed one—you may mark with a pencil the most important thoughts. You will thus remember them more easily, and can refer to them more readily.

Adopting these suggestions, you will read slowly, but what you read will become yours. It will stir up your own thoughts, and probably develop your mental powers as healthfully as any other discipline you can have.—Ohio Farmer.

The Bible Barrow and Barrowman.

This novel mode of colportage has been tried on the streets of Edinburgh for these ten days, and with wonderful encouragement. The barrow is crammed with Bibles, and ornamented with texts of Scripture upon placards, supported on poles from the centre and the corners. A modest, intelligent young man moves it about in the great thoroughfares; occasionally he reads a chapter to attentive audiences of young and old, ragged and dirty and drunken, or haply in a fashionable thoroughfare. Here a moustached fellow will curse, and demand who authorized him to come there with his books! The young man hears out the curse, and then softly replies, "The book that I sell says, 'Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain;'" and away slinks the gay heathen. A lady comes up; she sees a poor young woman reading the texts on the placards, and asks, "Would the girl like a Bible?" "Yes, mem," is of course the reply. A Bible is presented, and the young woman goes away rejoicing in her present.

Anecdotes might be related of the barrow's progress during these ten days past, which would fill a volume. We close at present with one which occurred in the High street. A crowd of last confession and dying-speech criers came round the barrow one day, some swearing and others laughing. One of them began to handle and inspect the Bibles; at last he asked what one of them would cost? "Eighteen pence, my man," was the reply. The speech-crier took out the money from his pocket paid it down, and marched off with his prize under his arm, saying, "I'm no gude at reading, but I'll try."—Scottish Press.

"Take no Thought for the Morrow."

That is, no anxious, fretful thought. Walk through to-day as well as you can, and God will undertake for your future. When you go forward out of to-day, to worry about it, you are over the fence, you are trespassing, and God will scourge you back into your own lot. When I have been fishing in a mountain stream, I have always found that so long as I kept a short line, I could manage my fishing very well; but when I let my line run out, the stream took it down, and there I was, at the mercy of every stick that stuck up in the stream, and every rock that jutted out from the banks. I lost my fish and I tangled my line; very likely I lost my footing also, and got over head and ears in the stream. Now, most men have cast out their line into life forty years long, when it ought to be but one day long. In consequence, they are not able to manage their tackle at all; but are pulled after it, stumbling first into this hole, and then into that; slipping up here, and slipping down there, struggling and splashing about in far more distressed fashion than the fish at the other end of the line—and, as a general thing, there is no fish there. Haul in your line!—Notes from Beecher.

Evil Suggestions.—Some years since I made the acquaintance of a clergyman. I met him again and again, and esteem was ripening into friendship, when happening to mention his name in the presence of a mutual acquaintance, he said: "Have you never thought him hollow-hearted?" I had never thought him so, and do not now think him so, yet to the last day of my life I shall not get rid of the impression made by that unkind, and, I think, unjust suggestion.

☞ God has written on the flowers that sweeten the air—on the breeze that rocks the flowers upon the stem—upon the rain drop that refreshes the sprig of moss that lifts its head in the desert—upon its deep chambers—upon every penciled sheet that sleeps in the cavern of the deep, no less than upon the mighty sun that warms and cheers millions of creatures which live in its light—upon all His works he has written—"none liveth for himself."

Mercies.

Still, soft and white, upon the tasseled pine,
The wreathing snows their graceful garlands twine,
The generous tribute lieth lightly prest
Upon each pointed spire and tufted crest;
Falling unheeded from the sky above,
Upon its brightness falls the chilling rain—
Dissolves in silence all the treasured gain;
Into the bosom of the green old tree,
Unseen the snow flakes sink all silently,
And with soft touch its hidden pulses move.

So on our heads, oh Lord, thy mercies fall,
Attend each sore distress, each sorrow small.
Evil—unthankful—whereso'er we go,
Thy love rests on us, lavish as the snow,
Unheeded oft from the abundance given.
Dark, heavy gusts of sorrow touch the soul,
And silently the burdened blessings roll
Into our hearts, unseen, to nourish there—
Perchance forgot—the Sacrament of Prayer!

When Education Begins.—A mother once asked a clergyman when she should begin the education of her child, which she told him was then four years old.

"Madam," was the reply, "you have lost three years already. From the first smile that gleams over the infant's cheek, your opportunity begins."

☞ Confession of a fault makes half amends.

Women in the Garden

Is a beautiful sight, lovely! What exercise more comely, invigorating, life-giving? Out-door exercise braces the whole system. This garden service was one of Eve's chief delights while in Paradise, and when compelled to leave, after her sad fall, how grievous.

"O unexpected stroke, worse than of death!
Must I leave thee, Paradise? Thus leave
Thee, native soil; these happy walks and shades,
Fit haunt of God's; where I had hoped to spend
Quiet, though sad, the respite of that day,
Which must be mortal to us both? O flowers
That never will in other climate grow,
My early visitation, and my last,
At even, which I bred up with tender hand
From your first opening buds, and gave you names,
Who now shall rear you to the sun, or rank
Your tribes, and water from the ambrosial fount?"

Is not the neglecting air and exercise one special cause of the beauty and rosy healthfulness of very many females fading so soon?

"In all schools the girls should study botany. In all families the women ought to practice botany. It is healthful, pleasing and useful. The principles of horticulture are the principles of botany put into practice. Farmers study agriculture, why should not their wives and daughters study horticulture? If any employment is feminine, it would seem that this is. If any is healthy, this must be. If any is pleasurable, none can be more so than this."—Golden Rule.

Heart Disease.

When an individual is reported to have died of a "disease of the heart," we are in the habit of regarding it as an inevitable event, as something which could not have been foreseen or prevented; and it is too much the habit, when persons suddenly fall down dead, to report the "heart" as the cause; this silences all inquiry and investigation, and saves the trouble and inconvenience of a repulsive post mortem. A truer report would have a tendency to save many lives. It is through a report of "disease of the heart," that many an opium eater is let off into the grave, which covers at once his folly and his crime; the brandy drinker too, quietly slides round the corner thus, and is heard of no more; in short, this "report" of "disease of the heart," is the mantle of charity which the politic coroner and the sympathetic physician throw around the grave of "genteel people."

At a late scientific congress at Strasburgh, it was reported that of sixty-six persons who had suddenly died, an immediate and faithful post mortem showed that only two persons had any heart affection whatever: one sudden death only, in thirty-three, from disease of the heart. Nine out of the sixty-six died of apoplexy, one out of every seven, while forty-six, more than two out of three, died of lung affections, half of them of "congestion of the lungs," that is, the lungs were so full of blood they could not work—there was not room for air enough to get in to support life.

It is then of considerable practical interest to know some of the common every day causes of this "congestion of the lungs," a disease which, the figures above being true, kills three times as many persons at short warning as apoplexy and heart disease together. Cold feet, tight shoes, tight clothing, costive bowels, sitting still until chilled through and through, after having been warmed up by labor or a long or hasty walk; going too suddenly from a close heated room, as a lounger or listener or speaker, while the body is weakened by continued application, or abstinence, or heated by the effort of a long address; these are the fruitful, the very fruitful causes of sudden death in the form of "congestion of the lungs;" but which, being falsely reported as "disease of the heart," and regarded as an inevitable event, throws people off their guard, instead of pointing them plainly to the true causes, all of which are avoidable, and very easily so, as a general rule, when the mind has been once intelligently drawn to the subject.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Spring Diseases.

A very large amount of the discomfort, lassitude, depression and actual sickness which prevails in the spring, can be modified or wholly avoided by the exercise of a little reflection and self-denial.

One of the main objects of eating in winter time is to keep us warm, and to that end, provident nature gives a vigorous appetite in cold weather; but if, as warm weather approaches, we eat with the appetite of winter, the system not having time to adapt the appetite to the temperature, mischief will follow as inevitably as if a locomotive is diminished in speed one half, while the fires are kept burning as fiercely as when it was moving at the utmost allowed rapidity. A prompt diminution at each meal of one-third of the amount eaten in winter, beginning before April in the latitude of New York, and earlier further south, would diminish spring diseases to an incalculable extent.—Ibid.

How to Sleep Well.

1. To sleep sweetly and refreshingly, be regular in your hours of retiring and rising.

2. Avoid all undue excitability.

3. Live temperately, eat light suppers, never retire with an overloaded stomach. Be simple in your diet always.

4. Lie down with a pure conscience.

5. Ask God to give his angels special charge over you during your unconscious moments.

"The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." Ps. 34: 7.

6. Finally, retire in faith, sleep on faith, rise up on faith, go about doing good all the time on faith.

It is said of John Wesley, the holy reformer, that he never lost a good night's rest, after consecrating himself entirely to God's service. His habits were regular. He had a stated time for retiring and rising. To these regulations he adhered with persevering conscientious scrupulosity. He was strictly "temperate in all things." He slept on faith. Almost as soon as his head struck the pillow, he was lost in a calm, sweet, refreshing slumber, and awoke not till God opened his eyes about 4 A. M., when he immediately arose to praise Him, and fight the good fight of faith.

The sleep of a wicked man is like his waking hours, as "the troubled sea, when it cannot rest—whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."—Ex.

☞ It is said that a bird suspended near the top of a curtained bedstead in which people sleep, will generally be found dead in the morning, from impure air. Small, close rooms in the habitations of the poor, are frequently as ill-ventilated as the curtained bedsteads are.

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

§ 8. The general tenor of Scriptural language.

There are two methods of human thought and investigation,—synthesis and analysis; the compiling of facts, and the examination of them singly. Neither of these methods is safe or complete without the other. When, therefore, I offer the general tenor of Scriptural language on this subject, I do not ask the reader to deem it worth a straw without some consideration of what the language means. For it is at least conceivable that after a hundred passages have been recited, sounding as if they supported one side of a question, they should be one by one transferred to the other side, or removed and thrown out as not referring to the subject,—belonging to neither side.

Before giving my list, therefore, or my enumeration, I remark that it includes the most of the passages that seem to refer to the future, if not the final destiny of man. It also does not include the greater number of passages in the Old Testament, that probably denote temporal destructions or deliverances of the Jews. I think not more than a tithe of the number I give could be claimed as of special Jewish application; and I willingly pay such a tithe in account with the seed of Abraham, with the single remark that if such Old Testament passages signify nothing beyond the grave, then the Jews know nothing beyond the grave. But then it becomes a fair question whether the passages do not contain a principle, and if the temporal deliverances and destructions were not types of similar results in man's relations to the immortal life. And if it is claimed that many of the passages I count refer to the life or death of the body but not of the soul, I reply that very few passages will be left to be referred to any immortal life. And the question whether they are to be taken literally or metaphorically, will be duly considered. Also the question whether those which speak of everlasting or eternal life, or life eis ton aiona, denote the life of the Christian dispensation, aionian life in some limited sense, or immortal life in the absolute sense.

A very few passages, obviously not referring to man's final destiny, (e. g. Isa. 38: 16,) are thrown in as suggesting the literal sense of others which may thus refer. Also two or three asserting God's immortality, because they contain phrases apparently denoting the destiny of good men.

I must ask the indulgence of the reader, or rather his assistance, referring as I do to most passages without quoting them. My best apology is that such passages ought to prove nothing either way if they are not read; and when they are read in their places, one has the benefit of the context.

TO LIVE; LIVING.

"This do, and thou shalt live." (Luke 10: 28; cf. Lev. 18: 5; Neh. 9: 29; Prov. 4: 4; 7: 2; Rom. 10: 5; Gal. 3: 12.) "Man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." (Deut. 8: 3; cf. Matt. 4: 4.) "Incline your ear and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live." (Isa. 55: 3; cf. 1 Sam. 1: 26; 17: 55; 25: 26; 2 Sam. 11: 11; Ps. 69: 32; 119: 175; Jer. 38: 20.)

"He is just; he shall surely live." (Ezek. 18: 9; cf. ch. 3: 21; 18: 17, 19, 21, 22, 24, 32; 20: 11, 13, 21, 25; 33: 10, 11, 13, 15, 16, 19; 37: 3-14.) "The just shall live by faith." (Rom. 1: 17; cf. Hab. 2: 4; Gal. 3: 11; Heb. 10: 38.) See also Ps. 72: 15; 118: 17; 119: 144; Prov. 9: 6; 15: 27; Isa. 26: 14, 19; 38: 16; Luke 20: 38; John 5: 25; 6: 57. ("He that eateth me, even he shall live by me"); 11: 25; 14: 19, ("Because I live, ye shall live also"); Rom. 6: 8; 8: 13; 2 Cor. 13: 4; Gal. 2: 19, 20; 1 Thess. 5: 10; 2 Tim. 2: 11; 1 John 4: 9.

"Shall be called holy, every one that is written among the living in Jerusalem." (Isa. 4: 3.) See also Ps. 27, 13; 52, 5; 56, 13; 69, 28; 116, 9; 142, 5; Matt. 22, 32; Mark 12, 27; Luke 20, 38.

TO LIVE FOREVER, (Gk. eiston aiona, Heb. l'olam.

"He that eateth of this bread shall live forever." (John 6: 51, 58.) See also Gen. 3, 22; Deut. 32, 40. ("I [Jehovah] lift up my hand to heaven, and say, I live forever"); Ps. 22, 26; 49, 9.

LIFE.

"Tree of life" (Gen. 2, 9; 3: 22, 24; Prov. 3, 18; Rev. 2, 7; 22, 14.) "The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God." (1 Sam. 25, 29.) "Thou wilt show me the path of life;" (Ps. 16, 11; cf. Acts 2, 28.) "I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life," (Deut. 30, 19; cf. 5, 15; Jer. 21, 8. This and the following passages I offer as typical, and as containing a principle; Deut. 32, 47: Ps. 30, 5; 34, 12; 36, 9; 91, 16; Prov. 3: 2, 22; 4: 22, 23; 5, 6; 6, 23; 8, 35; 10: 11, 16, 17; 11: 19, 30; 12, 28; 13: 12, 14; 14, 27, ("The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life"); 15: 4, 24, ("The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from Sheol beneath"); 19, 23; 21, 21; Eccl. 7, 12. "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth unto life; and few there be that find it," (Matt. 7, 14.) "It is better for thee to enter into life," etc., (Matt. 18: 8, 9; cf. Mark 9, 43-45.) "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments," (Matt. 19, 17.) "Shall not see life," (John 3, 36.) "Resurrection of life," (John 5, 29.) "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life," (John 5, 40; cf. 10, 10; 20, 31.) "I am the bread of life," (John 7, 35; cf. vs. 33, 48, 51, 53, 63; also ch. 1, 4; 8, 12; 11, 25; 14, 6; Acts 3, 15; Col. 3, 4; 1 John 1: 1, 2.

"Book of life," (Phil. 4, 3; Rev. 3, 5; 13, 8; 17, 8; 20: 12, 15; 21, 27; 22, 19.) "Water of life," (Rev. 21, 6; 22: 1, 17; cf. ch. 7, 17; John 4, 10; 7, 38.) "Crown of life," (Jas. 1, 12; Rev. 2, 10.)

See also Rom. 5: 17, 18; 7, 10; 8: 6, 10; 2 Cor. 2, 16, ("Savor of death unto death, and of life unto life"); 3, 6; 5, 4, ("Mortality swallowed up of life); Gal. 3, 21; Eph. 4, 18; Phil. 2, 16; Col. 3, 3; 1 Tim. 4, 8, ("Godliness, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come"; cf. 2 Tim. 1, 10); Heb. 7, 16; 1 Pet. 3: 7, 10; 2 Pet. 1, 3; 1 John 5: 12, 16.

ETERNAL OR EVERLASTING LIFE (zoe aionios.)

The phrase is found once in the Old Testament (Dan. 12, 2,) and forty-four times in the New Testament, easily found by the concordance. In most instances the expression is partitive, or designates a class of men. Whether the phrase implies immortal life, will be considered hereafter.

OTHER EXPRESSIONS APPARENTLY DENOTING IMMORTAL LIFE.

"He asked of thee life, and thou gavest it him, even length of days forever and ever," (Ps. 21, 4.) "Life for evermore," (Ps. 133, 3.) Immortality or incorruption. Athanasia, (1 Cor. 15: 53, 54; cf. 1 Tim. 6, 16.) Aphtharsia, (Rom. 2, 7; 1 Cor. 15: 42, 50, 53, 54; 2 Tim. 1, 10. The word also denotes incorruptness, as in Eph. 6, 24; Tit. 2, 7. King James' translation of the word is not bad.) Incorruptible, (Rom. 1, 23; 1 Cor. 9, 25: 15, 52; 1 Tim. 1, 17; 1 Pet. 1: 4, 23; 3, 4.)

TO DIE.

"Shalt surely die," (Gen. 2, 17; 3, 4; Ezek. 3, 18; 33: 8, 14.) "He that hateth reproof shall die," (Prov. 15, 10; cf. v. 28; 10, 21; 19, 16.) "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," (i. e., the very person that sins, Ezek. 18, 4; cf. vs. 18-32.) "That a man may eat thereof and not die," (John 6, 50; cf. 11, 26.) See also Luke 20, 36; John 8: 21, 24; Rom. 8, 18.

DEATH.

"He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me love death," (Prov. 8, 36.) This I offer as containing a principle respecting the future life. Cf. 10, 2; 11, 19; 12, 28; 13, 14; 14, 12; 16, 25; 18, 21; Ezek. 18, 32; 33, 11.) "If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death," John 8, 51; cf. ver. 52.) "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord," (Rom. 6, 23; cf. vs. 16, 21; ch. 5, 12, 14, 21; 1 Cor. 15: 21, 26, 54, 55, 56; also the following passages, from which some may argue the metaphorical sense: 7: 5, 10, 13, 24; 8: 2, 6.) See also 2 Cor. 2, 16, ("death unto death"); 3, 7; 2 Tim. 1, 10, ("hath abolished death"); Heb. 2: 14, 15; Jas. 1, 14; 1 John 3, 14; 5: 16, 17; Rev. 21, 4.

SECOND DEATH.

This phrase is put in contrast with "crown of life" "resurrection," "book of life," "water of life," Rev. 2, 11; 20: 6, 14; 21, 8. It will be further examined.

TO PERISH; TO BE DESTROYED.

These expressions are the same in the original. I select mostly from the New Testament. "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish," (Matt. 18, 14; cf. John 3, 15; 10, 28; 1 Cor. 8, 11. "A sweet savor . . . in them that perish . . . of death unto death," (2 Cor. 2: 15, 16; cf. 1 Cor. 1, 18; 2 Thess. 2, 10.) See also Luke 13, 3; Acts 8, 20; 13, 41; Rom. 2, 12; 1 Cor. 15, 18; 2 Pet. 3, 9. "Shall utterly perish in their own corruption," (2 Pet. 11, 12.)

"Able to destroy both soul and body in hell," (Matt. 10, 28; cf. Jas. 4, 12.) "Will destroy those husbandmen," etc. (Matt. 21, 41; Mark 12, 9; Luke 20, 16.) See also Rom. 14, 20; 2 Pet. 2, 12; 1 John 3, 8; Jude 5. "Every soul which will not hear that prophet shall be utterly destroyed (exolothreuthesetai) from among the people." (Acts 3, 23; cf. Deut. 4, 26.)

PERDITION; DESTRUCTION.

I discard the conventional sense of the word "perdition," which makes it the same with "damnation," remarking that it strictly means perishing or being destroyed. The question whether these words refer to the body alone, or to the being, is not here decided.

"To them an evidence of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God," (Phil. 1, 28; cf. Heb. 10, 39; 2 Pet. 3, 7.) "Son of perdition," (John 17, 12; 2 Thess. 2, 3.) "Foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition," (1 Tim. 6, 9.) "The beast . . . that goeth into perdition." (Rev. 17: 8, 11.)

"Broad is the way," etc., (Matt. 7. 13.) "Vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction," (Rom. 9, 22.) "Whose end is destruction," (Phil. 3, 19; see context.) See also 2 Cor. 5, 5; 10, 8; 13, 10; 2 Pet. 2, 1; 3, 16. "Everlasting destruction," (2 Thess. 1, 9; cf. 1 Thess. 5, 3; Ps. 52, 5; 92, 7; Isa. 10, 25; 13, 6. Whether this destruction admits a subsequent salvation is to be considered.)

As part of the general tenor of Scriptural language, I should name the class of

PASSAGES SUPPOSED TO IMPLY A GENERAL SALVATION.

Luke 20, 38; Rom. 5, 12-21; and 1 Cor. 15, 12-58, are named above. The others most important are the promises that "in Christ should all the nations of the earth be blessed," (Gen. 12, 3; 22, 18; 24, 4; Acts 3, 25; Gal. 3, 8; cf. Ps. 67, 2; 72: 11, 17; 86, 9; Isa. 2, 2; Mal. 3, 12; Rev. 15, 4.) The mission of Christ to seek and save the lost, (Matt. 10, 6; 15, 24; 18, 11; Luke 19, 10.) The declaration, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me," (John 13, 32.) The designation of Christ as the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," (John 1, 29; cf. 1 John 2, 2); as the "bread of God, that giveth life unto the world," (John 6, 33; cf. ver. 51); and as the "Savior of the world," (John 4, 42; 1 John 4, 14; cf. 1 Tim. 4, 10; 2, 4.) See also Rom. 11, 14. The paternal relation and character of God (Isa. 63, 16; 64, 8; Mal. 2, 10; Matt. 6, 9; Luke 11, 2; Acts 17: 26, 28; Heb. 12, 9; but see context, and cf. Ps. 103, 13; Ezek. 18, 4; Matt. 5, 45; John 8, 41-44; Rom. 8, 15.) The character of God as loving and merciful (in manifold passages.) The restitution of all things (Acts 3, 21.) The promises of Christ's universal dominion, (Phil. 2, 9-11; Isa. 45, 23; 1 Cor. 15, 24-28; Rev. 5, 13.) The destruction of death, Satan, and his works (1 Cor. 15: 26, 55; Gen. 3, 15; Heb. 2, 14; 1 John 3, 8; Rev. 20, 14: 21, 4.)

This list I do not offer as complete, so the reader will not be prejudiced by its brevity. Several passages concerning God's long suffering with and repeated forgiveness of the Jews, in the Old Testament, might be added as containing a principle.

Yet if passages declaring the mercy of God are brought into the list, those touching the divine anger, whatever that means, might be added; and as apparently asserting a limit to the divine forbearance, such a passage as Heb. 3: 7; 4: 11.

I have tried what I shall be proud if I have accomplished,—to give this "general tenor" impartially. I here add that I do not assume that any of the passages apply to man's final destiny. I simply insist that in the absence of all statement of man's immortality, this general tenor has great force; and the same silence respecting an immortal nature in man may admit the application of the common remark, that the literal or ordinary sense of words is prima facie the true sense, overruled only by special considerations. Whether the literal sense shall be applied to physical life and death, or to the question of immortality, is to be considered.

I am very far from asking or expecting that my opponent should examine all these four hundred passages, or even a small fraction of them. If he shows that those which I shall examine do not prove my proposition, I am answered, and that triumphantly, unless I happen to select the weakest passages for proof. For if my chosen texts do not contain my doctrine, there is left an a priori presumption against those I do not select. And if I have failed to present fairly the general tenor of the Scriptures, my opponent may do better.

§ 4. The exegetical or analytic argument.

So much for the general tenor or tone of Scriptural language respecting man's destiny. This is the synthetical argument, valuable in its place, but, as I said, indecisive without that other element of reasoning,—the inquiry what individual expressions mean.

I will now therefore examine a few of these passages more particularly; partly to meet certain arguments for their metaphorical sense, and partly to show more directly that they contain the literal sense, and apply to a final destiny.

Gen. 2. 17: "Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shall not eat of it, for in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die."

This is claimed, 1st, as applying to temporal or physical death only, not that of the soul; 2dly, as denoting moral or spiritual death only, and not that of the being.

To the first objection it is sufficient to reply for the present that no plain instruction appears to have been given our first parents of a distinction between body and soul as "body mortal" and "soul immortal." Hence, when they saw the brutes around them dying into nothingness, and heard the sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return, (Gen. 3: 19,) it seems to me they must have had small hope of immortality left, unless by a rescue and redemption. And whether the promised deliverance would accrue to their benefit, or to that of their seed only, they were not told particularly, so far as we are aware. And the expression in Gen. 3: 22,—"Lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever,"—seems a little discouraging in the hour of expulsion from so sweet a paradise. I query whether a Universalist, commissioned to execute the business, using his own words, would have said just so much and have then dropped the subject, to finish his work by guarding the tree of life with forbidding security (5: 24.)

But it is urged, both by the Orthodox and by Universalists, that literal death could not have been intended in the sentence in Gen. 2: 17, because our first parents did not actually die on the day of their sin. It is inferred that the death intended was a moral or spiritual death, commonly called death "in trespasses and sins;" and to support this view the expressions in Eph. 2: 1, 5; Col. 2: 13; Matt. 8: 22 ("Let the dead bury their dead"); 1 Tim. 5: 6, (is dead while he liveth"); Rev. 3: 1, (Thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead"), and some others, are frequently cited. And the apparently metaphorical sense of death in such passages gives a very respectable show of argument to show that the threatened penalty of sin is a death which does not kill.

But I think the argument is only apparent. True, as Adam did not die out on the day he sinned, there must be some figure or trope in the sentence; but it may still be a trope that leaves the literal sense intact. There is just such a figure in frequent use in the Bible and in the common speech of men. Thus, if a person has taken active or subtle poison, by which sooner or later he must die; or has provoked a mortal enemy; or has committed a capital crime, for which he must be detected and sentenced; or is falling from a precipice and must be fatally hurt if not dashed in pieces;—we say "he is a dead man!" And the time of his dying, whether instant or after long years, makes no difference in the proper import and truth of the expression. The literal sense, of course, remains. This figure,—of the anticipation of the future as if present,—is well known among the rhetoricians, who have bestowed upon it the classic name of prolepsis. I said it occurs in the Bible. The Egyptians applied it to themselves, when the angel of death had smitten their first-born: "We be all dead men." And so the Israelites, when the troop of Korah was suddenly destroyed; "Behold, we die; we perish; we all perish." And God himself is represented as speaking in the same way to Abimelech; "Behold thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken."

And language very similar to that in Gen. 2: 17, occurs in two parallel passages. In Ex. 10: 28, Pharaoh says to Moses: "Get thee from me; take heed to thyself, see my face no more; for in that day thou seest my face, thou shalt die." Would any one have questioned the veracity of the king, if his threatening had been incurred, and executed after several days, or even a few weeks or months? Again, in 1 Kin. 2: 36, 37, Solomon says to Shimei: "It shall be that on the day that thou goest out, and passest over the brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain that thou shalt surely die." Shimei did go, in pursuit of two fugitive servants (under the law of Congress, we suppose, as Solomon had no statute so convenient, and thus by a long prolepsis of 3000 years anticipating the future as already present,) all the way from Jerusalem to Gath, and then from Gath to Achish,—several days' journey. Did that make the threatening word of Solomon out of date? His last words tell his evident meaning: "Thy blood shall be upon thine own head."

I take the meaning of Gen. 2: 17, to be, then, that life was forfeit by transgression. And this might be the life of the soul no less than of the body; nay, it must appear so if there were no clear intimation that the soul was spared. And the earliest versions and paraphases, besides able commentators, support the view I have given. The Greek translation of Symmachus (A. D. 200) renders the phrase: "Thou shalt be mortal." The Syriac gives the same sense, which is accepted by Jerome and by Grotius. The Arabic renders it: "Thou shalt deserve to die." The Targum or paraphrase of Jonathan: "Thou shalt be subject to death," or guilty of death (reus mortis;) in like manner Isidore of Pelusium, and an eminent Rabbi, Nachmanides. Some of the Hebrews understood it to mean immediate death, averted by repentance. (See Fagius, in Poole's Synopsis.) Other writers say: "The phrase, Thou shalt die, does not signify the fact of dying, but its necessity and desert." (Cornelius a Lapide, et al. in Poole's Synopsis.) Vatablus interprets: "Thou shalt be subject to death, both of body and soul." And Fagius adds that the Hebrews deny not this two-fold death. Others: "Say rather that Adam then began to die; that is, by a lingering death of inward wasting and decay." The above are all, save one, varieties of the same proleptic sense, and all are varieties of the literal sense. They differ in form only, while they agree in substance. The sense I have given is also approved by Anselm among the mediæval Fathers, and by Dr. Knapp and Dr. J. Mueller, among modern German divines.

Of the Jewish opinions I may give some glimpses elsewhere. But the following, from a Rabbi of the 16th century, Abarbanel, who knew how to talk of the immortality of the soul, is significant. He says: "The wicked in their life time are called dead, and their soul is to be destroyed with the ignominy of the body, and will not have immortality or eternity." (Summary of the Faith, c. 24.)

And in one or other of the following passages of the New Testament supposed to sustain the metaphorical sense of death,—Matt. 8: 22; Rom. 6: 11; 8: 11; Eph. 2: 1, 5; Col. 2: 13; 1 Tim. 5: 6; Rev. 3: 1,—I find the sense I have given supported by Theoderet, Chrysostom, Augustine, Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, Turretin, Calovius, Pareus, Calixtus, Gomar, Grotius, Vitringa, Bengel, Michaelis, Bretschneider, Wahl, Rueckert, Flatt, Fritzsche, Kauffer, Tholuck, Meyer, Hammond, Whitby, Clarke, Macknight. In this view, to be "dead in trespasses and sins" will mean, to be subject to death by reason of trespasses and sins. And this agrees naturally with the expressions in Ezek. 18: 18; "He shall die in his iniquity." And v. 24: "In his trespass that he has trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die." And John 8: 21, 24; "I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins." And 1 Cor. 15: 17: "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins." The last expression is used of the Corinthian Christians, who were supposed to be converted, regenerate, and no longer in the guilt or bondage of sin. Here the only possible sense is, subjection to the effects or penalty of sin, which is death. Here appears very finely the sense of the Latin word reus, and of the old English word guilty,—i. e. liable, but not of course ill deserving.

Some of the above writers are restorationists. The most, indeed, are Orthodox. But my Universalist friends will hardly quarrel with that fact, since the interpretation, so far as it affects the present question, is as unfriendly to the Orthodox view as to the Universalist. It goes to refute the notion of a metaphorical death that spares the immortal life of the soul. And hence the effort of a late writer against the view I hold to show that these passages do signify spiritual death.*

But I am willing, for argument's sake, to give up any support to my view that [illegible] from my interpretation of all these passages. Allow, for a moment, that, "death in trespasses and sins" denotes morally or spiritually dead. What is gained, either to the Orthodox view or to the Universalist? If this death is like disease, it remains to be shown that it is not mortal,—that sin is not to the soul what fatal disease is to the body. The metaphorical sense may thus include, rather than exclude the literal sense. So we say of the abandoned inebriate that he has "destroyed" himself. Instead of foolishly arguing that since he is not dead yet, but staggers boisterously about, he will live forever, and never drop into a drunkard's grave,—we say he will certainly die just because he has destroyed himself. So a moral and spiritual death may foreshadow and atmosphere a real and final death of the soul. We shall meet this question again. But here it may be remarked that the expression "dead in trespasses and sins" supports the notion, if not of radical badness in human nature, at least of radical defect; and thus it supports some of the previous argument against the Universalist view. The word dead is a strong word even in a metaphor. The literal sense of Gen. 2: 17, is, I think, pretty fairly sustained. And though the view runs counter to the prevalent notions about the immortality of the soul, the passage applies to the soul as naturally as to the body. And this literal and extended application is proved, I think, by a few passages that speak of life as a thing to be chosen and gained, and of death as to be shunned. I will name two or three passages. One is in

Ezek. 18: 31, 32: "Make you a new heart and a new spirit; for why will ye die, O house of Israel? For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God; wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye."

I think the whole chapter and the class of sins which it mentions, do not favor the reference of this passage to the national life of the Jews as a people. It is remarkable as asserting and insisting on the personal accountability of each man for himself. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," and not one for another's fault. Does the passage then refer to the prolonging of life in this world? It does, indeed, unless we suppose the Jews had such hopes of a future life, in their own land, by a resurrection, that they might well understand those words as applying thus. I will not positively affirm that they looked so far into the future, in Ezekiel's time; though they did afterwards. If they did then, the passage decidedly favors the future life of the righteous alone. If they understood it only of long life on earth, it has only a typical value in my argument, though that is something.

* Prof. Hovey (State of the Impenitent Dead, § 5) takes no notice of the authorities given in my book for the proleptic sense of Gen. 2: 17. His reader might think that I stand alone in my exegesis. He argues against it on the ground that such a lively figure of speech would not suit the formal announcement of a law and its penalty. It might be so in modern legislation, made into a special branch of government and a special business of a deliberative assembly. But God's personal and earnest words to Adam required no formality. This argument and the other reasons given by Prof. H. are freely submitted to those who read both sides.

From Fables of Infidelity.

Science, or Faith.

II. We may now proceed to inquire whether or not faith, which we have found so prevalent even among those who repudiate it, is a thing to be ashamed of; or if it be a sufficiently certain and reliable basis for human life and conduct.

1. We are met at the very outset by the great fact that God has so constituted the world and every thing in it, that in all the great concerns of life we are necessitated to depend on faith; without any possibility of reaching absolute certainty regarding the result of any ordinary duty. We sow without any certainty of a crop, or that we may live to reap it. We harvest, but our barns may be burned down. We sell our property for bank-bills, but who dare say they will ever be paid in specie? We start on a journey to a distant city, but even though you insure your life, who will insure that fire, or flood, or railroad collision may not send you to the land whence there is no return?

Science is the child of yesterday; but from the beginning of the world men have lived by faith. Before science was born, Cain tilled his ground without any mathematical demonstration that he should reap a crop. Abel fed his flock without any scientific certainty that he should live to enjoy its produce; and Tubal Cain forged axes and swords without any assurance that he should not be plundered of his wages. All the experience of mankind proves that experimental certainty regarding the most important business of this life is impossible. By what process of philosophical induction is religion alone put beyond the sphere of faith and hope? If religious duties are not binding on us, unless religion be scientifically demonstrated, then neither are moral obligations; for these two can not [illegible] but scientific men are bound to tell the truth and pay their debts, and that a person may not fear God and go to heaven unless he has graduated at college? The common sense of mankind declares that we live by faith, not by science.

2. We demand the knowledge of truths of which science is profoundly ignorant. Science is but an outlying nook of my farm, which I may neglect and yet have bread to eat. Faith is my house, in which all my dearest interests are treasured. Of all the great problems and precious interests which belong to me as a mortal or an immortal, science knows nothing. I ask her whence I came? and she points to her pinions scorched over the abyss of primeval fire, her eyes blinded by its awful glare, and remains silent. I inquire what I am? but the strange and questioning I is a mystery which she can neither analyze nor measure. I tell her of the voice of conscience within me—she never heard it, and does not pretend to understand its oracles. I tell her of my anxieties about the future—she is learned only in the past. I inquire how I may be happy hereafter—but happiness is not a scientific term, and she can not tell me how to be happy here! Poor, blind science!

3. All our dearest interests lie beyond the domains of science, in the regions of faith. Science treats of things—faith is confidence in persons. Take away the persons, and of what value are the things? The world becomes at once a vast desert, a dreary solitude, and more miserable than any of its former inhabitants the lonely wretch who is left to mourn over the graves of all his former companions—the last man. Solitary science were awful. Could I prosecute the toils of study alone, without companion or friend to share my labors? Would I study eternally with no object, and for no use; none to be benefited, none to be gratified by my discoveries? Though you hung maps on every tree, made every mountain range a museum, bored mines in every valley, and covered every plain with specimens, made Vesuvius my crucible, and opened the foundations of the earth to my view—yet would the discovery of a single fresh human footprint in the sand fill my heart with more true hope of happiness, than an endless eternity of solitary science. I can live, and love, and be happy without science, but not without companionship, whose bond is Faith.

Faith is the condition of all the happiness you can know on earth. Law, order, government, civilization, and family life, depend not upon science, but upon confidence in moral character—upon faith. In its sunshine alone can happiness grow. It is faith sends you out in the morning to your work, nerves your arms through the toils of the day, brings you home in the evening, gathers your wife and your children around your table, inspires the oft-repeated efforts of the little prattler to ascend your knee, clasps his chubby arms around your neck, looks with most confiding innocence in your eye, and puts forth his little hand to catch your bread, and share your cup. Undoubting faith is happiness even here below. Need you marvel, then, that you must be converted from your pride of empty, barren science, and casting yourself with all your powers into the arms of faith, become as a little child before you can enter into the kingdom of heaven?

4. But religion is not founded upon faith as distinct from observation and experiment. It is the most experimental of all the sciences. There is less of theory, and more of experience in it than in any other science. Its faith is all practical. It is a great mistake to suppose that faith is the opposite pole of experience. On the contrary, experience is just the fruit which ripens from the blossom of faith. We have seen how an underlying conviction of the existence of an intelligent planner and upholder of the laws of nature is the source of all scientific experiment, and systematised knowledge. A similar underlying conviction of the existence of a moral governor of the world is the source of all religious experience. He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of those that diligently seek him. But this fundamental axiom believed, long trains of experience follow: of every one of which you can be, and actually are, infinitely more certain than of any fact of physical science. Your eyes, your ears, your touch, your [illegible], may be deceived—but [illegible] can not. If your soul is filled with joy, that is a fact. [illegible] If you feel miserable, [illegible] habits on your body and soul, and the fearful thought that by the law of your nature these vipers which you vainly struggle to shake off, will forever keep involving you more closely in their cursed coils—these are facts of your experience. You are as certain that they give you disquiet of mind, when you entertain them, as that the ... rages in a tempest; and that you can no more prevent their entrance, nor compel their departure, nor calm nor drown the anxiety they occasion, than you can prevent the rising of the tempest, dismiss the thunder-storm, or drown Etna in your wine-glass. Of these primary facts of moral science, and of others like them, you possess the most absolute and infallible certainty from your own consciousness. They result from the inertia of moral matter, which, when put into a state of disturbance, has no power of bringing itself to rest, expressed in the formula, There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. Isa. 48: 22. * * * *

5. The facts of religious experience are better attested, and more unobjectionable than those of any other science.

Unless they can be shown to be unreasonable or impossible, we are bound to receive them, when presented by the experimentists who have discovered them, though personally we may not have any such experience; just as we believe the chemists, or the astronomers who relate their discoveries which personally we have not observed. But the facts of religion are by no means unreasonable. They can not be shown to contradict any known law of the human mind. It is true they are mysterious. But so are the facts of physical science—heat, light, electricity, gravitation. Of either, we may be quite certain that such phenomena exist, and utterly ignorant of the mode of their operation. It were as utterly unphilosophical to deny that Almighty God could impart nervous energy to the languid limbs of your sick neighbor, because you are ignorant of its origin and means of transmission, as to deny that God could impart spiritual electricity to his paralyzed soul, because you are ignorant of the mode in which he bestows it. And ignorance is all you can plead in this case. You must just admit that having tried an experiment which you have not, your religious friend has a right to know more than you.

Moreover, the facts of religion are presented for belief upon the most abundant and reliable testimony. In physical science you must rely on the testimony of a very few observers—the great bulk even of scientific men having no opportunity of testing the facts themselves, and being well satisfied if any fact is confirmed by the testimony of two or three philosophers—and this testimony often contradictory, and always fallible, as the discordant results of their experiments prove. But here you have a great multitude of experimentists, in every city and village of the land, of every variety of intellect and education, prosecuting the same course of experiments, and all arriving at the same results.—They do not all confess the same sins, but they all felt the power of some sin, and felt miserable in their guilt. And however they may differ in their external circumstances, their inward constitution, or in their views of the outward part of religion, there is no difference among them about the great facts of their religious experience. They all believed the faithful saying that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, cried to God for mercy through him, and received peace of mind, grace to live a new life, and to delight in the worship of God. Do you know any science which has been prosecuted by one hundredth part of this number of inquirers? Which has been confirmed by one thousandth part of this number of experimenters? Or any experiment tried with such uniform and unfailing success as this, Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. Rom. 10th ch. Why then do you hesitate to admit the correctness of these facts? Is it because you perceive they lead to results which you dislike? They do lead to results. They are effects and tell us of a cause. They are powerful effects, and proclaim a powerful cause. They are moral and spiritual effects, and assure us of the existence of a moral and spiritual agent who has caused them. They are holy effects, and convince your sinful soul that they are produced by a holy being. But they are also benevolent, life-giving, blessed effects, and proclaim that God is love. The Lord the Spirit is as plainly declared in the facts of religious experience, as the Creator is in the creation of the universe; and it were as rank Atheism to attribute these orderly and blessed results to chance or to evil passions, as to attribute the Cosmos to blind fate, or to the beasts that perish. He is as much an enemy to his happiness who denies the one, as a foe to his reason who rejects the other. Dear reader, why should you not believe in, ... The only science which can make you happy? which can bestow peace of mind, ... nerve you to conquer your evil habits, enable you to live a holy and happy life, and ... the ... blessed hope of a glorious resurrection? You know there is no science ... which ... any such effects, or which you ... [illegible] ... But the Bible ... the science which does, and enables you ... [illegible] ... The facts of religious ... [illegible] ... most convincing evidence ... the reality and power of the grace of God. It were as easy to persuade a Christian that he had produced this change of heart and life by the excitement of his own feelings, as that he had kindled the sun with a lucifer match. And the character of the work and the worker assures him that it will not be left unfinished. His faith receives those facts of religious experience as the first installments upon God's bonds, and as pledges for the payment of the remainder of his promises. The joy and peace which God gives him now, prove most satisfactorily his ability and willingness to give him larger measures of these enjoyments when he is capable of receiving them. Just as we have good reason to believe that he who has made the sun to rise out of darkness will guide him onward in his course to perfect day, have we also good reason to believe that he that hath begun the good work of his grace in us, will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ. Christ is in us the hope of glory. This eternal life, which is begun in our souls, is so much superior to mere animal vitality, that we can not doubt that he who has given us the greater, will also give us the lesser, and quicken our mortal bodies also, by his Spirit which dwelleth in us. We know that our Redeemer liveth.

Correspondence.

From D. Kinsman.

Bro. Grant:—I would like to write a few lines for the Crisis. About the year '37 I heard good old Father Miller preach on the second coming of Christ, and although I was in the gall of bitterness and bonds of iniquity, I heard him preach with much interest. I was not then willing to give up the pleasures of sin for an interest in the Man of sorrows, but, finally, after striving against the Spirit for about three years, I believe that God for Christ's sake forgave my sins. Praise the Lord for his great goodness. It is good to serve the Lord. I did not hear any more preaching on the second coming of Christ until about the year 1843, when I believed that we should see the King in his beauty. But our Lord did not come; and it is true that a great many that then stood up for Jesus have now turned their backs upon him and say that they will not have this man to rule over them. In the spring of '44 I moved to Collinsville, Ct., but did not constantly enjoy the love of God in my heart. In '54, Bro. Grant came to Collinsville, and preached. It waked up many who were almost asleep, and showed them their danger. The fire was almost out, just a spark left, that was all. But, bless the Lord God, that spark was kindled into a flame and has burned ever since.

Brethren in Collinsville, I have enjoyed many blessed seasons with you in class meetings and in prayer meetings. Bless the Lord. It has done me good many times to hear the brethren and sisters testify to the goodness of God and to sing his praises. Brethren, hold on to the promise; don't give up the ship; she will soon come into harbor, and then we will sing the song of deliverance—Home at last! Let us be watchful and prayerful, so that when He comes we may be found of Him in peace, and be permitted to dwell on the new earth where my Father's family will all meet in love, peace and harmony. With the blessing of God I will meet you there.

From C. W. Bemis.

Bro. Grant:—Permit me through the columns of your excellent paper to communicate a few words of encouragement to some, and to let others know that I am still striving to serve the Lord, that I may be prepared to meet him at his coming.

I praise the Lord for the gift of his dear Son, and for the way of life and salvation; for the many precious promises contained in his word—that they were made to me.

I have had many trials to encounter the past year, but I begin to see they were working for my good; for we know that all things work together for good to them that love the Lord; to them who are called according to his purpose.

Brethren and sisters, I think I have had a foretaste of that glory that is to be revealed at the coming of Christ, which fills my soul to overflowing, and I intend with his help so to live that he will say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of thy Lord."

Living by the Moment.

Do you, reader? Is there any other safe, profitable, joyful, scriptural way? This living by the moment, is the sum and substance of all we mean by entire consecration, "holiness to the Lord." Living by faith on the Son of God every moment, we live above the world, above sinning. Can we sin while looking intently to Jesus our Savior, meekly, humbly, confidently, perpetually? rejoicing in his love, his great salvation, doing whatsoever he commands us? This living by the moment is the great secret of all holy living, the Bible doctrine for sanctification. All is on the altar, kept on the altar, time, talents, property, friends, reputation, influence, unbelief, all is given up, all set apart exclusively to God's service. Our wills are God's and God's ours. Any objection to this plain, brief, definition of perfect love? Will not every true disciple subscribe to it heartily? Brother, do you wish to live well, glorify God still, die well? Live by the moment.—Ex.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JUNE 8, 1859.

The Spirit.—No. 10.

"The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Notwithstanding the Bible makes no mention of an "immortal" or "never dying spirit," people have believed it so long, it is difficult to persuade them to let go of traditions and rely wholly upon the Bible for evidence to sustain their position. The more candid confess that the immortality of the spirit is taken for granted, rather than plainly expressed; but their fathers believed it, their minister preaches it, and consequently they suppose it is true. When we are shown that the Bible harmonizes with the idea that man is an immortal spirit, we shall be ready to believe it. If man has such a spirit which thinks, wills and reasons, when he is dead, why is it not specified somewhere in the Scriptures?

We will now notice some more examples where pneuma is used to represent a state of feeling. "Now while Paul waited for them at Athens, his (pneuma) spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry." Acts 17: 16. "Not slothful in business; fervent in (pneuma) spirit; serving the Lord." Rom. 12: 11. "I had no rest in my (pneuma) spirit, because I found not Titus my brother." 2 Cor. 2: 13. "Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and (pneuma) spirit." 2 Cor. 7: 1. "Be renewed in the (pneuma) spirit of your mind." Eph. 4: 23. "Stand fast in one (pneuma) spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel." Phil. 1: 27. "Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold . . . but . . . the ornament of a meek and quiet (pneuma) spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." 1 Pet. 3: 3–4. "Ye have not received the (pneuma) spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the (pneuma) spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The (pneuma) spirit itself beareth witness with our (pneuma) spirit, that we are the children of God." Rom. 8: 15, 16. How do we know when our sins are forgiven?—By our feelings. What produces this change?—The Holy Spirit acting upon our feelings, or nervous system. What feelings are thus produced?—"Love, joy, peace," etc. These feelings are the fruits of the Holy Spirit, and give us evidence that our sins are forgiven. "God hath given them the (pneuma) spirit of slumber," margin, remorse. Rom. 11: 8. "Shall I come unto you . . . in the (pneuma) spirit of meekness?" 1 Cor. 4: 21. "God hath not given us the (pneuma) spirit of fear." 2 Tim. 1: 7.

Without quoting further examples, we think all must be satisfied that pneuma is frequently used to indicate a state of mind or feeling, but in these cases it does not denote something that acts independent of man's physical organism, when he is buried in the grave.

It sometimes happens that our opponents endeavor to turn the subject into ridicule by substituting the word breath in these examples. Such should remember that something more than ridicule, founded on false premises, is necessary to convince us we are in error on this point. No intelligent Bible student would claim for a moment that pneuma and ruakh always mean breath.

"The (pneuma) wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth." John 3: 8. In this example, pneuma is used to represent the air, or "breath of life." So in Mark 8: 12. "And he sighed deeply in his (pneuma) spirit." Sighing is the result of a peculiar kind of breathing. The Syriac version reads:—"He sighed with his breath." This is the true idea. He knows of no other way to sigh. This breath of life is essential to sustain life, and when taken away, death immediately succeeds, the agonies of dying end, and the sleep of death begins. When persons have been suffering extremely, they have often prayed the Lord to take away this pneuma or breath of life, that their pains might end. This was the case with Stephen, and in answer to his prayer, it was taken away and "he fell asleep . . . and devout men carried Stephen (not his house) to his burial." The same is true of our Savior, at the time of his death on the cross. After resigning his (pneuma) spirit, or breath, into the hands of the Father, "he gave up the ghost." Wakefield, Thompson, Mace, Campbell, Wesley, Whiting and the Syriac read,—"He expired," instead of "He gave up the ghost," which is the correct idea. No one can die till the pneuma, or "breath of life" is taken away. "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled, thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust." Ps. 104: 29. Before they can live again, they must be reorganized and again receive "the breath of life." When speaking of the "two witnesses" who were slain, the Revelator says:—"And after three days and an half the (pneuma) spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet." Rev. 11: 11. Wakefield renders it "the breath of life." The latter agrees with all plain passages on this point. The whole Bible seems to harmonize with the position that ruakh and pneuma are used to denote not only beings, state of feeling, and an influence, but the atmosphere surrounding this earth, which is called "the breath of life," without which, all living creatures would die at once, and return to dust; and that nothing else leaves us at death, or returns into us at the resurrection. And we have failed to find any thing in the Old or New Testament, which teaches that the spirit, or pneuma, which leaves us at death, is immortal or conscious when taken away from us.

Suppose a living man be put into a metallic coffin, which was afterwards closed and hermetically sealed, and this enveloped in another several feet thick, sealed in the same way, where should we look for the man,—the accountable being,—in heaven, hell fire, or the coffin? Is he praising God among the angels, wailing with the damned, or asleep in death? What will become of that man if the dead rise not? Paul answers:—"If there be no resurrection of the dead . . . then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are PERISHED."

Poultney, Vt.

Monday, May 30th, '59. We have just closed another interesting visit among the good people in this pleasant village. We rarely find hearts more noble, generous and kind, nor a christianity more pure, than is here exhibited by the disciples of Jesus. It is an oasis in earth's dreary waste, a resting place for weary pilgrims who are "homeward bound" to the "Eden of love." The Spirit of their great King rests upon them, and they exhibit much of his meek, gentle, dove-like, and amiable disposition, in their intercourse with each other. They seem to have caught the true spirit of christianity. They have laid aside their jewelry, and other foolish ornaments, and clothed themselves with "a meek and quiet spirit," as the Bible directs.

Although they receive some reproach from proud professors and fashionable worldlings, and are treated with contempt by some of their former friends and relatives, they feel more than compensated in the friendship and love of Jesus. Some know from sad experience the truth of the following Scripture: "A man's foes shall be they of his own household." Many are exceedingly bitter, and even mad, because the great truths of the gospel have been preached and believed in this place, by so many, and yet profess to be followers of Christ. Although there were nine active ministers within a mile and a half of our meetings, not one of them has been in to help in the great work of the Lord that has been for the last eight months in progress at the Stone Church, but most of them have manifested a decided opposition. "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." Six of them have now moved away, and it remains to be seen whether their mantles will fall upon their successors. Had they united in this glorious work, we think many more might have been reached, who are yet in the broad way that leads to death. The opposition has been so strong, bitter, and continued, that the young converts lost their confidence in their opposers, and felt unwilling to unite with those who showed so little christian love and such a want of the Spirit of Christ, and chose to go by themselves; hence, they, in company with several devoted christians who were members of the different churches, have united as a church of Christ, chosen their elders, and agreed to take "the Bible as their only rule of faith and practice."

The church now consists of one hundred and eleven members in a very prosperous condition. Several were converted during the past week, who are now happy in his love. Others are under conviction, and seeking the Savior. Their prayer meetings are excellent. In our love feast yesterday morning, over eighty spoke in sixty-one minutes. Eleven were baptized yesterday, and four a week since, making ninety in all. Others are now waiting for the next opportunity.

The truth is still spreading. During last week, we preached twice in the Methodist church in Middletown, about seven and a half miles from Poultney. The house was crowded with attentive listeners, while we spoke of the reward of the righteous and the punishment of the wicked. By some mistake, several understood I was to lecture on temperance the first evening, and on this account, one minister ventured to come, but when he learned I was intending to preach the word of God, he arose in his dignity, took his hat and left, but his flock did not follow. We found there many honest hearts that were sighing for the plain truth of the word of the Lord, who are ready to embrace it, though they may receive the frowns and anathemas of those who profess to be the Lord's watchmen. During last winter they had dancing in the place, and one of their ministers said he had rather the young people would go to the ball, than our meetings in Poultney. Truly these are "perilous times." O Lord, strengthen thy people to stand firm, and keep themselves "unspotted from the world."

Since our last visit at Poultney, one of our number has fallen asleep in Jesus. We take the liberty to publish the following letter from her mother, who has been known for many years as a devoted christian, and was the first female whose voice was heard in our meetings last fall. She is now associated with us, rejoicing in the blessed hope of soon seeing Jesus. She says:—

Bro. Grant:—I have a message for you from my dear Jane, whose lips are sealed, and can no more speak to us till the morning breaketh, and the shadows of death flee away. She was very patient and submissive to God from the first; and though her illness was, as you know, a protracted one, yet her faith and patience wavered not, but seemed to increase more and more, as earth receded from her view. One day (after you were here last,) she said to Sophronia, (her sister) "Call mother." I came and said, "what do you want, my child?" "I want you to help me praise the Lord," said she. "My Savior is so precious, I cannot praise him half enough." We will praise him, said I, for he is worthy. "Yes," said she, "Hallelujah to Jesus my precious Savior!" "Glory to God for sending his own Son to save us." She wished us to sing and pray; we did so, and she continued to praise God. When we had finished, she said; "Brother Grant's last prayer for me is answered, my witness is bright and my peace very sweet." The following night she was so much worse, we hardly expected her to live till morning. I told her my fears: "Bless God!" said she, "I long to be at rest. "If I do not live," she added, "till Bro. Grant gets back, I want you should write and tell him that I am very thankful that he came here, to explain to us the Scriptures. I loved the Savior before, but I didn't know how to die: now I understand it, and can resign myself, all I am, to sleep in Jesus till the resurrection morning; and then I shall hear his sweet voice, waking me to life, and calling me out of the grave, to enjoy a blessed immortality. "Then," said she, "this poor corruptible and wasted form will be changed, and made like unto Christ's glorious body." Is there nothing unpleasant to you in the thought of lying unconscious in the grave, said I. "Not the least," she replied; "the grave looks better to me than this bed. Jesus lay in the grave; shall I not follow my Savior all the way? He did not ascend to heaven till after he was raised from the dead: does not that teach us plainly that we cannot? Can we do more than our Lord?" It is enough for the servant he be as his master, I replied. "Yes," said she, "if my Father's will is done, I am content." Then I repeated the following Scripture.—"He giveth his beloved sleep." "I will lay me down and rest, and my sleep shall be sweet unto me." "Precious words," said she. She then gave me many little messages for one and another of her friends and acquaintances, if she did not live to see them again. She wished me to say to those who have been converted during the revival here, that she was glad she had lived long enough to know that so many have been converted: "it will cheer me in the hour of death," said she, "for I trust I shall meet them in the kingdom."

One day she was sitting up in the bed, and I said, Jennie, look out and see how fast the leaves are putting out. "O yes," said she, "it is green and beautiful, but the grave is more beautiful." A day or two before her death she said: "I wish you would carry me to the window; I want to look out upon the beautiful earth once more." We did so; the robins were singing sweetly. Said I, do you hear the birds? "Yes," said she, "I always loved the birds. Sweet fields and sweet birds, but sweeter it will be in paradise." She did not feel annoyed by seeing company, as many sick people do, but enjoyed it to the last, giving to each a word of cheer, saying; "We shall soon meet in the Kingdom." If she saw us shedding tears, she would often wipe them away with her hand, and say; "Bless God, but don't shed any tears." About an hour before she expired, she said; "Mother, do you think I am dying?" I think you are, I replied. "Bless God," said she, "I am glad the hour has come." Soon after that I observed her smiling, and inquired the cause. "It is sweet," said she. What is sweet? I asked. "Sweet to die," she replied. She took a very affectionate leave of us all, saying, "Be good, meet me in the kingdom."

A few moments before she ceased to breathe, she pointed to me and a friend sitting near, then clasped her hands in triumph. I said, Jennie is going now, is she? We will all try to be good and meet her in the kingdom. She bowed in assent to what I said, closed her eyes, and opened them not again, but died like one going to sleep. Truly, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." Yours truly in Christ,

Hannah Harris.

☞ For several months past, Bro. D. T. Taylor, of North Wardsboro, Vt., has been making a list of all those who are known as Advent preachers. We hope all who may receive letters from him on this subject will cheerfully comply with his request, and promptly render him all the assistance possible to make the list accurate. As Bro. Taylor is able to preach only a part of the time, he has seen fit to devote some of his leisure hours to the collection of statistics that will be interesting to all.

Eschatology; or, the Scripture Doctrine of the Coming of the Lord, the Judgment, and the Resurrection. By Samuel Lee, Boston: Tilton & Co. 1859. pp. 267.

The author of this work makes a distinction between the coming of the Son of man and the coming of the Lord. The former "applies to the work of the Messiah from the time of his resurrection to the overthrow of the Jewish power." The latter is "not merely a periphrasis for death. It is rather significant of a great group of facts in the history of man, in connection with which, but of relative insignificance, is death. The termination of animal life, and consequently of the relations of our physical being, is among the conditions of the exercise of those higher functions by which Christ is seen as he is."

The main argument in support of this view is the fact that the coming of the Lord is everywhere in the New Testament represented as near, and at hand. This event either was at hand, or it was not. "Were the apostles in error?" If they were, the Holy Spirit failed to inform them, or misinformed them. Either they were uninspired on one most important point, in which they seemed most confident, so that all their teachings cease to be the rule of faith; or, they were badly inspired, and we have a monstrous doctrine of pious fraud. If on the other hand they were not in error, the Lord did come soon; either in the overthrow of the Jewish city and nation, according to Prof. Crosby and others, or in the event and circumstances of each man's death.

The author explains the language denoting the coming of the Lord by saying it describes things as they will appear. The effects produced are indicated by a gorgeous drapery of conceived causes; and the metonymy of the cause for the effect is common in Scripture as in other books. Besides, the style of Jewish prophecy is that of bold imagery, as appears in Acts 2: 16–20.

One difficulty with this view is, that the earliest Christians, so far as we can judge, did expect a visible and objective appearing of Christ; and the Apostles themselves probably so understood their own words. Our author would reply that perhaps even the Apostles, certainly the disciples generally, were not prepared for the right interpretation. And here we should find a world of questions to debate.

If his exegesis is strained in any one passage, we should name 2 Thess. 3: 4. Here a word or phrase is to be supplied; and this is done in the common translation, we think, correctly. If in ver. 3, the negative were omitted and we read "if" instead of "except" or unless, then our author's phrase "what then?" would be admissible. The above passage is a fine instance of the importance of a particle, apparently in a subordinate place. An exegetical talent, which is very able generally, seems to us weak just at this point.

Passing from details we are glad to say that the book is in the most Christian, earnest, and catholic spirit. The author speaks very respectfully of such heretical books as "Debt and Grace," and uses some expressions which do not quarrel with its theory, though we can not see that he adopts it. The work is already commanding good attention, and will produce very important effects. Its most serious question, "Were the Apostles in error?" will be pressed to a decision, either in behalf of the author's view, or of a more heterodox faith.

Errata.

Much of the benefit of class recitations is in the mistakes there made and corrected. The printers sometimes send their readers to such a school, as sometimes to the guessing school. A few mistakes occurred in last week's article, "A Reviewer." Near the top of the second column, for "punishment of life," read loss. A stride further down, for "loss in this situation," read direction. Still below, for "meeting of horror," read mutiny. On next page, for "robber sort of folk," read nobler. At the end, for "destruction" read corruption.

"Go Preach."

"By what authority doest thou these things, and who gave you this authority?"—Matt. 21: 23.

Character, No. 1.—(Soliloquy.) "I am young. The world is before me. I must choose some business and enter upon it to obtain a livelihood. What has nature fitted me for? To dig? To toil, and sweat, and soil my hands, and furrow my face, and curb my intellect? To be one of the common herd,

Who know no reason why they're born
But merely to consume the corn?

No, never! Debasing thought! Nature has given me higher powers, and calls me to fill a higher position. My Academic pathway has been strewn with laurels. The world has thus far acknowledged my abilities, and the wave of popularity will buoy me up if I will only trust it. Give me then a profession."

He decides upon the ministry. Because the position will give him a greater scope in belles letters. Because it suits his poetical aspirations. Because the style of pulpit oratory is his peculiar forte. He graduates after a seven years' collegiate and theological course. He receives his parchment certifying to this. He seeks a field of labor. His salary and position must be according to his natural abilities. Twelve hundred dollars must be the first, and a city residence the last. He tenders his services to fill a vacancy of this kind. They invite him to preach a trial sermon. For this purpose he enters the house on the appointed Sunday, and seats himself on the softly-cushioned sofa of the minister's desk. His eye glances at the splendid adornments of the room. He listens to the music of the heavy organ and well trained choir. He sees the rich apparel and jewelry of his hearers. He feels the influence of the softened sunlight through the stained windows. He rises to speak. Behold his classic features! What symmetry and grace in his motions! What a richly toned voice! How beautiful are his comparisons! Milton, Shakspeare, Byron,—how readily and correctly he quotes them!

Monday comes. The committee call upon him. They express themselves well pleased with his effort. The audience were delighted. Several wealthy men of the congregation had expressed their readiness to open their purses in case he remains. Therefore they give him a call. And who could question their right to give him a call, and his right to accept it? Could they not show the church record to prove their appointment to office, and could not he produce his parchment as his authority to preach?

Character, No. 2. A young man similarly situated to "No. 1." He witnesses his success, and reasons with himself on his own ability to follow in the former's footsteps. He recalls the popular maxims—"what man has done man can do"—"where there's a will there's a way"—"life is what we make it," etc. He determines to try. He goes through a similar course of study and receives a similar parchment roll. Keeping his predecessor's course in mind he seeks a similar position. He goes from one city or borough to another and preaches his trial sermon, but no call. He isn't qualified to please the elite. He is too common place. He is too prosy to attract an audience. Mr. A. and B., wealthy members of the congregation, want a smarter man. Finally, he settles in the country on a $600 salary, and they call him only because they can't afford to pay for a smarter man. If they could they would. His authority to preach is unquestionable, but—every man in his own sphere.

Character, No. 3, educates himself for the ministry from religious principles, and philanthropic motives. To carry out these he draws a line between good and evil. He distinguishes between the Lord's church and the Devil's followers. He pitches battle with Satan. He is no distinguisher of persons, and recognizes but two classes—servants of the Lord, and those of Satan. When he preaches the word of truth, (there's more than one truth in the world) it cuts and hurts. Therefore he doesn't suit. Doors are closed against him. He cannot preach except in some school house or private room. He quits the work and goes to teaching, or farming, or something else.

Christ said in his day, "take heed how ye hear." To-day the position is changed, and "take heed how ye preach." The people—and the world's people too—claim the right to say who shall preach, and mistaken is he who thinks he can control the public ear and not cater to its taste. Divine power nor parchment authority can save him from banishment from the painted and steepled meeting houses. But, man of God, don't give up nor make a compromise with the devil. For the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ—for your own soul's sake—for the sake of suffering, dying humanity, sold under sin and in bondage to Satan—preach the truth.

Character, No. 4. A man—young or old, high or low, rich or poor, educated or uneducated, just as you like, it makes no difference. God is no respecter of persons. He was a sinner but is now converted. The truth has made him free. He prays to God and as he prays, a burden for souls comes upon him. He wrestles with God in behalf of his fellow beings. He prays him to "send forth laborers into the harvest." While he prays, the answer comes—"go preach my gospel." He tries to believe it is not God's command, and attempts to pray on as before, but it will not do. Nothing will answer the purpose but direct obedience. He tries to reason the matter, "Lord, I'm ignorant." "Hath not God chosen the foolish things of this world? Go. preach!" "They won't hear me. I can't talk. There's no place." "What is that to thee? Go preach!" All this while the brethren and sisters are praying him into it. "Lord, open a way and I'll go." A meeting is to be held in the school-house at M. the following Sunday. It is so ordered that the preacher expected cannot be there. He is urged to go. He goes trembling and praying. The Spirit attends him, and he speaks with power he never felt before. He now feels assured the Lord has called him, and will stand by him as long as he obeys his word. He labors on through trials sore, and temptations strong. With the word of God and testimony of Jesus upon his lips he goes on, hated by the world, laughed at by his acquaintances, but approved of God. Who will question his authority? True, he has no parchment. Neither had Peter—nor Paul. Yet Paul conferred not with flesh and blood. Does God call a man at 18 to preach when he is 25? How long does it take the soldier to gird on his armor?

The time is near at hand when the laborers shall come home to receive according to the promise of the Father. "Then they that sow in tears shall reap in joy. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."—Ps. 126: 5, 6.

Explanation.

The reasons why I did not reach my appointments, published in the Crisis—are: That the notice was very limited,—the distance great, and my means inadequate to the journey—and my health would not allow me to preach only on Sundays. One remark: I cannot, as formerly, preach during the week, travel, visit, write—then preach on Sunday two or three sermons.

The Book of Life.

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened, and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works."—Rev. 20: 12.

The great desire of man is, to be acquitted at the supreme court of heaven. But how many expect an acquittal there who will be disappointed. None, surely, can enter God's kingdom, save those whose names are written in the Book of Life. The great question with us is, are our names written in the Book of Life? And in order to answer this, we must find out what the book of life is. Let us examine a few texts:

Rev. 21 : 27.—"And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth; neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." Phil. 4 : 3.—"My fellow laborers, whose names are written in the book of life." Rev. 3 : 5.—"I will not blot out his name out of the book of life."

May we suppose the book here referred to is one kept in heaven, and records made therein by Gabriel? If so, in what sense could it be called the book of life? Would it not be more properly called the records of eternity?

But in what sense could a book be called a book of life? I answer. "One in the which was a law, and the penalty of that law was death; or the keeping of it, insurring a reward of eternal life. This might be properly called a book of life in the strictest sense. Now I can see no impropriety in calling the New Testament the book of life. Indeed, I believe it to be the book here spoken of, out of which you and I shall be judged. I will give the grounds of my belief from the Bible.

First. A certain part of the human family are to be judged out of those things written in the book of life. Now read the 12th of John, 48th verse.—"The words that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." Again—"The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." Read Mark 16 : 16—"Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel, (or My words) to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." I ask if it is not the words of Christ that will condemn us, or acquit us at the judgment?

"The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." This book contains the words of Christ; his words are spirit and life, and these words, gathered and printed in a book, would make a book of life. The New Testament reveals a law, the penalty of which is death.—Rom. 6 : 23—The reward, eternal life. Rom. 2 : 7. This makes it a book of life.

If Christ condemned the young man under the law, by the law, (thou knowest the commandment,") then will he not condemn those under the gospel by the gospel?

Does not this look like a God to judge man from a law he may hold in his own hand? Hence the injunction, "Search the Scriptures." And will not wresting them prove his destruction?

But in what sense can our names be written therein? From the fact that our lives have been garnished with the precepts of the book itself; in the sense that our robes have been washed in the blood of the Lamb, in the same sense in which we have on a wedding garment.

If I am right in this matter (and I believe I am,) then, unless we can read the New Testament, and not be condemned by its "prima facia" reading, or by its plain teachings, (for God will not condemn us for understanding it just as it reads,) then we shall be condemned in the judgment.—It will not do to guess at a meaning, but we must take it just as it stands; hence, if Jesus says, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," it will not do to say sprinkling will do.

If Jesus says, If thou bringest thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother has aught against thee, leave there thy gift, first go and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift,"—it will not do to say, "Well, I have something against him, as well as he against me;" the text requires you to act as well as him; and if you do not, the word condemns you, however much your pretences to religion. This matter is not like the handle of a jug, all upon one side, but is required of one and all the same, in order to his or her salvation.

"Speak not evil one of another, brethren." It will not do to take pains to go to our neighbors, and try to destroy him for whom Christ died! Even if they are wrong, go to them, or you have broken the word; it will condemn you in the judgment. Remember—"the dead were judged out of these things written in the books."

DEEDS.—Deeds are greater than words. Deeds have such a life, mute, but undeniable, and grow as living trees and fruit-trees do; they people the vacuity of time, and make it green and worthy. Why should the oak prove logically that it ought to grow and will grow? Plant it, try it; what gifts of diligent, judicious assimilation and secretion it has, of progress and resistance, of force to grow, will then declare themselves.—Carlyle.

For the Crisis.

Passing Events.

They speak in thunder tones; they gleam like vivid lightning on the midnight darkness. Men of wisdom are nonplussed at what is coming next. The European news is startling; each ray of intelligence from thence creates new excitement. Our public journals are speculating on the causes which led to the present state of affairs. Their opinions vary. One speaks thus:—"The war has actually begun! It is apparently of little use to cry peace, peace! any longer. England has taken herself and influence out of the way. Russia sympathizes with France. Prussia is considering it. Napoleon has evoked the terrible war-spirit of the nations—been always skillfully successful in keeping the moral sentiment of Europe on his side—appealed to the patriotism of each independent nation with signal success, and waited patiently for his chances. We don't believe this war will end with a single campaign; on the contrary, it is likely to be continued till all the governments of Europe have been successively drawn into its roaring whirlpool. The harvest will be ours in the United States, if we know how to take advantage of it; but the appearances are manifest that we shall have questions on our own hands soon, that will take our highest energies, and our longest patience. The future is full of agitation everywhere."

Is not this a fulfillment of prophecy?—"men's hearts failing them for fear." Another paper says:—"Rarely, if ever, was the fate of nations known so completely to hang on a thread. There does not seem to be any possible chance left for peaceable arrangement. . . We do not see how the nations will be able to sit and calmly look on, when the interests of all are equally involved." "War enthusiasm is increasing in France. Paris is in a high state of excitement." "The panic on the London exchange is intense. Over fifty brokers failed."

Some of the private correspondence of Louis Napoleon with some of the rulers of Europe, (which has been obtained by some means) shows the plan to be that "the war in Italy is but a secondary object—the ultimate end is the bestowal of Lombardy on King Victor, Rome on Prince Napoleon, Naples on Prince Murat, and the overthrow of Austria, leaving the way open for Russia, and then for the long cherished idea of the attack on England—the deed which is to make his name immortal as that of Cæsar, and efface that of the great Napoleon, by performing that which even he never dared to do—and avenging him."

The London Times says:—"Who believes for a moment in the sincerity of the French Emperor, or that he is doing other than making Italy a stepping stone to his ambition? * * * As yet the victim is but on his way to the bloody shrine, fairly decked with garlands, and the sacrificial axe is wreathed with flowers, as well; but there will be a very different end to all this. We must look to many a bloody field—to many an imperilled crown, before we see the end of the drama which opened on the first of January last when Louis Napoleon addressed the Austrian Envoy in words of menace, and of which the action began, when the first Austrian soldier crossed the bridge of the Ticino and stepped upon Sardinian soil."

Thus every journal of note speaks in tones of apprehension, defiance, or dread. Men's plans are overthrown by a single act. Their prognostications of what is coming are set at nought. In vain do they evoke councils of peace for adjustment of these difficulties. Human wisdom is valueless. The day of battle is hastening speedily on. Take up your Bible and turn to Joel 3 : 9–14, and read; also Jer. 25 : 26–33, and see if these prophecies are not about to be accomplished soon. Turn to Rev. 19 : 17–21, and bear in mind that Louis Napoleon will take command of the French army in person, and will be sustained by the ablest officers in his army. The king of Sardinia has already taken the field, and the Emperor of Austria is daily expected at Milan to do the same. These monarchs thus meet in battle array. Was there ever such a scene before?

The cost of maintaining the armies of Europe in time of peace is $455,000,000 per year; then when war rages think of the increased expense. The number of men in the armies in peace is 5,924,000—equal to 15 per cent of the male population of Europe. Think of this vast number—for you cannot count it—imagine them in deadly conflict, mingling with shouts of defiance, the thunder of a thousand cannon at once—the battle of millions of muskets, the whistling of countless unseen messengers of death, the groans of the wounded and dying—the terrific explosions of mines—the hissing of bomb shells through the lurid air—the charge of the cavalry, making the very ground to tremble beneath their fierce onslaughts of death. Imagine all this—and you cannot make it appear to your mind like the dreadful reality. Who, who in the name of common sense, would believe the millenium of peace to be near, when looking at things as they are now seen? There's not a place of refuge on earth. From the frozen regions of the North to the sunny vales of the South—from the rugged mountains of the East to the beautiful plains of the West—all will be commotion—"for I will call a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the LORD of hosts. * * * And the slain of the LORD shall be at that day, from one end of the earth, even unto the other end of the earth; and they shall not be lamented, neither gathered nor buried." Jer. 25 : 29–33. God's promises and threatenings have always been fulfilled heretofore, and surely none will be unaccomplished. The storm is coming—the black cloud lowers on the horizon—lightning flashes—the thunders roar—how can we escape the tempest? Friends, are you prepared for the coming day?

Let me to thy bosom fly."

Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy. No. 5.

BABYLON AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS.

With this brief summary before us of what Babylon was, when in her strength, beauty and glory, she stood forth the "lady of kingdoms," let us glance for a little time at the predictions of the prophets concerning it;—predictions when to human ken, no such mighty changes and vast calamities could possibly befal it, as they with remarkable precision record.

Isaiah saw a great multitude as of a great people, and heard a tumultuous noise of the kingdoms of nations gathered together against Babylon, the beauty of the Chaldee's excellency. "The Lord of Hosts mustereth the host to the battle. They come from a far country, from the end of heaven, even the Lord, and the weapons of his indignation, to destroy the whole land . . . and to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. . . . Babylon . . . shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, . . . neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; . . owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the island shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces."

Had the prophet approached the king of Babylon, as he walked in his palace and in the pride of his heart exclaimed, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and the honor of my majesty!" had Isaiah then uttered in his ear the words of the prophecy, would he not have seemed like one that mocked? Could he have been brought to believe that "the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency" would one day be utterly perished, and "the glory of kingdoms" become as Sodom and Gomorrah? That no inhabitant would occupy those splendid mansions, but the wild beasts cry therein, and dragons dwell in those gorgeous places? That from Babylon would be cut off the name and remnant, son and nephew,—not one would be left, but the golden city utterly cease, her walls be cast down—her palaces dissolved—her rivers and pools dried up, and her fertile plains become a barren wilderness? Yet God had spoken the word that thus it should be; the fiat had gone forth from the mouth of his prophet, and though centuries would pass ere all that was spoken would be accomplished, yet his word would not return unto him void, but surely accomplish that which had been spoken, so that those who passed by would exclaim, "How hath the oppressor ceased! the golden city ceased! Thy pomp is brought down to the grave, and the noise of thy viols; the worm is spread under thee, and the worms cover thee!" "Babylon is fallen, is fallen!"

The student of prophecy and history beholds the exact accomplishment of all that was predicted by the mouth of the prophet; not one jot nor tittle has failed; he may seek out the book of the Lord and read, and then turn to history's page, and not one wants his mate of all the evil birds and beasts predicted. But, alas! how few there are who weigh these stupendous truths, who recognize in these events an over-ruling providence, and are thereby led to exercise a living, practical faith in that Being who sees the end from the beginning, and has as fully predicted, and as clearly delineated events that are now transpiring among the nations of earth—events that are startling in their character, and tremendous in their results, being nothing less than the entire dissolving of the fourth empire, and the entire subjugation of all earthly powers to the universal reign of the King of kings!

God grant that while we review these prophecies relating to the destruction of Babylon, our minds may thereby be awakened to a greater interest in studying those predictions which refer to our own time, and which are speedily to be realised in the dissolution of all the kingdoms and cities of the world!

Obituary Notices.

Died in Chaplin, Ct., Jan. 13, 1859, Sister SARAH J. FOSTER, aged 22 years, wife of Matthew H. Foster, and daughter of Bro. and Sr. Chauncey Hart of Unionville, Ct.

Sister F. gave her heart to the Lord in her youth, united with the Methodist church, and ever maintained a consistent walk. In 1853, under the preaching of Brn. Matthewson, Grant and Howell, in Unionville, she became interested, and embraced the hope of a soon coming Saviour to reign with his saints on the earth, with other kindred doctrines. From this hope she was never moved away, and both her life and death gave ample testimony of its blessed, purifying and sanctifying influence, and its power to sustain and comfort when all else failed.

Although sick for a long time, her sufferings were borne with Christian patience and resignation. She often expressed the wish that her Savior would come and bring redemption to his people and gather them where separation would be known no more.

Doubtless many who attended the Campmeeting at Collinsville, will remember the pale "weary one" who spoke a few words at the love feast on Sunday morning, expressing the certain conviction that she must soon fall a victim to the great enemy, yet was able to rejoice in prospect of a resurrection to life and blessedness. That was her last public testimony. About the last of Nov. she was removed to the town where she died. With the exception of her husband and child, she was surrounded by strangers, yet her faith in God remained unshaken, and faithfully did she perform her last work on earth; that of presenting the truth in its beauty and loveliness to all around her, and exhorting them to seek and serve the Lord. Thus she "finished her course," and as earthly things receded from her view, the everlasting arms were thrown around her, and she was enabled with child like confidence and love,

"On Jesus' breast to lean her head,
And breathe her life out sweetly there."

She sleeps quietly, till the voice of her "beloved" shall awake her to a life that shall be unending, to joys and glory that shall never fade away. May the many who mourn for her be comforted by the same hope she enjoyed, and with her at last share the reward of the righteous.

The first battle between the Austrians and Allies has taken place. It was fought at Montebello, the Austrian force being reported as 15,000 strong. The Austrians were defeated and obliged to retreat, with a loss reported by French accounts of 2000. The Allies lost from 600 to 700.

The spot where the battle took place is a village of Austrian Italy, twenty-three miles north east of Alessandria, the head quarters of the Allies.

VERY LATEST FROM THE SEAT OF WAR.

TURIN, May 24. Gen. Gyulai has removed his headquarters to Barlasco. He has ordered the people everywhere to give up their arms and ammunition, under the penalty of being shot for disobedience to his command.

SECOND DISPATCH.

The battle of Montebello took place on the 21st of May. French accounts say the Austrian force was 15,000 strong, under the command of Gen. Stadion. They made an attack upon the advanced posts of Marshal Baraguay de Hilliers, but were driven back by Gen. Forrís' division after a fierce combat of four hours' duration.

The force of the Allies in this engagement included some Piedmontese cavalry.

The Allies carried Montebello, but did not pursue the Austrians in their retreat.

The loss of the Austrians in this engagement is stated by the French at from 1500 to 2000 men, and that of the French at from 600 to 700, with many officers.

Two hundred Austrians, including one Colonel, were taken prisoners

The Austrian account simply states that Gen. Stadion pushed forward a reconnoissance by a forced march towards Siglio and Montebello, but after a hot fight with a French force of superior strength, retreated behind the Po in perfect order.

The actual strength of the French force is not stated. Report says from 6000 to 7000, besides a regiment of Sardinian cavalry.

The Sardinian Bulletin also announces that the extreme left wing of the Sardinian army under Gen. Cialdini, forced a passage over the Sesia river, putting the Austrians to flight.

Other trifling engagements are reported.

Gen. Garibaldi had entered "Gaveo," in Lombardy, with 6000 men, his object being the revolutionizing of that State.

Prince Napoleon, with a small French force had arrived at Leghorn.

It is rumored that six English men of war had entered the Adriatic Sea.

The Paris Moniteur announces that France will address a note to the Powers in favor of the abolition of privateering, and the principle that a neutral flag covers enemy's goods.

[From the London Times.]

While Europe looks on with trembling anxiety, the question is debated whether the war can be localized—that is to say, whether it will be possible to confine the war to Italy and the Powers now engaged? If this can be accomplished, and if none of the great Powers are compelled by existing engagements, or prospective dangers, to go to the aid of either belligerent, the cloud that lowers on the horizon of the future will be dispelled. But if Germany can be brought to throw herself into the scale with Austria, then the thunder will fall, and the flame of war will spread from the south to the north and east, perhaps to the extreme west of Europe. At present neutrality is the order of the day, but all the nations are arming to the teeth, and even England is forced to place herself in readiness for any contingency that may arise. The question will probably be decided in Germany. The Southern States, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, and Hanover, who are drawn towards Austria by similarity of religion and system, appear eager for an encounter with the legions of France. They are restrained by the prudence of Prussia, and her weight in the Germanic Confederation, while Russia assumes a menacing attitude on the eastern frontier of Austria. The situation is critical and complicated, and calculated to excite the most serious apprehension. In this grave juncture a peculiar importance attaches to the course taken by Prussia. That kingdom is German, but it is also Protestant. It possesses comparatively free institutions, and it cannot feel any interest in perpetuating Austrian oppression in Italy. Prussia cannot be indifferent to the measures by which Austria has increased the Papal power in Central Europe to a height unknown since the middle ages. For these reasons we hope that Northern Germany will be slow in espousing the quarrel of Austria, while careful to provide for its own defence. No complaint can be made that Prussia places a quarter of a million of men on foot, or that the federal fortresses should be armed. But the question still forces itself on our attention—what next?

In our opinion Austria is an incubus on Europe, and the incarnation of all that is formidable, odious, and despicable in despotism. The Emperor of Austria holds armed occupation of his own States, and by means of the army treats his subjects as a conquered people. This is not the Power that Englishmen will defend, and Germany is populous enough to protect herself. We want no foreign aid to guard our shores, and, if we did, it would not be given to us. It will be enough for us to look after our own interests and honor, and if the people of the Continent will learn to do the same, they will establish the surest guarantee for permanent peace.

I would say to the ministers of the gospel of Jesus Christ, that we have procured a Hall in Smith's Block, on Elm Street for a place of public worship, and wish they would come over and help us. We are few in number and limited in means, but would say to any who feel the cause of God at heart, that here is an open door to work for the Lord. Call on Bro. Asa S Libby, No. 29 Machine Shop Block, or Bro. Orlando Proctor, Amherst St., Manchester, N. H.

Notice.

The Lord willing, there will be a quarterly conference holden with the Church of God in Springville, Bad Axe County, Wis., to commence on Friday, June 24th, at 2 o'clock, P. M., and continue over the Lord's day. As this is a new field, in which the harvest is great, we hope that all the way-worn pilgrims that can, will attend this convocation and participate in comforting each other. We especially solicit our preaching brethren to attend that can do so.

Y. HIGGINS, Evangelist.

Notice.

THE FIFTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF ADVENTISTS IN MAINE, will be held at Lincolnville Corner, commencing June 23d, Thursday, P. M., at 2 o'clock, and continue over the Sabbath. Several places have been mentioned for it, but this seems to be the most central and easy of access for the greatest number. Those who think of attending from the West, should give notice of their intention, that carriages may be ready for them at Camden Harbor, where they will land six miles from the meeting. They can come from Boston, or Portland, by steamer Daniel Webster, to Camden, and call on Bro. Blanding, near steamboat wharf, arriving Thursday morning, in season for the meeting. Others from various parts of the State will come by such conveyances as may be had, and call on Bro. George McKenny at Lincolnville. We hope all Advent ministers in Maine, who wish to labor in the union and fellowship of the Gospel, for the good of the cause of our coming Lord, will come to this meeting. And as many other brethren and sisters as can well do so, come to pray, labor, advise, and counsel, unitedly, for the salvation of the lost, and the upbuilding of the saints, by spreading abroad the great truths of the Gospel.

For the Crisis.

My Birth-Place.

Once more I tread the village's dusty street,
The overhanging air, its stifling heat,
To breathe again the fragrant breath of flowers,
And feel once more their joy-inspiring powers;
To court the gales that sweep the forest leaves,
Perfumed with new mown grass and harvest sheaves;
To hear once more the carol of the bird,
Whose soft, sweet notes so oft my heart hath stirred,
And here, beside my boyhood's rippling stream,
Sit me down once more to muse and dream.

II.

While I have often gazed with fond delight
Upon thy dancing streamlet, sparkling bright;
Upon thy native hills I stand again,
Where waved the grass and smiled the ripening grain:
But changes mark the conquering step of years,
And landmark after landmark disappears;
The smile that cheered me here so oft of yore,
Alas! on earth will greet me evermore.

III.

The maple orchard, remnant of the wood,
Has left no tree to mark where once it stood;
The monarch elm, that breasted every storm
In boyhood's days, is but a wreck in form;
And happy voices that once charm'd my ear,
Can ne'er again my lonely spirits cheer.

IV.

Home of my youth, with joy I turn to thee once more,
My budding hopes were cradled on thy rock-bound shore;
Inspiring prospects, gemmed with promises so bright,
My fondest dreams saw not that they could set in night.
But death, the messenger that listeth not by day,
At last presumed to steal my budding hopes away.

V.

Home of my youth, what changes since I saw thee last!
And O! what changes too o'er me and mine have past!
To thee I come once more! and faithful to her trust,
Fond memory calls my loved ones from the sleeping dust.
I come to thee, my thoughts once more to interchange,
And gladly turn my footsteps o'er thy mountain range!
I follow where delightedly my boyhood roamed,
When morning twinkled in the east, or evening gloamed;—
The joyous shout of happy hearts oft met before,
Will meet me in these lonely walks, oh, never more! E. A. W.

THE SAVIOR'S SWEET INVITATION.

"Come unto me, all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."—Matt. 11: 28.

What words of kindness and salvation! If you have detected your danger—if the future is veiled in horrible darkness—if you are driven hither and thither seeking rest and finding none, the verse beckons you to a place of safety, where you may recline as on a bed of roses. You are laden with guilt, and hence you are in terror of God, it may be, to such an extent that the bitterest pains dart through the fibres of your being. And long you may have essayed to find peace to your troubled spirit; you may have gone to many a broken cistern that can hold no water. How appropriate to one in your case the sweet invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labor!" We have known sinners "labor" for years to find rest, and a weary, woful task they had. How soon they would have obtained what they were pining for, if the invitation "Come unto me," had been complied with! Still there is hope for you. Jesus, with outstretched arms, exclaims in your hearing, "Come unto me;" and whosoever cometh unto him, though the guiltiest of the guilty and the vilest of the vile, shall in no wise be cast out. John 6: 37. Are not the words, "Come unto me all ye," and "whosoever cometh," sufficient, more than sufficient, to convince you that you are the very person invited by Jesus to rest on the bosom of his love?

And now, what is meant by coming unto Jesus? One thing is certain—the words do not mean that you are to come bodily near him, for that you cannot, he having long since ascended to glory. Moreover, you might have been corporeally near him, like Judas Iscariot, and yet, in the sense in which Jesus employed the words, far away. The words "Come unto me," is a figurative expression for KNOW ME—become acquainted with me—believe in me. We find our Lord explaining his language in the following verse—"He that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst."—John 6: 35. Here the "believeth" is exegetical of the "cometh," on the principle of parallelism so often exemplified in the sacred writings.

To come to Jesus, then, is to believe all the truth concerning him fitted to relieve guilty, burdened, laboring souls. And what is true of him adapted to give rest to the weary? What is his name? It is Jesus, or Savior. To whom? He came to seek and to save that which is lost, yea, the chief of sinners; he was manifested to be the Savior of the world, and therefore to save you. And how? By dying for sinners, for every sinner, and consequently for you. "All we like sheep have gone astray,—but the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all." Isa. 53: 6. "Behold the Lamb of God bearing away the sin of the world."—John [illegible]. This beneficent Redeemer has opened a way for our return to God; has, by his own resurrection, opened for every one of us the paths of life, along which we are welcome to run immediately, praising God. Meditate on Jesus' love and sufferings for you,—on the efficacy of his blood shed for the remission of your sins—on his intercession within the veil—on the destined sovereignty awaiting him in this world—and the glory you are invited to when he appears, and surely your heart will bound with celestial joy. Peace in this course will flow into your heart, widening and deepening like a river, as time rolls on. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee."—Isa. 26: 3. "We which have believed do enter into rest."—Heb. 4: 3.

You can never find abiding rest to your soul in any other way than by coming to Jesus. The prescription is absolute: "Come unto me." We have heard of a soldier who prayed thirty times a day for rest; we knew a young man who used to pray for it till he was literally fatigued with agony; but no answer came to their petitions—they continued like the troubled sea which cannot rest. It seemed to them as if the Lord had forgotten to be gracious. They found it not because they did not seek rest in Jesus' way. His words to the sin-burdened are, "Come unto me;" and we have explained above how you are to draw nigh. These persons ought to have searched for the rest-giving truth about Him, and they would immediately have found deliverance. This excitement, I can easily imagine, into which they worked themselves,—this furor of the brain, and nerves and conscience, might have terminated in a re-action—a prostration of the faculties, attended with a sense of relief, and a relief certainly it would have been, when viewed in contrast with the antecedent agonies; but it would not have been the peace which originates in a clear apprehension of the Gospel message. It would have been the soothing of the opiate, rather than the delicious sensation of re-established health; a state of mind, therefore, not to be coveted, inasmuch as the composure is destined to be disturbed by the last thunders, if not broken before they sound in deluded ears. Happily for the soldier and the youth, they dropped into no such fatal calm; they found genuine peace of mind. By the advice of friends, they endeavored to understand the truth, and in apprehending it, they came to Jesus; they found the promised rest, and enjoyed it like a tempest-tossed mariner, when he enters a haven of safety and repose. It was ignorance that kept them "heavy laden" and "laboring," and so soon as they were made acquainted with the truth, it made them free. Then they could pray indeed, having received the spirit of adoption in consequence of their reconciliation to God. Follow their example and you shall enter into peace.

Jacob and Esau.

It appears that Esau did that which was displeasing, and to the grief of Isaac and Rebekah, his parents, by taking to wife Judith, the daughter of Beere the Hittite; for it was against the law of God for Israel to unite in marriage with the uncircumcised. God had said to Abraham, "In thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," "and in Isaac shall thy seed be called." God had procured for Isaac a wife from the kindred of his father. See full account in Gen. 24. Esau, by taking a strange woman, a Hittite to wife, displeased the Almighty, as we shall see; for his favor is conferred upon Jacob.—Esau is called Isaac's eldest son. So when Isaac had become old and his eyes were dim, so that he could not see, he called Esau unto him and said—"My son, * * * Behold now, I am old, I know not the day of my death. Take now, therefore, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field and take me some venison; and make me savory meat, such as I love, and bring it to me, that I may bless thee before I die." We see from the above, that it was Isaac's intention to bless Esau. But the Lord had otherwise ordered it—that Jacob should be blessed. Why? Because since Esau's marriage to the Hittite, he is no longer the true seed, and out of God's order.

The Almighty's plan was, to preserve a pure seed down to Christ and his plan or purpose was fulfilled to the letter.

Did Isaac bless Esau? After Esau had gone to the field, "Rebekah spake unto Jacob her son, saying, Behold, I heard thy father speak unto Esau, thy brother, saying, Bring me venison . . . . that . . . . I may bless thee before the Lord before my death.—Now therefore, my son, . . . go now to the flock, and fetch me from thence two good kids . . . and I will make them savory meat for thy father, such as he loveth. And thou shalt bring it to thy father, that he may eat, and that he may bless thee before his death." Jacob did according to the instruction of his mother, and put on his brother Esau's raiment, and went in unto his father and said,—"My father, and he said—here am I, who art thou, my son? And Jacob said I am Esau, thy first born, I have done according as thou badest me; arise, I pray thee, sit and eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me." After some hesitation, Isaac blessed him. "And he said, art thou my very son Esau? And he said, I am." He ate of the venison, and Jacob brought his father wine and he drank of it and kissed him. And he said, "Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine. Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee; be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee. Cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee."

Soon after this, when Jacob had scarcely gone out of the presence of his father, Esau came in from his hunting. And he also had made savory meat and brought it unto his father, and said unto his father, "Let my father arise, and eat of his son's venison, that thy soul may bless me. And Isaac . . said unto him, Who art thou? And he said, I am thy son, thy first born Esau. . . Where is he that hath taken venison, and brought it me and I have eaten of all before thou camest, and have blessed him? yea, and he shall be blessed. . . . . And Esau cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry, and said unto his father, Bless me, even me also, oh, my father. . . . And Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing.

Jacob fled to Haran, to his mother's brother, where he served Laban seven years for Rachel, and was deceived; and served again seven years for Rachel and married her also, of his mother's kindred. So Jacob was prospered and blessed of the Lord. And unto him was born the twelve patriarchs of which sprang the twelve tribes of Israel—of which sprang David—of which sprang Christ the son of David, of the seed of Abraham and the Savior of the world.

Now we can see why Balaam prophesieth when he saith—"There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel." . . I shall see him, but not now; I shall behold him, but not nigh. . . . Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, (meaning Christ.) "How are the things of Esau searched out! how are his hidden things sought up." 1 Ob. 1: 6. "Blessed be the name of God forever and ever; for wisdom and might are his. . . . He revealeth the deep and secret things; he knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him." I. E. CLARK.

"Your Redemption draweth Nigh."

Christian, look up, the day is near
When Christ in glory shall descend,
To wipe away the mourner's tear,
And bid his sorrows have an end.

Pilgrim, awake! renew thy strength,
Gird now thine armor closely on;
The battle will be fought at length,
And we the victory shall have won.

Soldier of Christ, arise! and shake
The dreamy slumbers from thy soul;
Let every saint of God awake!
The golden moments swiftly roll.

O Jesus, save thy waiting ones,
Prepare them for that coming day;
Until redemption's work is done,
May they not cease to watch and pray.

Hail, glorious morn! hail, blessed day!
When we from sin and death made free,
To Zion shall return for aye,
With songs and shouts of victory.

Presumption not Faith.

BRO. GRANT:—It is desirable, for the honor of our holy religion, that we should correctly understand the nature of faith. Faith is the belief of testimony. Whatever our Father has revealed to us in his Word demands our unwavering faith. "The counsel of the Lord shall stand."

The prayer of faith, therefore, is praying in the full confidence that God will fulfill his own word. God has revealed to us his purpose to "send Jesus Christ."—Acts 3: 20. We are therefore to pray for his coming with the assurance of mind or belief that he will come. But he has not revealed the precise day of his coming. To believe, therefore, that he will come on any particular day, is presumption. It would be so, even if it should happen that he comes on the very day we believed that he would come; for the simple reason that we believed without evidence.

On this manifestly plain principle, we are to pray for the conversion of sinners, believing the divine testimony that God's "word shall not return void," that it shall be "a savor of life unto life" unto dying men. But it is not revealed to us to what particular persons it shall be either the "savor of life unto life," or the "savor of death unto death." God "hath mercy on whom he will have mercy," and righteously too, for the whole world is become guilty before him and all are justly condemned to everlasting death.—Rom. 3: 19, 23. To believe, therefore, that God will convert a particular individual person, for whose salvation we are praying, is to believe without evidence. And now some good brother perhaps will exclaim, "What! are we not to pray in faith?" Yes, brother, you are to pray in faith, but faith in what? Faith in the fulfillment of your own desires, or faith in God's word? If you can find a promise in that word that God will convert the individual you pray for, then indeed you ought to believe it, but you have no such promise. You reply that it is written, "If any two of you shall agree on earth, as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven." True, but this is not all that is written on the subject. "This is the confidence which we have in him, that if we ask anything ACCORDING TO HIS WILL, he heareth us."—1 John 5: 14. For whatever, therefore, we ask, which is not revealed to us in his word, we are to ask, as our Savior has given us an example, in submission to the divine will.—Matt. 26: 39. I once stood by the bedside of a sick brother in Hartford, with other brethren and sisters. A minister present prayed for the recovery of our brother. After he closed, he declared to the assembly that he was confident of his recovery. Yet in a few days he died.

Permit me to ask, for the sake of our divine Master and his precious cause, can it possibly be right, or consistent with "the power of faith," to engage in any circumstances to "renounce" our religion and deny our Lord Jesus Christ, unless by our prayers or exhortations we can produce conviction in the minds of ungodly men, even though we depend mentally on divine power to attend such prayers or exhortations? Certainly we have no revelation that such conviction will be produced in the minds of particular persons. But we know from God's word, and from facts, that some hearts are harder, and some minds are blinder, after the use of such means—Isa. 6: 9. Yet God is glorified by the manifestation of the truth, whether it be "a savor of life unto life, or of death unto death."

We are commanded to pray for the salvation of ALL men, except for such as have committed the "sin unto death." Of the latter case, we may not perhaps certainly determine.—1 Tim. 2: 1–4. We are, however, to pray in holy submission to the divine will. Let us, dear brethren, seek to be conformed to the Word of Truth, which abideth forever.

Yours in the hope of eternal life at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be glory forever. HENRY GREW.

Words of Jesus.

"Remember the words of the Lord Jesus how he said"—"I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."—John 14: 3.

Orphan pilgrims, dry your tears! Soon the morning hour will strike, and the sighs of a groaning and burdened creation be heard no more. Earth's six thousand years of toil and sorrow are waning; the Sabbath of rest is at hand. Jesus will soon be heard to repeat concerning all his sleeping saints, what He said of old regarding one of them: "I go to awake them out of sleep!" Your beloved Lord's first coming was in humiliation and woe; his name was—the "Man of Sorrows." He had to travel on, amid darkness and desertion, his blood-stained path; a chaplet of thorns was the only crown He bore. But soon he will come "the second time without a sin-offering unto salvation," never again to leave his church, but to receive those who followed him in his cross, to be everlasting partakers with him in his crown. He may seem to tarry. External nature, in her unvarying and undeviating sequences, gives no indication of his approach. Centuries have elapsed since He uttered the promise, and still He lingers; the everlasting hills wear no streak of approaching dawn; we seem to listen in vain for the noise of his chariot wheels. "But the Lord is not slack concerning his promise." He gives you "this word in addition to many others as a keepsake—a pledge and guarantee for the certainty of his return,—"I will come again."

Who can conceive all the surpassing blessedness connected with that advent? The elder brother arrived to fetch the younger brethren home!—the true Joseph revealing himself in unutterable tenderness to the brethren who were once estranged from him—"receiving them unto himself"—not satisfied with apportioning a kingdom for them, but, as if all his own joy and bliss were intermingled with theirs, "Where I am," says he, "there you must be also." "Him that overcometh," says He again, "will I grant to sit with me on my throne."

Believer, can you now say with some of the holy transport of the apostle, "Whom having not seen, we love?" What must it be when you come to see him "face to face," and that forever and ever! If you can tell of precious hours of communion in a sin-stricken, woe-worn world, with a treacherous heart, and an imperfect or divided love, what must it be when you come, in a sinless, sorrowless state, with purified and renewed affections, to see the King in his beauty! The letter of an absent brother, cheering and consolatory as it is, is a poor compensation for the joys of personal and visible compensation. The absent elder Brother on the Throne speaks to you now only by His Word and Spirit,—soon you shall be admitted to His immediate fellowship, seeing him "as He is"—He himself unfolding the wondrous chart of his providence and grace—leading you about from fountain to fountain among the living waters, and with his own gentle hand wiping the last lingering tear-drop from your eye. Heaven and everlasting home with Jesus! "Where I am, there ye shall be also." He has appended a cheering postscript to this word, on which He has caused us to hope, "He which testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly!"

"Love your Enemies."

When foes assay, with cruel aim,
Their fiery darts to throw,
Shall we not with the same defence
Ward off the fearful blow?

Or shall we with a calm delight
Walk mildly in His path,
Who bids our erring feet receive
Protection from his wrath?

He freely gives the sun's bright beams,
The dew and gentle shower;
While foes, as well as friends, confess
His wisdom, love and power.

His word commands—we will obey,
Though stern the task may be;
That in the end we may rejoice,
And all his glory see.

What Jesus did for Us.

He became like us that we might become like him.

He partook of human nature that we might partake his divine nature.

He bore our sorrow that we might taste his joy.

He suffered our hate that we might enjoy his love.

He bore our sin that we might partake his holiness.

He endured our dishonor that we might share his glory.

He endured the burden of guilt that we might be declared innocent.

He wept in Gethsemane that we might sing in Paradise.

He was condemned before Pilate that we might be justified before God.

He suffered for our faults that we might enjoy his mercy.

He died on Mount Calvary that we might live on Mount Zion.

He was laid in the tomb that he might deliver us out of it.

He appears for us before God, that we may appear for him before men.

He cometh to judge us, that we may be acquitted and saved.

He will take us home to be with him forever.

Behold what love Christ hath shown us. Let us love him and do his will in all things. May his grace be with us all. Amen.

Holiness to the Lord.

There is nothing the church needs so much as HOLINESS. Laborers are needed to disseminate the truth, and money to keep the moral machinery in motion, but without holiness these will prove abortive.

The way to obtain holiness is to submit implicitly to the Holy Spirit. To be filled with the Spirit is the duty and privilege of every child of God; and if so, great is the guilt of all who live in a cold and fruitless manner. To have the Spirit we must cultivate and cherish his motions on our hearts. He delights to dwell richly and constantly in us.

Brother, sister, how is it with you? Are you conscious of the presence of the Spirit? O let me persuade you and charge you not to live in darkness. Ask the aid of the Spirit in everything—in every temporal affair—in all your plans of life—in all your intercourse with society. Do nothing in the dark. If your mind is not decided with regard to the propriety of you course, hold back till the Spirit's light shines on your path.

With the help of the Spirit, you can perform any duty—bear any trial—suffer and even die for Christ. His help will give you the victory over the world, the fear of man and every temptation. O then be a thorough, whole-hearted christian. "Be perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." "Be holy, for the Lord your God is holy." Consecrate your time, your talents, your property, yourself to God. Be a living epistle, that the world—the church—your nearest friends—every body, may see and know that you follow Christ. Let there not be the least doubt in your own mind, or in the minds of those who know you best in regard to your piety.

How sad to think that there are so many professing Christ who cannot be identified by their conduct. What a mighty obstacle is this to the conversion of souls to Christ. But brother, sister, you need not belong to this class. The Spirit can help all your infirmities when you yield fully to his blest control. O then stop not short of complete victory over all sin—Golden Rule.

MUSIC HEALTHFUL.—Music, like painting and statuary, refines, and elevates, and sanctifies. Song is the language of gladness, and it is the utterance of devotion. But coming lower down, it is physically beneficial; it rouses the circulation, wakes up the bodily energies, and diffuses life and animation around. Does a lazy man ever sing? Does a milk-and-water character ever strike a stirring note? Never. Song is the outlet of mental and physical activity, and increases both by its exercise. No child has completed a religious education who has not been taught to sing the songs of Zion. No part of our religious worship is sweeter than this. In David's day it was a practice and a study.—Hall.

FOLLY.—Sir Joshua Reynolds being asked how would he personate Folly in a painting, replied that he would represent a man climbing over a wall at the risk of his neck, with an open gate close by, through which he might walk with ease and safety.

"Folly's son a thousand times
O'er the walls of danger climbs:
'Lo, the door!' Experience cries;
'Let me mount,' the fool replies:
Once more he climbs—he falls—he dies."

Walk Softly.

The tiniest pebble thrown sea-ward from the beach, causes a wavelet, whose influences are felt for unnumbered leagues out upon old ocean's bosom. The softest whisper excites vibrations in the atmosphere around us, which cease not this side the boundless ether; so the act or thought, however insignificant, may color a lifetime, may leave influences which shall not cease, until time shall be no longer. These things being so, it would seem that every act should be a felt responsibility, and every thought a prayer. Let us all walk softly then, or at least with a motive and a wish for good.

A crust of bread thrown thoughtlessly by a fellow student, made Prescott, in a measure, sightless for near half a century. An ill-timed jest has severed many a warm friendship, and planted bitterness for a lifetime, where ought to have welled up the warmest, and purest, and loveliest springs of our nature. Many a time and oft, has a frown, a harsh word, an unfeeling or contemptuous gesture, crushed resolves forever, which were budding to a new and changed and better life. Reader, let us all walk softly then, by day and by night, at home and abroad, inasmuch as for every step in life, we must give account at the judgment.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Fact in Eloquence.

The subject of the first article in The Atlantic Monthly for September is "Eloquence," which is treated with discriminating ability. It is urged that true eloquence must have a foundation and body. It "must be grounded on the plainest narrative. Afterward, it may warm itself until it exhales symbols of every form and color, speaks only through the most poetic forms, but, first and last, it must still be a biblical statement of fact. The orator is thereby an orator, that he keeps his feet ever on a fact. Thus only is he invincible. No gifts, no graces, no power of wit, of learning or illustration, will make any amends for want of this. All audiences are just to this point. Fame of voice or of rhetoric will carry people a few times to hear a speaker, but they soon begin to ask, "What is he driving at?" and if this man does not stand for anything, he will be deserted. A good upholder of anything which they believe, a fact-speaker of any kind, they will long follow."

RETURNING SPRING.

I come! I come! Ye have called me long,
I come o'er the mountain with light and song!
Ye may trace my step o'er the wakening earth,
By the winds which tell of the violet's birth,
By the primrose stars in the shadowy grass,
By the green leaves opening as I pass.

FAITH.—"I bless myself, and am thankful, that I lived not in days of miracles; that I never saw Christ nor his disciples. I would not have been one of those Israelites that passed the Red Sea; nor one of Christ's patients, on whom he wrought his wonders: then had my faith been thrust upon me; nor should I enjoy that greater blessing pronounced to all that believe and saw not. I believe he was dead, and buried, and rose again; and desire to see him in his glory, rather than to contemplate him in his cenotaph or sepulchre. Nor is this much to believe; as we have reason, we owe this faith unto history: they only had the advantage of a bold and noble faith, who lived before his coming, who, upon obscure prophecies and mystical types, could raise a belief, and expect apparent impossibilities."

—Sir Thomas Browne.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD CRAVAT.—The name of that indispensable article in a gentleman's costume, the cravat, as well as the article itself, was derived from the Croatian soldiers, who, from time immemorial, have been celebrated for their bravery and cruelty. In the seventeenth century there were troops of Croats in almost every service in Europe. Louis XIV. of France always had in his pay a corps of "Royal Croats." Their original name, difficult of pronunciation in French, was speedily changed to Cravats; and a part of their national uniform being a fringed bandage around the neck, tassels from which fell picturesquely upon their breast pieces, the courtiers of the grand monarque, not slow to imitate or improve upon a fashion so becoming, introduced for the first time to European gentlemen the modern multiform and sometimes merciless cravat. The Croats, whose home is the Austrian province of Croatia, form the largest contingent of the army with which Austria has invaded Sardinia.

"Words are mighty, words are living,
Serpents with their venomous stings,
Or bright angels crowding round us
With heaven's light upon their wings:
Every word has its own spirit,
True or false, that never dies;
Every word man's lips have uttered,
Echoes in God's skies."

CAPITAL SERMON.—A writer in the Sierra (Cal.) Citizen, under the title of "Young Men and Tree Frogs," gives a better sermon, a better lecture on morality, and a better essay on mental philosophy, all in a few lines, than are sometimes found in as many volumes of standard authors:

"The tree frog acquires the color of whatever it adheres to for a short time; if it is found on the oak, it bears the color of that tree; if on the sycamore or cypress, it will be a whitish brown; and when it is found on the growing corn, it is sure to be green. Just so it is with young men; their companions tell us what their character is; if they associate with the vulgar, the licentious, and the profane, then their hearts are already stained with their guilt and shame, and they will themselves become like vicious. The study of bad books, or the love of wicked companions, is the broadest and most certain road to ruin that young men can travel, and a few well-directed lessons in either will lead them on, step by step, to the gate of destruction. Our moral and physical laws show how important it is to have proper associations of every kind, especially in youth. How dangerous it is to gaze on a picture or scene that pollutes the imagination or blunts the moral perceptions, or has a tendency to weaken a sense of our duty to God and man!"—Ex.

The Little Boy and his Mother; or, the Perfect Pattern.

"Mother, who, of all the big boys, should you like for me to pattern after?" asked a little boy who was looking round for a good example.

"Who should you think?" asked his mother; you know the big boys better than I do."

The little boy thought. Then he said, "There's Dan Parker, he smokes; there's Bill Parker, he swears; Tom Jones has a horrid temper; Sam Jay spreës it; Jim Wood hates study; Joe Blake is cross; Charlie Doe fishes on Sunday; Gus Tyng tells whoppers. Mother, there isn't one, that, if I copy, I shouldn't copy a blot from."

O, how the ugly blots in our character stand out. "Well," said his mother, "there is one perfect pattern." "Who?" asked the boy, "I should love to know him." "The Son of God," she answered, "who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth; and who left us an example that we should follow his steps."

Prayer.

The Lord attends when children pray;
A whisper he can hear;
He knows not only what we say,
But what we wish or fear.

He sees us when we are alone,
Though no one else can see;
And all our thoughts to him are known,
Wherever we may be.

'Tis not enough to bend the knee,
And words of prayer to say:
The heart must with the lips agree,
Or else we do not pray.

Teach us, O Lord, to pray aright;
Thy grace to us impart;
That we in prayer may take delight,
And serve thee with the heart.

Then, heavenly Father, at thy throne
Thy praise we shall proclaim;
And daily our requests make known,
In our Redeemer's name.

Planting a Crop for God.

"Father, what crop had I better plant for God?" asked a little boy, whose father had given him a bit of the garden ground to raise something to turn into missionary money; "will beans or onions fetch most?"

"I can tell you," said Aunty, who sat by.

"What?" asked the little boy.

"I would lay out four beds in your garden. Plant the seeds of love in one, the seeds of obedience in another, truth in a third, and humility in a fourth. These will raise a beautiful crop for God."

"Oh, Aunty," said the little boy, "I am trying to raise those seeds every day in my own heart; but my mother says the weeds grow fastest. O, I have to dig so."

THE PRAYER OF FAITH.—A little boy and his brother were lost in a western forest. On giving account of the circumstance after they were found, the little fellow said, "It grew dark, and I kneeled down and asked God to take care of little Johnny, and then went to sleep." How touching! how sublime! David himself said, "I will both lay me down in peace and sleep; for thou Lord, only makest me to dwell in safety." Perhaps the little boy learned his lesson of trust in God from the royal psalmist.

Where'er the angry passions rise,
And tempt our thought and tongues to strife,
To Jesus let us lift our eyes,
Bright pattern of the christian life.

Ah! how benevolent and kind,
How mild and ready to forgive;
Be this the temper of our mind,
And these the rules by which we live.

To do his heavenly Father's will
Was his employment and delight,
Humanity and holy zeal
Shone through his life, divinely bright.

Thy fair example may we trace,
To teach us what we ought to be,
Make us, by thy transforming grace,
Dear Savior, daily more like thee.

Discussion of Human Destiny.

Do Reason and the Scriptures teach the utter extinction of an unregenerate portion of human beings, instead of the final salvation of all?

AFFIRMATIVE, BY REV. C. F. HUDSON.

CHAPTER III.—Continued.

"Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? . . . This do and thou shalt live."—Luke 10: 25, 28.

I do not now affirm that eternal or aionian life implies immortal life. But the phrase "thou shalt live" naturally suggests the literal sense. If the aeonian life, or life of the gospel era was implied, still Christ must mean more than simply that the lawyer would live on and into the gospel age, by keeping the commandments. If the aeonian life was a spiritual and higher life, still Christ's reply no less favors the idea that such would be the only continuing and immortal life.

"Because I live, ye shall live also."—John 14: 19.

This expression can not easily be referred to a moral or spiritual life, as distinct from life in the literal sense. All the circumstances as they appear in the previous context, seem to refer the expression to the future destination of the disciples. "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you. Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more; but ye see me; because I live, ye shall live also." The same literal interpretation is proved by the words of Christ in John 6: 39, 40, 49, 54: "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day . . . . Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead . . . . Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day."

"Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the spirit saith unto the churches. He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death."—Rev. 2: 10, 11.

The phrase "second death," which is here contrasted with "a crown of life," occurs in three other places in this book, where it is put in contrast with "resurrection," "book of life," and "water of life." It was also common among the Jews, and the following examples go to show that it meant extinction of being: "Every idolator, who says that there is another God besides me, I will slay with the second death, from which no man can come to life again." (Pirke R. Eliezer, c. 34.) "Let Reuben live, and not die the second death, by which the ungodly die in the world to come." (Targum of Jerusalem, on Deut. 33: 6.) "This hath been decreed by the Lord, that this sin shall not be forgiven them, until they die the second death." (Targum on Isa. 22: 14.) I take this to be a periphrastic way of saying that the sin should never be forgiven. So Matt. 12: 31: "It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in the world to come." David Kimchi, one of the ablest Jewish doctors, says the Targumist means, in the above expression, "the death of the soul in the world to come.") Again: "They shall die the second death, and shall not live in the world to come, saith the Lord." (Targum on Jer. 51: 39.) "They shall die the second death, so as not to enter into the world to come." (Ib, Jer. 51: 57.)

On the phrase, "the world to come," I shall speak again. I am aware that Dr. Hammond, who is quoted at length by Mr. Paige in his "Selections," makes some application of the passage in Rev. 20: 6, to the gospel dispensation. He speaks of "the second death, into which they are said to go, that are never to appear in the church again." But this indicates no immortality of the wicked. And the above citations I think fully warrant the words of Dr. H: "Whatsoever be signified by the world to come, (the age of the Messias, in whatsoever Jewish notion of it,) it seems to denote such a death from which there is no release. And according to this notion of it, as it reflects fitly on the first death, (which is a destruction, but such as is reparable by a rising or resurrection, but this past hopes, and exclusive of that,) so will all the several places wherein it is used be clearly interpreted. . . . And though, in these different matters, some difference there must needs be in the significations, yet in all of them the notion of utter destruction, final, irreparable excision, may very properly be retained and applied to each of them."

"Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."—Matt. 10: 28. Compare Luke 12: 5.

I need not here debate the question whether the being here referred to as "able to destroy both soul and body" is God or Satan. It is supposed to be Satan by Maurice in his "Theological Essays," and also by Stier in his "Words of Jesus," in a happy statement of the argument. This view likewise accords with a remarkable passage of Arnobius, in his work "Against the Gentiles" (A. D. 303.) "This is the real death of man, which leaves him nothing. What we see is but the separation of soul and body, not his utter destruction. This, I say, is the true death of man, when souls that know not God are consumed by long continued torment, by a fierce fire into which certain cruel enemies shall cast them, who were unknown before Christ and detected by himself alone." (50.2.c.14.) Arnobius evidently refers to the evil angels, whom, in a collective sense, Dr. Bushnell calls Satan. What Arnobius says of "long continued torment," or of infliction generally, belongs to his age. It concerns the form of thought only, not its substance.

That annihilation is the danger here described is conceded by Dr. Ballou, who says: "We see no allusion, here, to the idea of endless misery, but rather to that of annihilation. It was a killing of the soul as well as the body, a destroying of both soul and body; and the literal import at least of both expressions is, that it was a destruction of the one in the same sense as of the other." (Universalist Expositor, vol. 4, p. 168: See Paige Selections, in loc.) And Mr. Balfour: "Men who are able to kill the body could not kill the whole man or person, for this would be to blot the man for ever out of existence. God only was able to do this." "If Gehenna refers to punishment in a future state, the passage in question rather teaches the doctrine of annihilation than endless misery." (First Inquiry, pp. 152, 156. See also Appendix, pp. 354, 355.) These writers think there could be no actual danger of annihilation,—or that, if God can thus destroy, it does not follow that he will,—because those whom Christ addressed were in the divine favor and under the divine protection. Very true; but that does not destroy all practical meaning of the passage. It may still describe a danger from which the disciples were delivered by their faithful allegiance, and would be finally saved by "continuing unto the end;" and a danger to which they are still exposed who do not trust in God because they do not love him.

Again, when one urges that the disciples were in no actual danger of annihilation, I reply, it is equally true that they were in no actual danger of any other calamity which gehenna may be supposed to mean. But Universalists now contend that "gehenna punishment," in some sense, is or has been actually suffered by ungodly men. And this is to admit that if destruction of "both soul and body" means annihilation, that is an actual danger, to be averted only by repentance. Christ never warns against an unreal danger.

The similar comment of those orthodox writers who say that God can annihilate but will not, whence they take the passage as proving the immortality of the soul and its endless misery if unsaved, is one of the most remarkable specimens of all theological reasoning. It is as much as to say: "Man cannot kill the soul, though God can; therefore it is immortal." Convenient logic, which will show that God never will do anything that man cannot do. No wonder if, in the prevalence of such divinity, a Feverbach writes an "Essence of Christianity" to show that God is man and man is God.

Now that the destruction of the body here contemplated is literal, is admitted by all. It remains to be shown that the contemplated destruction of the soul is not also literal; or that the phrase "destroy both soul and body in gehenna" admits the idea that the soul is indestructible, or never will in fact be destroyed. Indeed the literal sense seems so obvious and inevitable that some Universalists take the word "soul" (psyche,) not in its modern sense, but in the sense of "life," comparing the passage with Isa. 10: 18, and Mal. 4: 1. They take the phrase "soul and body" to be proverbial, and the whole phrase, in hand to denote an utter destruction, temporally. But in a Bible that says nothing about an immortal soul, this interpretation is quite formidable. Admitting the phrase to be proverbial, it remains to be shown that the destruction named spares a principle of immortality, of which the Scriptures say nothing. But the passage in Matt. 10: 28, is of still further importance because it contains a much disputed word, gehenna (hell.) Universalist writers have shown with great ability that gehenna cannot mean a place of eternal misery. It is taken from the valley of the son of Hinnom, or Tophet, and there was no eternal misery there. And because the punishment referred to in the twelve places in the New Testament where the word occurs, could not be executed in that valley, Universalists have also inferred that it might be something different from any punishment accomplished in that valley. Here two questions arise: What was the punishment of the literal Tophet? and, What corresponds to it, in the penalty of gehenna?

In Mark 9: 43–48, the word gehenna thrice occurs, and as often the phrase, "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." This brings us at once to Isa. 66: 24, the only other place where the phrase is found. "They shall go forth, and shall look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." Here I do not see that it matters whether the place described is the valley before Jerusalem, or the scene of the ruin of Sennacherib's army, or of the destruction of Jerusalem. Allowing all this latitude, the words still denote a proper destruction, the fire devouring what the worm does not consume. The orthodox view of eternal non-destruction as much favors the immortality of "carcasses" as of the lost soul. The accompaniments of this scene of death are, the horror and infamy of dying unburied, the body being thrown into an accursed place once devoted to a hideous idol worship.

Death, then, with all its degradations and corruptions for "an abhorring unto all flesh," was the literal significance of Tophet. Such was the type, what was the antitype?

Universalists maintain that the special punishment of gehenna was accomplished in the destruction of Jerusalem, in fulfillment of the prophecies in Jer. 7: 31–34; 19: 6–13. (See Balfour, First Inquiry, pp. 123–128.) It seems to me difficult to refer all the passages that contain the expression, particularly James 3: 6, to that particular event. Yet I am willing for argument's sake to suppose that they contain no allusion to a punishment after death. It will still remain for the Universalist to show that the Jews who suffered that punishment have any resurrection either to "everlasting life," or to immortality. This point will be examined soon.

But suppose we take Schleusner's statement, that among the Jews "any severe punishment, especially a shameful kind of death, was denominated gehenna." And also that the phrase "soul and body" was a proverbial expression, as above named. Setting out from this view, we naturally inquire how the Jews themselves came to use the term gehenna. Its general import is likely to appear in their traditions, though in these traditions may be many things foolish and puerile. In this view I quote a few passages from the Targums and the Talmud, premising that the doctrine of annihilation was adverse to the philosophic doctrine of the "immortal soul" which had begun to affect the Jewish mind. And again, I think I shall show that the early Christians, no less than the Targumists, and Talmudits, held the annihilation of the incorrigibly wicked.

In the Jerusalem Targum on Gen. 3: 24, it is said: "He made gehenna for the wicked, like a two edged sword, cutting either way; and in the midst of it sparks and coals, burning up the wicked." In the Targum on Ps. 88: 20; "And they shall be consumed in the smoke of gehenna." On Eccl. 8: 10; "They have gone to be consumed in gehenna." And on Isa. 31: 9, gehenna is spoken of as "a fire which goes forth from the bodies of the wicked, and sets them on fire: for it is said, Ye shall conceive chaff, and bring forth stubble; your breath, as fire, shall devour you." This may illustrate the phrase in James 3: 6; "set on fire of hell." The writer of the apochryphal book, Ecclesiasticus, evidently alluding to "gehenna punishment," says: "Humble thy spirit very much; for the vengeance on the flesh of the ungodly is fire and worms," (7: 19.) And again: "He that joineth himself to harlots will be reckless. Rottenness and worms shall inherit him; and he shall be lifted up for a greater example; and his soul shall be taken away out of the number." (19: 3.) The Jewish Talmud also says: "Those who sin and rebel greatly in Israel, as well as Gentile sinners, shall descend into gehenna, and there be judged during twelve months; at the end of which the body is consumed, the soul is burned up, and the spirit is scattered beneath the feet of the just, as it is said in Mal. 4: 3."

What, then, was "gehenna punishment," even if we take the disputed word as an adjective, signifying simply the severest judgment, as Universalist doctrines explain the words in Matt. 5: 22?

That "extermination is the greatest of all punishments" is a common remark of Maimonides, the "Eagle of the Jewish Doctors," and of other Rabbis. One of those speaking of the death of the soul, says this is "perfected punishment, and excision absolute, and perdition and corruption, which is never reversed, and is the greatest among all punishments." And we dismiss the passage in hand with the words of Dr. Bentley, partly as confirming our interpretation, partly as showing that the punishment may not be severe beyond all reason or thought of man: "O dismal reward of Infidelity! at which nature does shrink and shiver with horror. What some of the learnedest Doctors among the Jews have esteemed the most dreadful of all punishments, and have assigned for the portion of the blackest criminals of the damned,—so interpreting Tophet, Abaddon, the Valley of Slaughter, and the like, for final extinction and deprivation of being—this Atheism exhibits to us as an equivalent to heaven." (Boyle Lecture, Sermon I.)

"But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. 2: 12

Granting, for argument's sake, that this refers to a temporal destruction, it will remain for the Universalist to show that the phrase "shall utterly perish" allows a subsequent resurrection to immortality. It may also be compared with Acts 3: 23, where Peter quotes from Deut. 18: 19, and says: "Every soul which will not hear that Prophet shall be utterly destroyed (exolothreuthesetai) from among the people." This was the punishment of extirpation, and it is explained in the Mishna, the text or older tradition of the Talmud, as cutting off from the life of the olam habba,—a Hebrew phrase denoting the world or age which the Jews expected to inherit in the resurrection of the dead, and which they expected would continue forever. What the phrase means we are to decide. I will only say for the present that it seems connected not only with the phrases, "world to come" (aion ho erchomenos, Mark 10: 30; Luke 18: 30, mel'on aion, Heb. 6: 5,) and "that world" (aion ekeinos, Luke 20: 35,) but also with the zoe eis ton aiona, and the zoe aionios which are the subject of our next inquiry; and that it was a common expression in the Mishna that such an one is "worthy of the olam habba," (see Schoettgen, Horæ Heb., in Suc. 20: 35.)

For the Crisis.

Seeing Him as He Is.

[From a sermon on John 3: 2,—"Now we are the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is," preached in Chapman Hall, Boston, on June 5th, by Wm. Glen Moncrieff.]

WHAT WILL BE THE PROOF OF OUR FINAL RESEMBLANCE TO JESUS? "We shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." This is a profound and interesting thought, and deserves our patient consideration. "We shall be like him; for," or because, "we shall see him as he is." In my view the two parts of this sentence are reversible, and may be made alternately foundation and superstructure—premise and conclusion. "We shall see him as he is;" and, as a consequence, "we shall be like him;" or, in the form in which the passage meets our eye, "we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." We cannot see him as he is, unless we are finally to be like him. Only feebly at present can we grasp this sublime idea, yet let us seize it with what power we may, and examine its celestial proportions.

By all means let us give special attention to the words "see him as he is." The fact that we are destined to behold him, argues no resemblance on our part to the glorified Jesus; but the affirmation we shall see him as he is, does most certainly involve an identity, more or less perfect, between us. This predicted spiritual discernment argues an exaltation of our nature commensurate with the glorified humanity of the Son of God.

Picture to your mind a pure, a noble and disinterested advocate of the rights of the slave—one animated, like Wilberforce, with the spirit of justice, humanity and God. You naturally admire this apostle of liberty, and watch his movements with sympathy and satisfaction. So far you are one with him; you know him, having a kindred spirit and kindred principles. But what idea will a slave-owner form of his character and designs? Your apostle of humanity would be described by him as a pestilential revolutionist—a slanderer—an enemy of justice and property; an intermeddler with matters beyond his sphere and worthy of suspension not merely from civil privileges, but from life itself. With laurels you would crown the bondman's friend; the planter would surround him with blazing fagots and demoniac curses. The planter is not like him; not like him in sense of equity, and mercy and impartial humanity; and as a consequence sees him not as he is, but in a character the very reverse of what really belongs to him.

Here is a man who rises up among the avowed followers of Jesus, and proclaims some vital, long-forgotten truth; he does so, we shall imagine, in the intense sincerity of his heart, and pleads now with melting pathos, and now he thunders till this church quivers to its utmost bound. Listen to the diverse sentiment regarding the heretical Boanerges. You stand at a closet door, and what words are those? A sainted voice cries, "O Lord, I thank thee for raising up this man Luther,—for his courage and usefulness; endow him with strength from on high, and make him dear to thy faithful ones." Being like him, this lowly suppliant sees him as he is. But now we turn our nimble steps in another direction, and different accents approach our ears. The company we now survey are shaven-crowned monks, and the fires of bigoted vengeance light up their eyes at the mention of the Reformer's name. With bell, and book, and candle, they curse him from head to foot; pronounce him the enemy of God, and of his Christ; and there is probably not one of them who would not pay his passage to the nether world, and shout with pleasure as he dropt upon its boiling waves. They are not like him—like him in love of truth and spiritual liberty—in devotion to God,—in the apprehension of Jesus and his love; therefore they see not the Reformer as he is; and till they are animated with his spirit they never can.

When our divine Lord was on earth, you are familiar with the treatment he received. You are ready to apply to him every title of endearment—every term expressive of honor, and majesty and beauty. But many lips breathed the vilest reproaches concerning him; he was a wine-bibber, a deceiver, a blasphemer; his enemies actually scourged him at the close of his testimony, and nailed him to a cross, and so hurried him from among the living, as if the ground was polluted by his steps, and the air by his breathing. They were not like him in spirituality, in piety, and in love; they did not, as a result, see him as he was. They beheld him, but not as he was; they saw a hideous creation of their own carnal imaginations, and in breaking it to pieces they crushed the spotless Lamb of God. "We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory; which none of the princes of this world knew; for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory."—1 Cor. 2: 7, 8. When suspended on the tree, the Captain of our salvation uttered this prayer, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Had they apprehended his fair and heavenly character, like Nicodemus, and Joseph of Arimathea, and the honorable and pious women who watched his crucifixion,—they would never have driven the nails through his hands, or put the thorny crown on his brow.
